CHRONICLE

Socialist Mayor Elected.—An extraordinary political event of the week was the election of a Socialist Mayor in Milwaukee by a plurality of 8,000, the largest ever cast for a Mayoralty candidate in that city. The Socialists also elected the six aldermen-at-large and carried fourteen wards out of twenty-three, thus giving to Milwaukee the distinction of being the first American city to elect a complete Socialist administration. "This election was not the result of one campaign," said Emil Seidel, the newly-elected Mayor. "It is the victory that comes to the cause after twenty-six years of the hardest kind of work. We have flooded this town with literature and have had men on the stump in and out of campaign times, educating the workingmen to the opportunities that lay before them. We have not promised the workingmen or the city at large an immediate panacea for ills. We have promised the best government that we can give and we are going to live up to that promise. There will be no Utopia, no millenium, none of the wild antics that our opponents have charged to us. There will be no party bosses, no one-man policy. When we decide upon a course to pursue there will be conferences with the other Socialists elected and the best lines will be followed." The country, no doubt, will remember this declaration and watch how carefully the new administration fulfils its promises.

In the Aldermanic elections, held in Chicago on the same day, the Democrats returned twenty-one out of thirty-five candidates, thus overturning the status of the present Council and securing a majority of six in a body of seventy members. The result is accepted as a repudiation of the administration of Mayor Busse, which has been involved in serious scandals; it is a rebuke, too, to the policies of Governor Dineen, and national issues must have had some influence. Prominent Democrats had assailed the tariff and the high cost of living and insisted that even in a municipal election the Republican National Administration ought to be rebuked.

Tariff in Indiana.—That dissatisfaction is growing in the ranks of the Republican party seems a fair inference from the recent action of the Republican state convention of Indiana. Senator Beveridge, one of the Republicans that voted against the Tariff bill, and Temporary Chairman of the convention, declared over and over again: "I could not stand for it then and I cannot stand for it now." The convention adopted a platform entirely ignoring that measure and favored "the immediate creation of a genuine, permanent, nonpartisan tariff commission with ample powers and definite duties fixed in the law itself." Another declaration of the platform is as follows: "We believe in a protective tariff, measured by the difference between the cost of production here and abroad. Less than this is unjust to American laborers, more is unjust to American consumers. That difference should be ascertained with the utmost speed, and the present law modified accordingly." It has not escaped general notice that the platform adopted lauds "Theodore Roosevelt and his great policies," omits all mention of President Taft, and while endorsing the administration, criticizes sharply the most important law to which the President has given his approval. The day after the Indiana Republican Convention President Taft cancelled his engagement to visit Indianapolis on May 5.

Supreme Court Cases.—The Supreme Court of the United States ordered a rehearing of the cases against the Standard Oil and American Tobacco Companies. As a result the decision will probably be delayed for a year from the present.—Governor Crothers announced that he would veto the Digges Disfranchisement bill which debars negroes from registering as voters in State and municipal elections. He cannot prevent the submission to the voters of the State of the Constitutional Amendment which permits all white men to vote and excludes all negroes not possessing five hundred dollars' worth of property. It is proposed later to test before the Supreme Court the validity of the application to Maryland of the Fifteenth Amendment, which that State failed to ratify.

Income Tax Progress.—The income tax amendment has been rejected by Virginia and Massachusetts and ratified by Alabama, South Carolina, Illinois, Oklahoma, Mississippi and Maryland. By the end of the year practically one-third of the State Legislatures will have had an opportunity to pass on the amendment. The Legislatures of New York, New Jersey and Rhode Island are now in session but have yet to take action in the matter.

The Labor Situation.—Notwithstanding the upward tendency of wages in several departments of industry, labor conditions are still unsettled and numerous strikes, though none of them very extensive, have occurred in widely separated parts of the country. The street-car strike of Philadelphia has collapsed. The strike of the 300,000 miners in the bituminous coal fields of the United States appears to be nearing a settlement. Work in the mines was suspended and the demand for higher wages was made on April 1. Addressing a mass meeting of two thousand workingmen in Worcester, Mass., President Taft declared that he believed in labor organizations. But as Chief Magistrate of the nation he believed also in the right of every man to labor as he will and to remain out of labor organizations if he chooses.

The British Crisis.—The Mid-Glamorganshire election has resulted in favor of F. W. Gibbins, the Liberal candidate, put forward by the local Liberal Association in defiance of the wishes of the Government. He defeated the Socialist-Labor candidate by 2,710 votes, and as the total poll, 15,120, exceeded the number of votes cast for Sir Samuel Evans at the general election by 2,000 votes, it seems that from 1,000 to 1,500 at least of his majority must have been votes of Unionists who had no candidate. Hence, if the Liberal voters be also taken into account, the assumption that Mr. Gibbins' victory is a defeat of Socialism by workingmen seems unfounded. Anyhow, the Socialist voters are a compact body of over 6,000, and Mr. Hartshorn, the defeated candidate, states that his defeat means the definite rupture of the alliance between the Labor and the Liberal parties. The Master of Elibank, Chief Liberal Whip, has summoned a meeting of the Welsh members to consider the situation. The debate on the Government Resolutions regarding the House of Peers was conducted with considerable bitterness on both sides.—The Government is supporting a member's bill to abolish plural voting and to have all elections on the same day. The Unionists oppose it, not only on the ground that it is a further assertion of the Radical principle that only individuals and not interests have a right to parliamentary representation, but also because it touches but one point in the general question of Franchise Reform and is designed merely to weaken them at the coming elections. As long as it remains a private member's bill and is not formally adopted by the Government, it has little chance of passing the House of Lords.

Irish Outlook.—Mr. Redmond in his speech before Parliament promised to support the Veto Resolutions in substance, and again insisted that the Government should be ready to appeal to the Crown and, if denied, go to the country. An Irish Party meeting resolved to support the amendments which limit the powers of the Lords to a second rejection of a bill instead of a third, and dispense with the condition that two years shall elapse between the introduction of a bill rejected by the Lords and its passage for the third time in the Commons. Contributions to the National Funds are increasing more rapidly than at any time since the Parnell schism of 1890. Bishops Clancy and Sheehan, following several other prelates in doubling their subscriptions, have written strong letters in support of the Party and its attitude and urging on the people the duty of maintaining it. Mr. E. P. O'Kelly, chairman of the Wicklow Co. Council and formerly member for that constituency, was elected without opposition to succeed the late James O'Connor, M. P. Mr. O'Brien's revelations at Cork of propositions made to him by Mr. Lloyd-George concerning Budget and Land Purchase, were branded by the English Chancellor, partly as unfounded and partly as breaches of confidence. Regarding these and other statements he has made reflecting on Mr. Redmond and his action, Mr. O'Brien has written to the London Observer denying that he intends to contest Mr. Redmond's leadership and requesting "a little more delicacy in English references to the differences of opinion among Irish representatives which are quite as legitimate as the differences among their English colleagues and considerably less implacable."—Dr. Douglas Hyde, addressing the National Teachers' Congress, declared that the National University was not responsible for the delay in settling the question of compulsory Irish teaching. It would be definitely settled in May.

and, he thought, in accordance with popular thought and sentiment.

Troubles in India.—After lasting fifteen days the trial of those implicated in the murder of Mr. Jackson, the Nasik magistrate, is ended. It was held before a special commission which included Justice Chandavarkar. Kanhere, the assassin, and also Karve, the chief conspirator, and Deshpande, who both accompanied him to the theatre where the crime was committed, were condemned to death. Soman Joshi and Vaidya, active members of the secret society which planned it, were sentenced to transportation for life, and Dattu Joshi, accomplice before the fact, to imprisonment for two years. Fifty-four Brahmins, most of them of high caste, and some of them hitherto in the Government service, are now to be tried for conspiracy.—The Hindoos of Bengal have declared a boycott against all Mohammedan traders who will not join the revolutionary movement. This shows how widespread the movement is.—Nandgopal, editor of Swarajya, has been given ten years' transportation for seditious articles.

General Election in France.—The general election will take place in France on April 24. Several burning questions will be debated before the electors in public meetings. There is, first, the fifteen thousand francs sessional indemnity, against which there has been everywhere a strong protest. Secondly, there are the liquidation scandals, the official volatilization of the "Milliard des congrégations." Thirdly, there is the income tax, against which are arrayed all the forces of commerce and industry. Fourthly, the bill for compulsory retirement ("retraites obligatoires") of workingmen, the general principle of which was voted by the Chamber on April 1, comes before the country with an explicit condemnation by Le Temps, which maintains that the old-age pension law for septuagenarians, voted July 14, 1905, was quite sufficient if properly modified to include persons whose age was between sixty-five and seventy and would not necessitate, as the proposed bill does, a fresh and immense army of officials to examine the account-books of twenty million working men and women. Finally, there is the question of proportional representation, which, in its present form, gives one deputy to a population of one hundred thousand and two deputies when the population exceeds that figure by a single unit. M. Briand, in the French Senate, made several solemn declarations. Among other generalities he said: "It is in the interest of the republican party that the elections be carried on with independence and dignity. The republic has less to gain and more to lose than any other party in any attempt to falsify or corrupt universal suffrage . . . You speak of prefects who escort the candidates in their electioneering rounds. I have no taste for this kind of manifestation, which may perhaps succeed in influencing some needy persons, but which, I am profoundly convinced, harms the cause it is intended to promote. The French people have not slavish souls." With similar declarations M. Briand opened the electoral campaign on April 10 at Saint-Chamond, Loire, in a speech which was interrupted by anarchist and revolutionary groups who broke the windows of the hall and fired revolvers. However, the Premier continued to sketch the government program in which electoral reform fills a large space, as well as the regularizing of the situation of government officials in such a way as to prevent recurrence of such strikes as that of the post-office employees. As M. Briand was leaving the town, a fight occurred between his supporters and hostile manifestants. A few were wounded. The opposition candidate, M. Lorrin, a Socialist, when accused of having organized this demonstration, formally denied the charge. A cablegram from Paris, dated April 10, says that fashionably dressed women are taking an active part in the elections. Half a dozen women are enthusiastic candidates for election in Paris, although jurists are divided as to the validity of the election of a woman to the Chamber of Deputies. Many other women are scouring the city in automobiles, distributing pamphlets and handbills.

Rumored Clerical Apostasies in France.—Not long ago the Canadian Churchman, of Kingston, Ont., and other anti-Catholic journals, asserted that fifteen hundred priests had left the Church in France as a result of the Separation Law. The editor of the True Witness wrote for information to the editors of the Univers, La Libre Parole, and the Paris Croix. M. François Veuillot sent a formal and absolute denial, saying that the True Witness might safely challenge the slanderers to support their assertions by any proof. "Even among the most anti-clerical journals of France they will not find one which, being on the spot, would dare to express such a pretension. In fact, since the separation the French clergy have been admirable. In spite of all their trials, all the efforts put forth by the Government, we have had to deplore only a few cases of defection. If among our forty thousand priests there have been, in the last four years, a dozen, this is assuredly the maximum." M. Edouard Drumont replied: "The rumor about which you write me is a lying one. The truth is that the separation of Church and State has been the cause of great hardships for the lower clergy, who endure them with admirable fortitude." M. Féron-Vrau, editor of La Croix, said: "That fifteen hundred French priests have apostatized is absolutely false. There have been a few isolated defections and that is all."

The Week in Germany.—A complete change of front on the part of the Berlin authorities was the event of the week. At the bidding of the Imperial Chancellor the Police and Magistracy of the city granted the Socialists and Democrats permission to hold mass meetings in the public parks in protest against the Electoral Franchise Reform Act now before the people. The Socialist leaders guarantee that no disturbance shall result. This unexpected turn of affairs comes as a general surprise. The Socialistic press is naturally jubilant; the Conservative organs are bitter in their criticism of the action, the Deutsche Tages Zeitung going so far as to affirm these mass meetings will prove but the forerunners of revolution.—The Hamburger Nachrichten and papers of similar radical tendencies are daily publishing references to Mr. Roosevelt's tour which are not at all flattering. They contain humorous references to the sensational display accompanying the ex-President's journeyings and make merry over the extravagancies attending his reception along his line of march.—On April 8, Dr. Robert Koch, the celebrated German physician, celebrated the silver jubilee of a notable event in his career. On that day twenty-five years ago he was named head of the newly-founded Hygienic Institute in Berlin, in which position he has since labored with signal success in medical research. In the same year his appointment as Professor in the Medical Faculty of the Berlin University was announced.—The affairs of Liberia, which appear to have entered upon an acute stage because of the continuing unrest disturbing the West African Negro Republic, are just now the subject of diplomatic conferences between Germany and the United States. Reports from the German capital affirm that the discussion is proceeding happily and that a plan for united action is assured.

Jottings From Austria.—The report reaches us from Arco, in the Tyrol, that the aged Cardinal Anton Joseph Gruscha, Prince-bishop of Vienna, is nearing his end. The venerable ecclesiastic retired to Arco some weeks ago to seek relief in his growing infirmities, but his great age—he is now in his ninetieth year—made any improvement in his condition hopeless.—The Imperial Minister of Worship and Education has issued directions to the administrative officers of Universities to pay close attention to the imperial enactments regarding the conduct of their institutions. His purpose is to prevent the organization of special committees of direction on the part of Czechs in the high schools of Bohemia. The influence of these special committees has been a cause of considerable disturbance heretofore among the student body.

Message From President Diaz.—On April 1, the twenty-fourth Congress of Mexico began its fourth session. President Diaz proceeded in state to the hall of deputies and read a lengthy message on the condition of the country. Referring to the resignation of President Zelaya, he said: "This sudden change of government caused the retiring president to consider that he had not the proper guaranty for his personal welfare and prompted him to solicit from our Minister at Nicaragua a refuge on the gunboat General Guerrero. Our Minister, having consulted this Government by cable, was authorized to grant the request, since such action in no way contravened the universally accepted law of nations. The ex-President of Nicaragua was conveyed from his country to the port of Salina Cruz, and from there he came of his own accord to reside in the capital. Shortly afterward, owing undoubtedly to personal matters, he resolved to leave this republic and sail for Europe, where he now is. In spite of what has been mistakenly or maliciously published in Mexican and foreign papers, the conduct of the Government of Mexico, I am pleased to inform you, has in no way altered our relations with other countries."

—From August to December, 1908, seventeen cases of yellow fever were reported from the gulf coast. The public crematory at Dolores incinerates two hundred and fifty corpses monthly. It is for the unknown and pauper dead and for those whose relatives desire cremation.—There are now 16,000 miles of railway in the republic.—On April 2 a grand demonstration with a procession and floats took place in the capital in favor of the re-election of Diaz and Corral. It was the forty-third anniversary of the surrender of Puebla by Maximilian's troops to General Diaz.

Central America Seething.—The long-deferred insurrectionary outbreak against President Dávila of Honduras, has at length occurred. Recruits for Estrada's cause are being enlisted in New Orleans, as the peace overtures of the Madriz government were not acceptable to the leaders of the hostile movement. The governor of British Honduras has issued a proclamation warning British subjects of the pains and penalties for violation of the neutrality laws and forbidding the despatch of munitions of war to Spanish Honduras. Salvador and Guatemala are expected to take sides openly in the struggle. Costa Rica has discreetly taken no part in the altercation.

France-Argentina Steamers.—With the latest arrival of the French liner La Touraine, M. Paul Faguet, general agent of the line in this country, received advices that the Compagnie Transatlantique is to establish an express service between Bordeaux and Buenos Aires, with two 22,000-ton steamships of the Provence type, with a speed of twenty-one knots. M. Faguet says that with the wealth now centered in Argentina fast steamships for Europe could take out as large a number of passengers from Buenos Aires as now goes out of Boston. It is understood that the Argentine Republic is considering a subsidy for the new service.

Royal Clemency.—On Good Friday, before venerating the Holy Cross, King Alfonso XIII of Spain proclaimed the pardon of twenty-three criminals, two being women, who were under sentence of death in various parts of the kingdom. "I pardon them," he said in the time-honored phrase used on this annual occurrence, "as I hope that God will pardon my sins."

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Dr. Carl Lueger, a Modern Tribune of the People

I

A stranger in Vienna during the three or four weeks previous to the tenth of March, would have been not a little astonished at the great crowds continually assembled before the Rathaus, talking in whispers and ever and anon gazing anxiously up at the windows of the Burgomaster's apartments. There was deep sadness, too, on every face, and it was almost tragic to see how they would crowd about an official or other person, who might chance to leave the Rathaus, with their eager questioning, or would scan minutely the bulletins that came from within, the gloom on their countenances settling all the while more and more densely as the days went by. It was as if they waited for news of the issue of some decisive battle, on which the safety of their hearths and homes depended. And a great battle indeed it was that was being waged within, for the Burgomaster of Vienna, the creator of the new city, the savior of the Austrian people from political and economic destruction, Dr. Carl Lueger, "the Heart of Vienna," and "the uncrowned King of Austria," as he has been not untruly called, lay wrestling with death. Many were the Masses offered up all over Austria for his recovery; thousands upon thousands thronged the churches during the services of intercession. But it was not to be! Almost from the beginning the hopes of recovery were slight, and only Lueger's iron constitution enabled him to fight off death as long as he did. The end came a few minutes after eight o'clock on the morning of March 10. His last words before he lost consciousness were: "May Jesus Christ be praised for ever and ever! Amen!" And Catholic Austria, in tears, is kneeling at his tomb.

The life and career of such a man must arouse the interest and the admiration of every true lover of the just liberties of the people, and for us in the United States, who have witnessed the failure of so many attempts at the reform of municipal corruption, it will have perhaps an added interest; for Lueger's career embodies the history of one of the greatest victories for purity of city administration in the annals of democratic government.

The future Burgomaster of Vienna was born in that city on October 24, 1844, of humble parents, his father being of a peasant family of Neustadt on the Danube in Lower Austria, and his mother the daughter of a Viennese cabinet maker. He was the third of eight children and the only son. Until his fourth year he remained dumb, "an involuntary drawback for which," he remarked humorously later, in allusion to his enormous activity as a public speaker, "I have since made ample amends." In both the lower and the secondary schools he was distinguished by his extraordinary diligence and success. In 1862, when he was eighteen, he entered upon the study of law in the University of Vienna, and after a brilliant course, received his doctorate in 1866 when he was twenty-two years of age. The same year also witnessed the death of his father, who was overseer in the Institute of Technology in Vienna, a man of whom Lueger was intensely proud and whose memory he held in the highest veneration to the day of his death.

The death of her husband left his mother in such straitened circumstances that she was forced to open a small government tobacconist's shop, in the care of which she was assisted by her two daughters, Hildegard and Rosa. They, with Carl, who was soon able to add to the family income upon obtaining a position in the office of a Viennese advocate, were the only survivors of the original eight children.

It is proper to speak in this connection of the mother of Dr. Lueger and of the immense influence she exerted upon his after career through her affectionate care of his early education, and her sympathy and encouragement during the difficulties of the beginning, which was at the same time the most racking period of his political life. To her he ever attributed his possession of whatever qualities have contributed to his future eminence, his peculiar, ever-present buoyant cheerfulness, his great trust in Providence, his love of his fellow-man, and his remarkable passion and capacity for hard work. He loved to relate how she assisted him in his studies, even to the extent of reading over with him the speeches of Cicero, of which she understood not a word, in order to be sure that he cited the text correctly. She rejoiced in his political successes and grieved over his defeats even more intensely than he did himself; in the latter case, however, never failing to inspire him with new courage when he returned once more to the battle.

Lueger was always outspoken in his affection for his mother and in his reverence for her memory, a characteristic that contributed not a little to his power over the hearts of the people. A medallion containing his mother's portrait adorned his watch chain, and when the City Council of Vienna decided to have his own portrait made and placed in the gallery of the portraits of his predecessors, Lueger requested the painter to perpetuate the memory of his mother by including her in the picture. He is represented standing with the golden chain of office about his neck, his head slightly raised and with an expression as if he were about to address his beloved Viennese. His right hand rests on a table at his side, on which is a picture, in a simple frame, of an aged, sweet-faced woman in the dress of a woman of the people, his mother. She died on December sixth, 1888, almost a decade before Lueger reached the zenith of his greatness, but not before he had become the most talked-of, if not the most important, figure in Austrian politics.

In 1874 Lueger opened a law-office of his own and soon attained a high place in his profession, by his sure and quick judgment, his exceptionally thorough legal knowledge and his cleverness and eloquence in handling cases before the court. He was remarkable for the generosity with which he treated poor clients, with whom the waiting-room of his office was constantly filled and from whom he would never allow himself to accept a fee. Until 1896 he continued to practise law, but in spite of his ability and large circle of clients he never became a wealthy man. Indeed he often declared, that upon his laying down the office of burgomaster he would have to begin to practise again in order to support himself for the remainder of his life. With this result his kindness to his poor clients had doubtless an intimate relation.

Two years before becoming an independent advocate, Lueger had entered politics, a field for which he was gifted as few of his contemporaries have been. In this he yielded as much to his own inclinations for a political career as to the entreaties of his friends who recognized his exceptional gifts and hoped for great results for the city and empire. Lueger accordingly became, in 1872, a member of the newly-formed Citizens' Club of the Landstrasse, one of the districts or wards of Vienna. Politics are manufactured in Austria in clubs, somewhat as they are in our American political associations or State organizations. This particular club was Liberal, as indeed was almost every organization in Austria at that time. Liberalism was the one political creed the profession of which offered any prospect of success in practical politics. It was Liberalism that had guided Austria from aristocracy to democracy in government, but at what a cost to Austria, and especially to Catholic Austria.

The Liberal program had become economic advancement for the capitalist at the cost of the small tradesman, the capitalist being in nearly all cases a Jew. The moral and material degradation resulting from this policy is more easily imagined than described. The corruption was focussed at Vienna, which in the seventies of the last century was the most backward capital in Europe, ill-lighted, ill-paved, its means of communication ridiculously inadequate, enormously overtaxed, and with its population sunk in a lazy indifference not only political and economic, but also religious. The Jewish Liberals had a free hand; the press was almost entirely in their power; the public opinion of a Catholic people was formed by the very enemies of the Christian name. Catholic dogmas and practices were ridiculed and priests insulted in the streets. A sad picture indeed Austria presented at this time; sadder still was it that the fetters were yearly growing stronger, and there seemed to be no champion in the political arena doughty enough to break them and cast them aside. But salvation was nigh at the hands of the young secretary of the political club in the Landstrasse.

In 1875 Carl Lueger was elected for a term of one year to the city council of Vienna, in which he was the youngest member. His reelection followed in 1876 for a full term of three years, but he resigned his seat in October in consequence of the exposure of grave scandals in the city administration, the exposure leading to the secession of a large section of the members which, lacking either the courage or the desire to follow Lueger and his friends in their fight against corruption, went over to their former bitter enemies, the German Democrats, the allies directing their united efforts against the anti-corruptionist movement, of which Lueger was now the guiding spirit. Thereupon he commenced a vigorous campaign among the people, extending his agitation from district to district, working with all his energy and putting forth all his eloquence to rouse the people to a sense of civic self-respect and just indignation against the despots who were oppressing them.

An immediate result was his own return to the council in 1878 as spokesman for the second elective division of the Landstrasse district, which seat he retained until his death. During these years he discovered and exposed several corruptionist schemes, notably a gigantic one in cemetery administration; the exposures involved him in lawsuits from which he emerged triumphant. He next attempted to organize first a so-called "Economic," and then a "Democratic" party to fight corruption and protect the interests of the small tradesman and of the laboring classes. But the attempt was not a success; for most of those who at first joined him broke away when they discovered that their personal interests were not to be served by the new organizations. Lueger was, in fact, in 1883, deserted by everyone except a certain Dr. Gessmann, who remained his closest and most trusted ally to the end of life. Far from losing courage, however, although considered politically dead, standing alone and boycotted by all in the council—they were mockingly called the "Two-Man Party"—these two courageous men threw themselves with all their strength into the fight against the Liberal "machine," Lueger looking after the agitation in public meetings and private conferences, Gessmann, as editor of a small bi-weekly paper, which they proudly called their "press," and as contributor to influential and sympathetic newspapers in Germany.

About this period Lueger and Gessmann associated themselves with Baron Vogelsang, the Nestor and scientific expounder of modern Christian social politics, and the influence of this truly great man, who had for years stood alone as a leader in the vanguard of the Catholic cause and had borne the brunt of the furious anti-clerical onslaughts, had an effect that was destined to exert enormous influence in the formation and subsequent activity of the future Christian Socialist party, whose leader Dr. Lueger became and remained until his death. The Democrats, assembled under the leadership of Lueger and Gessmann, were soon joined by the Reform party under Dr. Pattai and by the German National party under Dr. Schoenerer, forming a joint organization under the name of the Anti-Semitic party; but this soon became distasteful to Schoenerer, because Lueger included the defence of Catholic interests in his program, and he seceded. Still the cause of anti-Liberalism was advancing. In 1885 when the voting franchise was extended, Lueger was elected to the Reichsrat in spite of the almost 'superhuman efforts of the Jewish Liberals to defeat him.

Although at this time the only one of his party in the house, he at once made it evident that he was a man to be reckoned with, and even his enemies were forced to recognize his commanding knowledge of national affairs, his eloquence and his skill in debate. Especially memorable was his attack on the dualistic settlement between Austria and Hungary and against what he bitterly called "Judaeo-Magyarism" on the occasion of the "Ausgleich" between Austria and Hungary in 1886. This attack he renewed in 1891, when parliamentary martial-law was invoked against him, and he was voted down almost unanimously and nearly driven from the house. "To-day," remarks Dr. Gessmann, who relates the latter incident, "there are few members of the House who do not share the views then expressed by Lueger."

In 1887 Dr. Psenner founded the Christian Socialist Union and two years later Baron Vogelsang succeeded in effecting a union of all the Christians in the City Council, to the number of thirty under the name of the United Christians. Lueger was spokesman and leader. These were the elements of the Christian Socialist party that was to be. The inclusion of the suburbs of Vienna within the city limits in 1890, brought new gains to the United Christians, called also at times, Anti-Semites and anti-Liberals, so that after the elections of this year they stood 42 strong against 94 Liberals. In 1893 their number rose to 46; in 1895 the parties stood: Liberals, 68; Anti-Liberals, 64; Independents, 6. In the meanwhile, in 1891, Lueger had been elected to the Lower Austrian Landtag, where he continued his campaign against Liberalism and corruption with ever-increasing success, eventually even contesting the seat in this body with the Leopoldstadt, the so-called "Judeninsel" of Vienna, which he won, his victory awaking a joyful echo throughout Catholic Austria, as well it might, for it marked the beginning of the end of the Jewish-Liberal tyranny in Austria.

On April 1, 1895, Lueger was elected Burgomaster of Vienna for the first time, receiving seventy votes; but his majority was too small to be effective and he would not accept. The City Council could not agree upon another for the dignity, so it was dissolved and the city government was carried on until the autumn by an imperial commissioner. In the September elections the United Christians were so overwhelmingly successful that they could elect Lueger Burgomaster for a second time on October 29 with ninety-three votes against forty-four. This time he accepted, but the Prime Minister, Count Badeni, under pressure from the Liberals, influenced the Emperor to refuse to confirm the election. The effect of this was to rouse a storm of indignation against the Liberals and the government all over Lower Austria. The City Council was roused, too, to stubbornness, and it again elected Lueger. A second dissolution followed, with a second interregnum and city government by the imperial commissioner. In May, 1896, a further extension of the franchise brought new victories to the United Christians, both in Vienna and the Lower Austrian province. Lueger was again chosen Burgomaster with ninety-six votes; but Liberalism had influence still and the emperor this time requested him, as a proof of his loyalty, to resign in the interests of good order, which he did at once, exchanging places with the first Vice-Burgomaster Strobach. On the voluntary withdrawal of the latter immediately after the brilliant victory of Lueger's party, now definitely called the Christian Socialists, in the elections to the Reichsrath in 1897, he was elected Burgomaster of Vienna for the fifth time and the emperor could not but consent. Vienna went wild with joy; the city was illuminated and decorated; the man of the people had at last taken up the reins of government for the people against their oppressors. Lueger's re-election followed in 1903 and 1909, the term being six years. In the last election all but thirty of the one hundred and fifty councillors voted for Lueger, the thirty turning in blank ballots.

In the Tail of Halley's Comet

Observations of the positions of Halley's comet have by this time been sufficiently numerous and far enough apart in time to warrant a pretty accurate computation of its transit across the face of the sun on May 18. The need for this delay is obvious to anyone conversant with celestial mechanics, since all the members of our solar system gravitate not only to the sun, but also to one another, and are, in consequence, made to deviate from the simple curves they would describe if this mutual gravitation did not exist. This deviation is called perturbation or disturbance, and is only a name, since it by no means connotes disorder or defect. The only possible method of computing an orbit is to suppose as a first approximation that it is a true conic, such as an ellipse, parabola or hyperbola, and then to compute the deviations from this curve caused by the attractions of neighboring bodies. This deviation is always inversely proportional to a body's mass, so that the light asteroids and comets may at times suffer such enormous perturbations as to have their orbits changed essentially; from members of our solar system they may be made outlaws or the reverse. It was a gigantic task, therefore, to compute the perturbations undergone by Halley's comet during the last seventy-four years of its invisibility. To the honor of the English astronomers, Cowell and Crommelin, be it said that they performed this task so well that when the comet was first found by Wolff of Heidelberg on September 11, the actual place differed from the computed one by only about eight minutes of arc, that is, about one-fourth of the apparent diameter of the moon.

The editors of Popular Astronomy, finding that their computed ephemeris of Halley's comet was only eight seconds of arc in error on a selected date, venture in their April issue upon predicting the details of the transit of the comet across the sun. They say the comet will pass between four and five minutes north of the sun's centre, the sun's diameter being nearly thirty-two minutes. The comet will enter upon the sun's disk at about 9:50 P. M. central time, and leave it at about 10:48, being, therefore, not quite an hour in transit.

This transit will not be visible anywhere in the United States. The sun sets at Omaha on that day at 7:34, central time, and at 9:49 central time, for the extreme north end of our Pacific coast line, so that we just miss seeing the transit.

"Observers on the islands of the Pacific Ocean," says Popular Astronomy, "will have the rare opportunity of studying the appearance of the head of a great comet as projected upon the face of the sun and seen from a distance of only fifteen millions of miles. If there are any solid or semi-solid masses as large as ten miles in diameter in the head of the comet, they ought to show as black dots against the sun. According to Professor Barnard's measurements, given in our last number, the entire head of the comet ought to completely cover the sun, but probably most of it is so tenuous and transparent that it will not materially hinder the solar light.

"We, in the United States, shall have the rare privilege of seeing a comet's tail sweep close by us, if we do not actually pass through a portion of it. The earth will have passed the node of the comet's orbit about an hour before the time of conjunction, so that we shall not pass through the axis of the straighter conoids of the comet's tail, but shall only graze the outer parts. The broader-bent conoids will be so far behind the radius prolonged from the sun through the comet's nucleus, that we shall probably miss them altogether, but shall, if the weather be clear, see them sweep slowly across the northern sky. Whether they will stretch entirely across the heavens remains to be seen. On the morning of May 18 the tail of the comet should extend from the eastern horizon towards the west. On the evening of May 19 it should extend from the western horizon towards the east."

While the comet's head occupies only an hour in transiting the sun, the earth will probably be in its tail for several hours, because the cross section of the tail sometimes increases at an enormous rate the farther it is taken from the head. So that at 15,000,000 miles' distance, while the earth moves about 70,000 miles an hour in one direction and the comet's tail with about the same speed in the opposite direction, thus giving the tail a relative speed of about 150,000 miles an hour, even in our non-axial transit the tail may be wide enough where we cross it to envelop us for several hours.

The danger to be apprehended by our passage through the tail is absolutely nothing. That the head of a comet may be a solid body as large as the earth, and that the earth and the moon have in past ages been struck by many and large bodies, are at best only theories, and even when accepted as facts are not to the point, since the head of Halley's comet will never come within 10,000,000 miles of the earth. That the tail is composed of cyanogen gas is another harmless scarecrow, since its tenuity will render harmless its poisonous character. For the consolation of the timorous let us add that Providence allows us to be in the tail for the least possible time, since Halley's is the only large comet that has a decided retrograde motion so that its tail and the earth meet with the sum of their speeds. In a total eclipse of the sun, however, the sun, the moon and the earth's surface all move in the same direction and thus prolong our enjoyment of the spectacle.

Astronomers are all delighted at the most exceptional privilege of passing through the tail of the comet. It is very likely that no effect at all will be perceptible. The moon will be more than nine days' old, that is, somewhat more than half-full, and will set very late at night, not far from 3 o'clock in the morning, so that probably even the possible faint luminosity of the sky caused by the matter in the tail will be overpowered by the moonlight. That we shall then have a shower of shooting stars, as is said to have happened at other close approaches of comets, is no longer expected by astronomers with the same assurance as before. At all events, the whole world, professional and unprofessional alike, is on tiptoe to see what will happen.

Failure of Reformatories

Hard-heartedness, indifference or disappointed expectations may account for the bitterness with which correctional institutions are taxed with failure to justify the disbursements for their maintenance. No one can deny the frequency with which they are reproached, nor can anyone pronounce their work uniformly successful. The radical difficulty seems to be that there is no generally recognized method tested by time and proved by experience which may be effectively applied to the delinquent classes for their reformation. Fads have had their sway and hobbies have been ridden to the limit of endurance, yet penologists still seem to agree only on the end to be obtained and to disagree hopelessly on the means to obtain it.

It is a simple matter to map out in the privacy of the directors' meeting what promises to be a successful plan of action, but so many conflicting elements may make their disconcerting appearance at every stage of the treatment that the work can never be reduced to the simplicity of a chemical formula. Certain plants do not respond readily to the intelligence and skill of the horticulturist; some animals surpass others even of the same species in docility or refractoriness. Given, then, greater cunning in some delinquents and the play of free will in them all, uniformly satisfactory results can not fairly be expected.

The Rev. P. J. Dunne, of St. Louis, whose work among street waifs has been so singularly successful, maintains that there are "no bad boys," and that a little mischief-maker, if rightly cared for, will develop into a self-respecting and respected citizen. Our persuasion is that, at the outset, a boy judges his misdemeanors too severely and exaggerates their gravity; then comes excessive reserve with his parents or protectors, for he fears that he may be harshly dealt with or despised; later, remorse and shame give way to increasing boldness, and the result is a young daredevil who glories in his misdeeds. A mistaken notion of manliness or bravery which might have been corrected in the boy becomes the keynote of the life of the young man who finds in crime that excitement and danger which he covets. And thus the boy who was not "bad" grows up to be a common law-breaker who is really bad.

So many boys still in the formative stage reach correctional institutions that the problem of weaning them from their waywardness is assuming grave proportions. It is altogether too frequent an occurrence that a life which began with petty mischief in boyhood goes on through the industrial school and the reformatory until by successive evolutions it reaches its final development in the state penitentiary. How to prevent this undesirable process, how to check the onward course to felony as a profession, is the gigantic task of the sociologist. And we are forced to admit that thus far the work is largely tentative, for the evil is increasing in spite of all efforts to control it. We think, however, that there are some causes of disappointment and failure which should be more effectually guarded against.

The first of these is recourse to the "herding" system, with no attempt to classify delinquents according to their attainments and limitations. This blundering system is a wretched survivor of that piece of inhumanity which, a generation ago, locked up the boy who stole rides with the man who stole silverware. We think that Judge Lindsey scored his first great success in reform work when he succeeded in stopping that detestable practice in Denver.

The several hundred boys in one institution must necessarily at the outset vary widely in development, responsiveness and age, yet association together will tend to reduce all very speedily, not to a happy mean but to the lowest level of conduct. Over such a throng a couple of guards may preserve outward order, but how can they be more than mere herders of cattle? What possible chance have they to exercise an elevating influence over charges with whom they can hardly become acquainted? Such a system is one of repression, not of guidance. It may secure a time-serving outward observance of rule, but it cannot develop manliness, honor, conscience.

No matter how well disposed or how badly disposed a boy may be, he is at best but a contingent contribution to the good of the nation. He is in process of formation. Of the same clay the hardened criminal and the patriot are formed. The surest pledge that he will be an honor to his country is to be found in the trust and confidence that he puts in his natural protectors or those who take their place. The boy that has a worthy adviser whom he trusts is safeguarded as no other boy can be. But this supposes intimate acquaintance and personal interest.

Although careless or criminal parents or the lack of a home may be the first disposing cause that entangles the young evildoer in the meshes of the law, it is a cruelty to the boy to pamper and coddle him and act as if his detention were an unjustifiable act of oppression. Who does not see that such treatment embitters him against the law which he has disregarded? It incites him to take vengeance as soon as he is at liberty to act. Early environment and example over which he had no control may explain why he has reached the bridewell, but he must realize that the State has a right and a duty to protect its citizens in a condition of affairs that may have arisen from the State's earlier indifference, ignorance or remissness. When the boy is punished literally for the sins of his parents, in which his share consists in doing their bidding, it is hard to see the justice of the punishment. Two or three urchins up State were recently committed for stealing. Their parents, who had sent them out to steal, went unpunished. Had the boys disobeyed, their backs might have felt the full weight of parental displeasure. Therefore, they stole. The parents deserved the jail sentence which the children received.

The monotony of "nothing to do" is demoralizing to any boys; the evil is aggravated when there is question of boys who have passed through the courts. The warden of a reformatory once admitted that a holiday which meant a "day of rest" spent chiefly in the cells, was the sure forerunner of disturbance. Rest which means enforced bodily idleness or inactivity lures the brain to action.

A home, if in any fair way it answers to the name, is better than any institution for properly training the young. When the home falls far short of what it ought to be, it is the State's turn to attempt the creation of a home, for the most conscientious work of enlightened philanthropists can do no more than produce an imitation of that shrine of affection, deference and loving sacrifice. Even where the home is largely what the name implies, a youngster may develop a wayward bent for which it is hard to find an explanation. Atavism or microbes may be learnedly pointed out as the cause, but our persuasion is that, oftener than not, doting, credulous, over-indulgent parents ought to get the blame.

Many of us have seen the fond mother's distress when it is shown to her that her angel child has played truant or filched or run the risk of blistering his tongue with his talk. Even such boys may be called to share the insistent hospitality of a correctional institution, where they may learn that an orderly life at home is preferable to the schedule of a reformatory. And here the parole system comes to the boy's help. After a detention of some months, if his conduct has proven satisfactory he is released from detention but kept under observation. Where kindness and firmness combined have endeavored to impress upon him that whoever abuses the comforts and privileges of home may find himself justly deprived of them, but that he may regain them if he so wills, there is a prospect of lasting benefit by his temporary retirement from public view.

Where correctional treatment is confined to exacting mere outward conformity to rule, the system is likely to develop a band of precious hypocrites, for a method that does not affect the conscience is fit only for training or taming beasts. We hold with Father Dunne that if a boy's mentality is not affected, his "badness" is like an eclipse, a passing phase, from which the charity of Christ can bring him forth resplendent. If at times the eclipse passes into permanent obscurity, we think that no friendly aid was extended when aid might have availed.

Again the Deluge

Professor Hilprecht of the University of Pennsylvania has just issued a new fragment of the Babylonian story of the deluge ("Earliest Version of the Babylonian Deluge Story," Philadelphia, 1910). He has toiled at a tablet unearthed by the University of Pennsylvania Expedition to Nippur, and by dint of toil and conjecture has set forth the following fragmentary account of the deluge:

"(I declare unto) thee (that confines of heaven and earth) I will loosen (a deluge I will make, and) it shall sweep away all men together (but thou seek) life before the deluge cometh forth; (for to all living beings), as many as are, I will bring overthrow, destruction, annihilation . . . Build a great ship and . . . total height shall be its structure. It shall be a houseboat carrying what has been saved of life . . . With a strong deck cover it. (The ship) which thou shalt make (into it) bring the beasts of the field, the birds of heaven, (and the creeping things, two of everything) instead of a number . . . and the family."

The conjectures of Professor Hilprecht are within brackets. If we omit these conjectures, there is very little left to the document. That little will be of use in the scientific study of the Babylonian story of the deluge. Will the new find strengthen the argument either of the Panbabylonian or of the traditional exegetes? Professor Hilprecht, with his wonted and imprudent enthusiasm, claims that the new account "agrees most remarkably with the Biblical story in very essential details both as to contents and language" (p. 59). The agreement is not worth considering seriously, unless the U. of P. document is earlier than other extant Babylonian deluge stories. Professor Hilprecht says it dates about 2000 B.C. Only a careful epigraphical study of the inscription will settle this mooted question; meanwhile Assyriologists doubt, as the professor's reputation for scientific accuracy and self-restraint is not famous.

The Babylonian story of the flood has long been known to us through the account of the Egyptian priest, Berosus—an account which reached us in fragments by the Greek writers, Eusebius, Alexander Polyhistor and Abydenus. Only these fragments of Berosus told the story until, on December 3, 1872, George Smith read before the Biblical Archeological Society in London a translation of some Akkadian cuneiform tablets, which had been found in the Library of Ashurbanipal in the palace at Ninive, and were then among the treasures of the British Museum. These tablets are the 11th part of the famous Gilgamesh Epic; they tell the Babylonian story of the flood. This story shows signs of great age. The inscriptions which Smith deciphered date at least 660 B.C. They give a narrative very much more complete than that of Berosus. Most important details are added. The flood is sent because of man's sin; the ship is coated outside and inside with bitumen; a dove, a swallow and a raven are sent out to test the condition of the earth after the flood. A third Babylonian account of the flood is contained in some cuneiform tablets first published by Father Scheil and now owned by J. Pierpont Morgan. They add no new details but prove that the story was current as early as the eleventh year of the reign of King Ammisaduga of Babylon—i. e., about 1773 B.C. Since even these very ancient cuneiform inscriptions are only copies of more ancient accounts, scholars admit that the Babylonian story of the flood was in existence at least 3000 B.C.

Rationalists and almost all Protestant scholars deem that the Biblical narrative of the flood was derived from the Babylonian or some such non-inspired writing or oral account. Some few Catholic writers have gone the way of Panbabylonianism in this matter. Father Gigot writes: "There is the more probable theory that the early Hebrews derived the history of the flood from Babylonia" (Special Introduction to the Study of the Old Testament, I, 177). The well-nigh universal Catholic opinion is contrary to this theory. The two narratives have, in very truth, a common source but not that source which the rationalists make claim for—i. e., Babylon or Egypt or North Arabia. The common source of the Biblical and of all other narratives of the flood is the tradition that began with Noe. This tradition had the lot common to all folk-lore; it was changed and changed according to conditions of folk and place. Hence we find the flood-tradition in Babylon and elsewhere is marred by the grotesque and by defects inherent in the people and their ways. The only form of the tradition that is conserved from the absurdities and grotesquenesses common to folk-lore is the Biblical form. The flood-tradition was, by the power of the Most High, specially conserved among the chosen people. The story probably was handed down among the Israelites with some variations and was written in various forms. Moses, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, had these various forms of pre-Mosaic tradition collated and co-ordinated and put together into one form. This one form we find in the Mosaic redaction of the Pentateuch.

This theory explains very readily all difficulties that puzzle the rationalists. At first it was easy enough for them to say that the Hebrew story of the Bible was taken over from Babylon. Then the Hebrew story was readily divided into various parts which were assigned to imaginary writers: during the seventh century B.C., J. and P. wrote their stories; later JP came and added his share; finally R edited all and gave us the present Biblical narrative of the flood in postexilic times. All this was easily worked out. Then some one discovered that, if there had been any "editing" of the flood-story, it must have been done before 3000 B.C. For in the Babylonian story, we have J, P, JP and R elements all set together 3000 years before Christ and 2500 years before the R of the rationalists was supposed to have done his editing.

The discovery was stunning in its effect. The rationalists shifted ground. They admitted that the redaction had been done in Babylon 3000 B.C., but postulated that J took only a part of this Babylonian story, P took his part, JP his and R put the three (or according to Bissel and Kautsch, the eight) different parts together into one story—the Biblical story of Genesis. This makeshift of the rationalists is a very poor device and only shows the weakness of the fabric of fancy that they build up. The pity is that any Catholics leave the strong position which has been traditionally held by the exegetes of the Church and take up this very weak, illogical and ephemeral position of the rationalists and Protestants in the matter of Pentateuchal criticism.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

China's Oldest Christian Monument

The Gallery of Antiquities in the Metropolitan Museum, New York, has, within the last year, been enriched by the addition of the facsimile of an epigraphic monument which is of the deepest interest in the history of the development of Christianity in the Old World. It is a reproduction, engraved on marble, of the famous inscription of Si-ngan-fu, the most ancient Christian monument known to exist in China. The inscription was discovered as long ago as 1621, but it is only within the last twenty years that the controversy that has often been raised during almost three hundred years has come to an end with the authenticity of the inscription now universally admitted. The original was engraved in 781.

It relates how the monk, Olopen, with several companions, arrived in China in 635 from Ta Ts'in, which is understood to indicate the Roman Empire, and brought with him the books of his religion, which he translated into Chinese. The Emperor T'ai Tsung thought highly of the new doctrine, granted permission to preach it, and even gave a public site for a church. The Imperial favor, however, did not save the Christians from persecution, not only by the followers of other sects, but also by the successors of T'ai Tsung, so that it was not until 756 that they obtained permission from the then reigning emperor to build a second church.

The inscription sets forth the principal precepts of Christianity. It tells of the creation of the world, of original sin, of the coming of Moses. It exhorts all Christians to lead pious, upright lives, not to possess slaves nor to give themselves up to the pursuit of riches. The exhortation is signed in Chinese, and in Syriac, with the names of the priests and bishops who were then working in the Celestial Empire.

The importance of the monument can be readily understood. It was first discovered by natives who spoke of it to the Jesuit missionaries then established in China, two of whom, Father Nicholas Trigault and Father Simeo, guided by the original discoverers, made their way to Si-ngan-fu, and saw the inscription for themselves. What was written in Chinese characters they read and understood, but there were other characters with which they were not familiar. Father Fernandez, of the same order, who visited Si-ngan-fu a little later, recognized part of these inscriptions to be in Syriac, and translated it. The discovery aroused much interest in Europe, and Father Kircher published what was intended to be a reproduction of the Syriac text. But not waiting for the explanation of several obscure points, his version was defective, and it was not until 1667 that an exact copy was taken, engraved on leather.

This facsimile met with no little incredulity on the part of non-Catholic missionaries and students, and the numerous enemies of the Jesuits were only too ready to accuse them of deception. In proof of this they produced a European who testified that he had been employed by the Jesuits to cut the original inscription on the so-called discovered stone at Si-ngan-fu, but that as he did not understand Chinese he did not know what he had inscribed. Such an accusation as this could not be left unrefuted, and the Jesuit father, P. Duhr, gave such circumstantial account of the discovery of the stone in his "Jesuiten Fabel" that the calumniators were forced to retract. But apart from Father Duhr's refutation, anti-quarians and Chinese scholars have placed the authenticity of the inscription beyond suspicion.

In 1857 Alexander Wylie was sent by the Oriental Society of the United States to study the inscription. At that time the question was still being discussed, and Neumann, a German Jew, published in the Journal de la Société Orientale Allemande a veritable diatribe against the Jesuits, declaring that the inscription was an invention, and a stupid one at that, as it contradicted all the traditions of Chinese history. He maintained that it was invented so as to gain converts to Catholicism by persuading that most conservative of people, the Chinese of the upper class, that in ancient days Christianity had been preached with the sanction of the Emperor himself, and practised by the highest and most influential persons in the land. That such authorities as Rémusat and de Klaproth had decided in favor of the authenticity of the inscription could only be explained, he said, by the supposition that they had been carried away by their infatuation for the Jesuits.

Alexander Wylie did not allow himself to be influenced by prejudice. After studying the case most minutely, he wrote that if the Nestorian tablet could be proved a forgery there were few existing memorials of bygone ages which could withstand the same style of arguments. Even Renan, who had upheld the falsification theory in the first edition of his "Histoire des sciences Semitiques" had the honesty, in his fourth edition, to retract, adding that the existence of a colony of Nestorians of Syrian extraction, who had settled in China in very early ages, was indisputable.

In 1875 the Russian Archimandrite Palladius, drew attention to the collection of decrees of the Chinese Emperors compiled by the Mandarin Wang-Pou, amongst which there is one that dates back to the year 639, in which the Emperor T'ai Tsung refers to the arrival of the person who is called Olopen in the inscription of Si-ngan-fu, and praises the doctrine that this stranger teaches. This was a final proof that could not be disputed, and Father Heller, in an article in the German review of Catholic theology, disposed of the remaining, and very secondary objections that were still raised. One of these objections, put forward in a letter to the London Times in 1886, was that the inscription must in some way or other owe its existence to the Jesuits, as there was mention in it of the doctrine of Purgatory.

A very strong argument for the truth of the discovery is that the Chinese themselves had never doubted the testimony of the monument, or questioned its authenticity, and Professor Legge of Oxford, who within the last few years has published a version of the original text, remarks that the inscription of Si-ngan-fu is to be found amongst the collection of Chinese inscriptions officially published in China in 1905.

It has therefore been made absolutely clear that a colony of Christians, probably Nestorians, did settle in China thirteen hundred years ago, and that for a century and a half, and probably longer, they taught the doctrines of Christianity. This explains the symbols and customs that missionaries have come across amongst the Chinese, and that always pointed to some Christian influence that had left its trace upon their pagan form of worship. Now that the first point has been so clearly proved, it is very possible that something further will be discovered of the subsequent history and eventual fate of this colony. In any case the monument remains a most valuable, not to say unique memorial of its time, and the work of the directors of the Metropolitan Museum in procuring an exact replica is most commendable.

The expenses incurred in having the reproduction made must have been very considerable, for the marble block was engraved at Si-ngan-fu itself, and taken on a wagon from the capital of Shen-shi to Shanghai, where it was shipped to New York. The splendid equipment of the scientific explorations that we have sent to Greece, to Egypt, and to Babylon needs no commendation. That the explorers have done their work well is absolutely proved by the collection of antiquities in the Metropolitan Museum.

In Mission Fields

THE CHURCH IN SAMOA.

Bishop Broyer, Vicar Apostolic of the Navigator Archipelago, has furnished some interesting details of his work in Oceania. He belongs to the Society of Mary, a missionary congregation, which now has five vicariates and a prefecture apostolic in that remote and little-known region. The population of the archipelago amounts to 50,000, of which half is found on the largest island, Oupolou, which contains the port of Apia, the most important in Polynesia. The larger islands are of volcanic formation. On the island of Savai there exists the greatest active volcano known. After a rest of about one hundred and fifty years, it began anew five years ago to belch forth fire and lava and the eruption is continuous. The mountain has an altitude of 4,500 feet and is nearly eight miles from the shore. Day and night, three streams of burning lava are flowing down to the sea in such abundance that since the eruption began the island has increased by an area of 1,100 yards square. Owing to the equable climate and the productive soil, four hours of work a week are enough to support a man. The breadfruit tree gives four crops a year, each crop furnishing an adult with wholesome food for six weeks. The fruit, which is about eight inches in diameter, is globular and seedless. It is peeled and sliced, then fried or boiled.

The natives, especially the young, are bright and intelligent, but the balmy climate and their easy ways dispose them to a loose life. Cannibalism disappeared from the islands long ago, but the memory of it remains in certain familiar phrases of their language. The Wesleyan missionaries who entered the field twenty years before the Catholics, tolerate divorce, with the consequent relaxation of morals, for various successive marriage arrangements thus become possible for one individual, while his or her former partners form other temporary alliances.

Burgomaster Lueger's Imposing Funeral

INNSBRUCK, MARCH 25, 1910.

The funeral in Vienna of the late Burgomaster, Dr. Lueger, was princely in character, the most imposing not only of any ever given to a burgomaster of Vienna, but to anyone outside of a royal personage. After a sketch of the dead burgomaster's features had been made by a leading artist and a death-mask taken, the body was embalmed and placed on an immense catafalque in the great Volkshalle of the Rathaus, the scene of so many of Dr. Lueger's triumphs, where it was viewed during the three days previous to the burial by tens of thousands. The hall was heavily draped in black and decorated with flowers sent by the Emperor from his hot-houses at Schönbrunn. The wreaths sent were over a thousand. They came from people of all ranks and nationalities, from the Emperor William of Germany, the Prince Regent of Bavaria, from the Emperor Francis Joseph and the Austrian heir-apparent, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, and ranged down to the simple wreaths of wild-flowers sent by some poor admirers from the "Wienerwald" near Vienna, one of Lueger's favorite recreation spots. These wreaths, of immense size, often requiring three men to carry them, made a beautiful display lining the grand staircase leading up to the Volkshalle, and recalling the dead Burgomaster's great love for flowers. White carnations, the flower of Lueger and the emblem of the Christian Socialist party, of which he was leader, predominated.

The great funeral procession started at noon on Monday, March 14, from the Rathaus. The farewell address of the city was delivered by the first Vice-Burgomaster, Dr. Neumayr. The casket was then blessed. Preceded by delegations of all the city departments, of the Catholic labor and mechanics' organizations, the Catholic student corporations, the sodalities, of the clergy, secular and regular, and flanked on either side by municipal officials, students in full corporation uniform, and lackeys in the quaint medieval costume usual at funerals in Austria, the hearse, drawn by eight coal-black horses, proceeded to the House of Parliament, where the farewell address of the House was made by the President, Dr. Pattai, and that of Lower Austria by the Vice-Landmarshall, Baron Freudenthal. These addresses were all very beautiful and edifying.

Dr. Pattai made a very happy application to Dr. Lueger of a quotation from Sallust: "non divitiis et sumptibus sed virtute et industria cum majoribus contendit." From Parliament the procession moved on to the Cathedral of St. Stephen, where the last absolution was given by the Coadjutor-Archbishop, Dr. Nagl, in the presence of the Emperor and the royal family, the Papal Nuncio and the entire diplomatic corps. From the cathedral the procession made its way to the Central Cemetery, where Dr. Lueger was laid to rest temporarily beside his mother. In accordance with his wish his body will eventually repose in the Central Cemetery in the crypt under the main altar of the great church which is rapidly nearing completion. His mother, father and sisters will be placed beside him. It is estimated that a million people viewed the procession.

Some very edifying incidents of Lueger's last illness have just been made public by those who were with him during the last weeks. In some reminiscences published in the Vienna Reichspost, Dr. Ebenhoch, an intimate political and close personal friend of the deceased, and himself one of the most admirable and outspoken Catholics in Austrian public life, gives striking testimony to Lueger's wonderful patience and confidence in God during his long illness of nearly three and a half years' duration. For a good part of the time, he was nearly totally blind in consequence of an affection of the kidneys, and sought relief in some one or other of the health resorts that abound in the Austrian Alps.

Dr. Ebenhoch relates that when his companions would remark on the beauty of the surrounding landscape, Lueger would exclaim: "You fortunate beings, who can admire God's power in nature! That is denied me now. But His will be praised! He knows why He has brought this blindness upon me!" The picture painted in Ebenhoch's description of the death-bed is beautiful, and it would be difficult indeed to estimate the effect upon the nation, contemplating the great Burgomaster dying with his rosary in his hand, the crucifix and a picture of his patron St. Charles Borromeo above the bed and a statue of Our Lady on the small table beside it, with cabinet ministers, the priest and the nursing sisters kneeling about and answering the prayers for the dying.

The interest of friend and foe alike is at present centred in the question of the future of the Christian Socialist party of which, as the party manifesto just issued puts it, "Lueger was never elected leader, he was the leader." Lueger's political testament, dated February 8, 1907, during his previous serious illness, is brief. It insists on the retention of the anti-dualistic programme of the party in the Hungarian question, on keeping the character of the party as a party, not for any one class, but for all the people, and on the unsullied government of the capital city of the Empire. The wish is further expressed that Dr. Richard Weiskirchner, the present Minister of Commerce for the Empire, shall succeed to the Burgomastership of Vienna.

This last item will strike Americans as somewhat autocratic and as savoring of an absolute form of "machine politics." But it must be remembered that the Christian Socialists control the City Council until the next elections, some four years hence, by a large majority, and that the Common Council elect the Burgomaster from among their number. If Dr. Weiskirchner has no seat in the Council he can be elected from a safe district, perhaps Lueger's old one. Weiskirchner has declared, however, that he cannot accept the post at present until his work in the cabinet is completed. The probability is that the first Vice-Burgomaster, Dr. Neumayr, will be elected locum tenens until the Minister of Commerce is relieved.

It is amusing to behold the efforts of the Liberal and Social Democratic newspapers to make people believe that there is a crisis in the Christian Socialist party, arising out of acute differences of opinion among the leaders. But here it is plain that the wish is father to the thought. The Allgemeiner Tiroler Anzeiger asks amusingly whence this sudden interest in the internal affairs of the party on the part of their enemies, and vigorously bids them to stop meddling in things that do not concern them. They will scarcely heed the injunction, however. The temptation offered by the prospect of a split-up of the Christian Socialists is too great for them to resist, and they must by hook or crook help to bring it about if possible. But the party shows no signs of disintegrating. It is too well organized, and the example of Lueger's last days has infused a new enthusiasm into the organization.

something of the enthusiasm of filial piety. Lueger's last days, too, have undoubtedly done much to win over those Catholics who opposed the party because, as they thought, it did not sufficiently emphasize its Catholicity. Finally, it is a happy omen for the future of the Christian Socialists that they have already selected as leader Prince Alois Liechtenstein, one of Lueger's earliest and truest allies, "a prince," to use Dr. Weiskirchner's words in nominating him, "who has become the servant of the people." The Christian Socialist party, with ninety-six seats in the Reichsrat, is the largest German, as well as the largest party numerically, in that polyglot assemblage. The German Free-Thinkers have eighty members, divided into six groups, the Social Democrats eighty-eight members of six different nationalities. All the Catholics of the crown lands, including the Catholic conservatives, vote with the Christian Socialists, who thus dominate the House. Among the Czechs, Poles, Slovians and Italians, also, strong and growing Christian Socialist groups exist.

Are Catholics Asleep in Spain?

MANRESA, SPAIN, EASTER, 1910.

The third Sunday of February ushered in some meetings of great significance against the "godless schools." Fearing to tire your readers with repetitions, I shall but mention the names of some and confine myself to the first one of the series, that of Valencia, which was, as it were, the keynote of those held later in Valladolid, Madrid, Zaragoza, Vich, Bilbao. In the one last named, the bad element came to make trouble, but soon found out, to their discomfort, that the Catholics had come fully prepared not only to speak but also to act, if circumstances should require it.

The meeting of Valencia was held on February 20. It was, indeed, an orderly and, at the same time, an enthusiastic manifestation of protest against the "Ferrer schools." The spacious grounds of the athletic field, called "Jai-Alai," were literally packed. A conservative estimate puts the crowd at twenty thousand. There were to be seen not only the common people, but also men of the highest social grades—Senators, Congressmen, provincial deputies, members of various city councils, university professors and leaders of social action.

The session was opened with the reading of the cablegram from the Holy Father. Next came the letters of the Cardinal Primate of Spain and of the Archbishop of Valencia; finally the letters of concurrence of nearly the whole Spanish Episcopate. The remaining declarations of adhesion on the part of three hundred thousand could only be summarily announced. A portion of them may be classified as following: 83 municipal governments, 135 mayors, 272 townships, 429 local centres, 104 different associations.

Ten orators of national fame held the vast throng spellbound, many of these speakers, be it known, occupying leading positions in the present Catholic life of the nation.

The closing resolutions ran as following:

"The meeting of Valencia voicing the wishes of the religious, economical and educational institutions, of the Senators, congressmen, deputies and members of city councils, both present and adhering, adopts by acclamation the following resolutions:

1st. That according to Art. 11 of the Constitution, Art. 2 of the Concordat, and Arts. 167, 295, 296 of the Law of Public Instruction of 1857, as yet in operation, all primary teaching, both in public and private schools, is illegal wherein it is at variance with the Catholic Religion and Christian Morality.

2nd. That the public officials be obliged to comply faithfully with what was enacted by the Royal Decree and supplementary Circulars inserted in the Gazeta of 4th inst. regarding the schools, wherein Christian morality, the Country and the Laws thereof are attacked, namely, that such schools, if reopened, be closed, and if still closed, remain so indefinitely.

The aforesaid resolutions were forwarded to the Government, accompanied by a multitude of cards of protest from the ladies of the land. Before the meeting was brought to a close, it discussed some practical plans for the opening of up-to-date schools in each parish under the supervision of competent boards, headed, of course, by the parish priests and their prelate. The night-school for the workmen is to open the list.

In face of the remarkable opposition aroused against these schools the government remains silent. However, the movement is not lost; it is drawing Catholics closer together and is teaching them practical methods of union and organization. At the same time, it is giving the Government a stern warning that any attempt at Church persecution will cause a situation which may easily lead to armed resistance. For a guarantee of future Catholic action in Spain one could not ask for a more encouraging sign than the universality and enthusiasm of the present Catholic movement against the lay schools. In the number of its meetings and in its splendid organization it has already surpassed the great Catholic movement of 1906, which defeated the Association Law and caused the downfall of the Liberal Government.

For more than a month Spanish Catholics have been watching the new Liberal Ministry to learn what might be expected from Sr. Canalejas and his colleagues. As far as one can judge at present writing, the new cabinet seems to be stronger than the Moret government and, unless some unforeseen incident should occur, may be expected to remain undisturbed in power for no short period of time. Canalejas, guided by his well-known ambition to be President of the Ministry, and aware that the weak Moret Cabinet failed to win respect because of its too friendly attitude towards the dangerous revolutionary forces, is now directing all his energy to preserve order and thus gain the confidence of the more respectable element among the Liberals. Strange as it may seem, Catholics, though aware of Canalejas' extreme, or Waldeck-Rousseau ideas, are more content with the new cabinet than with that of Moret. The reason lies in the fact that Canalejas, though a more dangerous foe, has broken away from the lawless Republicans and Socialists and by so doing has made the battle in Spain between the Church and irreligion a matter to be decided by future legislation and not by street riots and violence.

Whether or not he will continue this policy only the future can tell, for he may soon have need of the turbulent Republican forces in his plan of legislation against the Church. In the approaching general election it is more than probable that the new Ministry, even unaided by the Republican element, will easily win a majority in the Cortes. In Spain "the Government always wins." General elections cannot be taken as a sign of public sentiment. Promises of leniency towards towns whose taxes are in arrears, or threats of demand for instant payment of accrued town debts if the Government deputies are not supported, are methods which are added to the more common "election schemes" familiar in the United States. Granting that Canalejas wins his expected majority, his battle against the Church is far from won. Spain is not yet prepared for advanced French anti-Catholic legislation. Canalejas himself realizes this clearly.

In a recent interview, referring to his anti-clerical policy, as published in France by L'Humanité, the President of the Ministry stated that the report in L'Humanité of his plan to introduce the French anti-clerical programme into Spain was correct, but that the plan must be taken as his "ideal" and not as his "immediate policy," for, he added, "to introduce the ideal policy into Spain would require fifty years of government." This fact is easily explained. First, Catholic sentiment is strong in Spain; again, the more respectable group in the Liberal party is adverse to brutal French methods of Church persecution. However, there is a battle ahead for the Church in Spain. Whether or not it is to come with the opening of the Cortes will depend upon the outcome of the expected elections.

The Rafaëlsverein at Antwerp

Belgium has never known a great migratory movement such as those common to most countries in Europe. Neither the government nor private enterprise had ever encouraged it until King Albert changed the plan of the Ecole mondiale, founded by Leopold II, to prepare students for a career abroad, into an Ecole coloniale to furnish colonists for the Congo. A part of the funds not needed for the Ecole will be used in pensioning ex-officials of the Congo. Belgians have not yet responded to the call for emigrants for the Congo, and Belgian families are badly needed there.

Yet Belgian emigration in general has increased in the last ten years. In 1897 emigrants to the number of 923 left Antwerp, while in 1907 the number had increased to 6,423. With the increase in number measures to protect and equip emigrants have multiplied pari passu owing to the efforts of the Société belge de St. Raphaël. This society informs intending emigrants of chances of success in the different countries, aids them before and after their departure, and has representatives, both priests and laymen, in Canada, the United States, Brazil, Argentina, Chile, Australia and England.

Though the number of Belgian emigrants is comparatively small, Antwerp is a general port of embarkation for all the nations. Since 1897, when the number of foreigners embarking at Antwerp was 15,793, the figures have increased annually until in 1907 they were 121,247. Though these emigrants remain in the city but a short time the dangers of soul and body which confront them are not a few. They are an easy prey for swindlers and "friends" who, unless the emigrants are on their guard, rid them of their scanty savings or plunge them into vice during the exciting and bewildering hours before sailing.

In 1882, when the number of German emigrants sailing from Antwerp was very large, Father Alexander de Ascheburg, a German Jesuit, interested himself in them and laid the first foundation of a work in their behalf. Father Ernest Torleberg, S.J., succeeded him, and with the aid of the Antwerp section of the "Rafaëlsverein" which he directed, devoted himself untiringly for twenty-six years to this noble work. At his death, a little over a year ago, Father Anthony Wunsch, S.J., took up the work, which he at present directs. Its plan is simple. The delegates of the "Rafaëlsverein" meet the emigrants on their arrival in the city, conduct them to respectable lodgings, change their money and look after their passage; in a word, they do everything to protect them from false friends and fraud by guarding their material and moral interests. Since 1887, religious services have been organized for the emigrants, thus to draw down the blessings and consolations of heaven upon them at the moment of their departure. The evening before sailing they are gathered into the Church of St. Ignatius, attached to the Institute of Higher Commerce directed by the Society of Jesus, where an instruction is given them in their own language. A great number go to confession. Catechisms, prayer-books, religious tracts, rosaries, scapulars and other objects of piety are distributed.

For the year 1907 there were 152 of these religious services, attended by 18,572 emigrants assembled by the zealous delegates of the Rafaëlsverein. The nationalities represented and their numbers were as follows: Poles, 12,977; Germans, Austrians and Hungarians speaking German, 1,173; Hungarians, 7,235; Slavs and Bohemians, 510; Russians, Ruthenians, Lithuanians, Croats and Servians, 2,635. Besides there were a few Italians and some Belgians. Confessions were heard in Polish, Russian and German; printed instructions in seven different languages were distributed, as well as cards of recommendation to the delegates of the Rafaëlsverein across the sea. Since 1887 more than 200,000 emigrants have assisted at the religious services held for their benefit in St. Ignatius' Church.

Lenten Missions in Munich

MUNICH, MARCH 24, 1910.

The Lent just closing brought ample evidence that Munich is a loyally Catholic city, despite the assemblies of Monists and Freethinkers that flourish here. The city's special lenten services began with a great mission preached by the Redemptorist Fathers in the newly-restored Church of the Holy Trinity. Thrice daily, from February 27 to March 6, immense congregations gathered and listened with eager attention to the eloquent discourses of the missionaries. Following close upon the successful ending of the mission a series of lenten conferences was opened in each of the seventeen parish churches of the city. Secular priests, Jesuits, Dominicans, Capuchins and Franciscans shared the heavy burden of this work, and the great throngs which filled the different churches at each conference, attested the signal interest aroused by the speakers.

The conferences were given during the week March 13 to March 20, and while all classes and conditions among the Catholics of Bavaria's capital city were well represented, it was men especially who made up the great audiences. The success of this lenten course is accepted by all here as a notable manifestation of Catholic faith and a sturdy protest on the part of Catholics against the growing activity of the atheistic propaganda. The exercises closing the conferences were singularly impressive, even the most spacious churches being crowded. Church and lay dignitaries and members of the royal family lent their presence to the solemn pomp. Thrilling was the scene as the thousands gathered in the churches proclaimed their purpose to stand firm in their faith and to persevere in loyalty to their Church.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Our Second Year

With this issue of AMERICA begins its second year. Reviewing the work of the year just closed, the editors see no reason for altering their program as formulated in the first number, April 17, 1909. Now that this Review has been successfully established, the Rev. John J. Wynne will retire from the board of editors. In future he will devote himself exclusively to the editorial work of "The Catholic Encyclopedia." During the past two years he has had to carry the double burden of this work and of planning and directing the publication of AMERICA, and it was feared that his health would be unequal to the strain.

A Socialist Mayor

The election of a Socialist, running on a Socialistic ticket, as Mayor of Milwaukee, is regarded with misgivings by conservative persons all over the country. Whilst admitting considerable significance in the fact that one of the largest cities in the Union should thus deliberately register its choice at the polls, we are disinclined to see in this Socialistic victory either the sinister sign or the glorious inaugural that is read into it as one happens to be hostile or friendly to the Socialist cause. The people of Milwaukee seem to have had grounds for serious dissatisfaction with the two dominant political parties in their municipal government. Their choice of a Socialist for their Mayor was more an expression of their disapproval of local political machines than of their approval of Socialism. As Henry James would say, their love of Socialism is simply an allotropic form of their temporary dislike for Democrats and Republicans. The chastisement having been inflicted and its purposes fulfilled, the Socialists will shrink to their normal proportions at the next election.

But the incident carries a lesson with it. Socialism takes advantage of popular discontent with existing evils to offer fair and effective remedies. On these it lays most stress; its irreligion and denial of the individual's rights and all its pernicious theories built on human envy and whitened over with a plausible and ostentatious charity—these Socialism keeps for the time being in the background. Let corrupt statesmen and venal politicians and unprincipled and heartless commercialism continue to trade with the rights of the public and to ignore the law and to escape its penalties and, it is the dream of the Socialists,—and not altogether a dream—the voters of the country will swallow their remedies at last. The strength of the Socialists lies in the political corruption and commercial greed of their adversaries. It is almost useless to fight them with pamphlets. This is a case where example is better than precept. The ordinary citizen has a sort of pragmatical philosophy. If he is convinced that existing conditions are intolerable he will seek others more promising; and to reach the light, even though it be a will o' the wisp, he will resolutely trample down logic and argument.

Carl Lueger and the Press

In another column we present to our readers a sketch of the late burgomaster of Vienna, Carl Lueger. His career as a practical reformer in the region of municipal politics is perhaps without a parallel in modern times. He found Vienna a dark, disagreeable, second-rate Continental city, honey-combed with corruption and the prey of capitalistic jobbery. He left it at his death a model municipality, the rival of Paris, the delight of tourists and the boast of all Austrians.

The ordinary American never so much as heard of Lueger before his death the other day. This is all the stranger to us because if anything has occupied and retained the seats of publicity during the last ten years it is the question of municipal reform. Our popular periodicals have worried us with "the shame of the cities," and they have sent forth their enterprising young reporters to scour all climes and ages for remedies and model communities. But of Carl Lueger not a word, illustrated or otherwise!

We do not approve, as a rule, of the suspicious disposition to seek ulterior significances in matters capable of obvious interpretations. But is it mean to wonder momentarily whether the blindness of our public press to the unique achievements of Lueger was due just a little bit to the fact that he was a Catholic? The Anglo-Saxon has had to go so often to despised Catholic countries for his reforms of various kinds that we can easily understand a slight reluctance to do so once more in these days of broad views and undogmatic ideals.

Perhaps our suspicion has been confirmed somewhat by the press reports of Lueger's death. Everywhere we read that Carl Lueger, "the well-known anti-Semite," was dead. "Anti-Semite," "Jew-Hater"—all sorts of changes were rung on such epithets as these, and that was all the newspapers could say of him. Lueger was a Jew-hater. But the Jews were the corruptionists of Viennese politics, and to be a Jew-hater, in the case of Lueger, was to be a lover of fair play, popular government and freedom from selfish and capitalistic tyranny. It was manifestly unjust for our papers to use words calculated to represent him to the public mind as a narrow and irresponsible fanatic. Such a conspiracy of silence, on the one hand, and of slanderous insinuation, on the other, suggests more than a mere disinclination to praise whatever is Catholic. It looks as if our sources of European information were controlled by the sinister agencies which Lueger spent his noble life and energy in combating and conquering.

Apportioning Expenditures

The proposal to raise the salaries of our Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court and of the United States Circuit Judges, now before the Congressional Committees on the judiciary, raises the question as to whether we are making a wise apportionment of costs in the public service. To secure an upright and competent judiciary, it is requisite not only to exercise care in appointments but to compensate able jurists for the loss of lucrative practice and enable them to live conformably to their station. An equitable administration of justice is more important to us than a powerful army or navy. There is slight danger from the outside, but distrust of judicial methods and despair of distributive justice may produce menacing perils from within. Our army and navy may not hear the war summons for generations, but the battles of justice, involving life, property and honor, are every day fought in our courts. Wisdom as well as equity requires that every precaution be taken to secure and protect the competency of the arbitrators.

In these matters we seem to have much to learn from England. There judicial decisions are generally held in respect, and it will be consequently pertinent, and perhaps instructive, to compare the salaries of its judges with ours. It is proposed to raise the salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court from $13,000 to $18,000, of his associate justices from $12,500 to $17,500, and of the United States District judges from $6,000 to $9,000. The salary of the Lord Chief Justice of England is $40,000 and of other judges $25,000 each. It should be remembered, too, that the purchase value of money is greater and expense is less in England than with us.

On the other hand, our military expenditures are relatively higher. The supremacy of England's fleet is considered vital to her national safety. There invasion means, or is held to mean, conquest, and hence no outlay necessary to maintain naval superiority would be judged extravagant. With us no one holds that invasion is imminent or that its occurrence would prove disastrous. Yet there is a continual and increasing demand for a greater navy that would seem founded on British rather than American requirements.

In view of our parsimony with regard to judicial expenditures, it would be well to reckon the cost. The British fleet is more than twice the size of ours in number and equipment, yet the British Budget of the present year calls for a naval appropriation of $203,000,000, while the bill now before Congress carries an appropriation of $129,000,000, that is, the English fleet, ship for ship, costs a third less than ours. Moreover, Britain's 130,000 men cost $37,000,000, while ours, less than half that number, cost $32,000,000, or nearly twice as much per man. A navy equal to Great Britain's would, therefore, cost us $300,000,000. It is well to consider whether national pride is worth indulging in such an expensive luxury.

Meanwhile the conduct of our judiciary is indissolubly connected with the peace and order, and therefore the perpetuity, of our national life, and no expense should be spared in providing for and guarding the competency of its administrators.

Socialist Attack on the Centrum

As indicated last week the Socialists in Germany have immediately seized upon the outcome of the recent Electoral Reform debate in the Prussian Landtag to indulge in a heated outbreak against the Centrists. The charge is made that the Centrum was false to the people's cause in the struggle. The organs of the Centrum are not slow to make spirited defence of their party and to urge counter charges against the Socialists. These latter, say the Centrum organs, really cared nothing for reform in itself; they merely used it as a rallying cry to advance their well-known revolutionary schemes. In proof of this, it is affirmed that whilst the Centrum party did all in its power to pass amendments that should improve the Government's franchise bill for Prussia, the Socialists, after offering a ridiculous amendment which no section of the house could approve, made no attempt whatever to better the bill's proposals. The Centrum recognized that in the present condition of party strength the best that might be effected was a compromise which should be a partial advance towards genuine reform; they recognized that not even this compromise would be attainable unless the votes of the Conservative or Government party might be won over; they recognized that failing support for such an amendment by Conservatives, the improved bill would surely be thrown out by the Upper House. And they further contend that this policy made possible the one change for the better that has been effected in the Government's original bill. They refer to the clause providing for secret balloting in the choice of the delegates chosen for the election of members to sit in the Landtag. To the disinterested observer the Centrists have the better of the argument.

It is with very great satisfaction that we quote the following extract from a letter received on the 12th inst. from His Excellency Archbishop Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate to the United States:

"I have read with much pleasure the last number of AMERICA, in which the 'Roosevelt Incident' is so satisfactorily treated. It should be clear from your exposition to anyone not blinded by prejudice that the authorities in the Vatican have acted in this incident in a most courteous and dignified manner. Your extracts from the leading New York papers prove that non-Catholics have truly appreciated the situation and regard the attitude of the Vatican as the only one possible in the circumstances."

An oversight in the article on "Juvenile Delinquency" in our preceding number let pass an unfortunate phrase on illiteracy as a proposed reason for excluding otherwise desirable immigrants. It should have read: "but they have yet to show that literacy and crime are necessarily dissociated."

Somewhere in California there is a sleepy little town called Milpitas. Comparatively few know exactly its situation, but everybody knows its name. For whenever a great question, state or national, is submitted to the people, wise Californians ask each other: "What does Milpitas say?" This they do because there, "where the boldest bluffs hold good," men asseverate that what Milpitas says to-day, the whole country will say to-morrow. Lady Knill, London's Lady Mayoress, wrote lately to the Times announcing for a certain evening a reception at the Mansion House in honor of the Bishops of the Catholic Church who would then be in London for their usual Easter meeting, and inviting the clergy and laity to attend. Next day a manifesto appeared in the same journal formally forbidding the Church of Rome to usurp "the title, place or responsibility of the National Church of England." It was signed by the Bishop of Thetford, suffragan to the Bishop of Norwich. Milpitas has spoken. Let the Pope, the Archbishop of Westminster, the Bishops of England and the Lady Mayoress take notice and prepare for the worst.

The New Orleans Times-Democrat, having published an interview with "General" J. F. Sáenz of the Estrada forces in Nicaragua, in which he asserted that Mexico had furnished the Madriz Government with five hundred thousand pesos and an abundance of artillery and ammunition. The Mexican Daily Record retorts rather pointedly that throughout the disturbances Mexico has observed a becoming neutrality. It has not permitted the embarkation of money and arms for Nicaragua, nor has it allowed Mexican citizens to proceed in large bodies to that country and return bragging about their attempts to overthrow a government with which Mexico is at peace. From the beginning of the trouble Estrada has endeavored to embroil Mexico, accusing her of showing undue sympathy for the legitimate government, but Mexico has not swerved from that strict official propriety which all nations should observe.

A bill was introduced in Congress on March 11 by Representative Douglas, of Ohio, appropriating $20,000 for the erection of a statue in Washington in honor of Januarius Aloysius MacGahan, the well-known correspondent of the London Daily News at Constantinople. It was his descriptions of the atrocities practised on the Bulgarians by the Turks attracted the attention of William E. Gladstone and resulted in England's recognition of Bulgaria's freedom. His work in their behalf won for him the title of "the Liberator of the Bulgarians." MacGahan died in Constantinople in 1878 and in 1884 his body was brought to America at the expense of the United States Government and buried in Ohio, his native State. The Bulgarians honor his memory annually with a requiem Mass in the Cathedral of Tirnova.

The London Times asserts that among the subjects to be discussed at the International Congress of Chambers of Commerce to be held in London next June, is the reduction of the fluctuations of the date of Easter! A Catholic Congress is to be held about the same time. What would be said should it put amongst its agenda: the reductions of the fluctuations of the price of cotton? What is stranger still is, that the questions to be discussed are arranged in Brussels. However, there are Catholics in the Chambers of Commerce, and not a few Israelites, and many Church of England men besides, who will all point out that the occurrence of Easter is not to be regulated by merchants.

Following the recent announcement that it intends to evacuate Somaliland and confine its forces to a few towns on the coast, the British Government has published a Blue Book on Somaliland containing among other interesting items the letters of the "Mad Mullah" of the Soudan, Seyyid Mahomed Abdulla. "I have sent you many letters," he writes, "on the subject of peace and of our looted property and wives, and you did not answer. I do not intend to send any more letters, but I now send this to stop the disturbance between us. If you want peace, as I do, remove your party from Bohotleh and your horses from the Ain Valley and call back your spies. If you do not want peace but only disturbance and fighting then you need not move your party nor spies nor horses. . . . I now inform you, and you are aware, that if we fight again you will lose more men than you lost before, and we pray God for the victory." The interior regions that the British had attempted to occupy cost millions of money and many lives and were found unproductive. The Mullah declined to be made a pensioner and consequently the friendly tribes are to be given rifles and left to their fate.

THE YERKES COLLECTION SALE

Immense interest was shown in the valuable paintings of the Yerkes Collection during the time of their exhibition at the rooms of the American Art Association and at their sale by auction at Mendelssohn Hall. The sale was indeed one of the most important ever held in an American art centre, and the hall packed to the doors, the high and rapid bidding and the electrified audience testified to the appreciation of this fact. The aggregate of one hundred and ninety-eight pictures brought in a total receipt of $1,695,550. The sale took up four evenings. As to the prices paid some were phenomenally high and some phenomenally low. One must allow that a certain amount of intelligent discrimination was manifested with regard to the quality of the pictures but, at the same time, only a vogue in public taste could account for the disproportion of the relative estimates. The Dutch school, ancient and modern, is evidently in the ascendant. The Rembrandts and Hals attained the highest figures; and one would be led to suppose that Hals overtops even Rembrandt. The lowest figures were the measure of the Early Italians. A number of small Dutch interiors went each one for three or four times the sums paid for a Raphael and a Botticelli.

Even the contemporary "Frugal Repast" of Israels fetched $19,500, while the very beautiful "Madonna and Child" of Verrocchio could not elicit a bid above $1,000! Another curious matter was the jumping of Turner's "Rockets and Blue Lights" to $129,000, Alma-Tadema's "Spring" to $22,600, while Burne-Jones' "Princess Chained to the Tree" remained depressingly at $2,000. One can only stand speechless before such vagaries as these. But in the matter of the Dutch paintings, they seem at present to be something of a social fashion.

One realizes the importance of the Yerkes collection when one finds that representatives from London, Berlin, Brussels, Copenhagen and the Hague traveled to New York to be present at its breaking up. Incidentally, very few pictures will go back to Europe, as most of the figures set upon them were prohibitive. Among the American bidders the dealers were most conspicuous and carried off the finest paintings; though there is a large probability that in a number of cases they were acting as agents for persons not named. A fine Annunciation by the Lombard Andrea Solario has the merit of being signed. It brought one of the highest prices for an Italian master, going to Scott and Fowles at $11,300. Guardi's eighteenth century views and scenes of Venice raised the market value of Italian art. The "Grand Canal" (to Mr. Whitney) was whipped up to $20,000, and the other subjects by the same likewise went for prices that would have made the old painter wag his peruke and take his pinch of snuff.

The Flemish School, beginning with Jan van Mabe's "Madonna and Child," and a "Virgin" by Hans Memling, passes on to Teniers the younger with a "Temptation of St. Anthony," the portrait of a Medici princess life-size by Sustermann and culminates in two Rubens. The smaller is a study of a couple of fine old heads and is entitled "Two Apostles"; the large canvas is one of Ruben's prized mythological subjects: "Ixion and Hera." A number of nude forms, clouds, and a lot of vivid and brilliant color go to make up this picture. (Bought by H. Steinmeyer of Cologne, $20,500.) The full-length portrait of the Duke of Nienbourg, said to be a Van Dyck, went for the relatively small sum of $2,500. The Dutch, as we have said, carried the day. Rembrandt's "Portrait of a Rabbi" going to W. W. Seaman for $51,400, and the interesting three-quarter length portrait of Joris de Coulery, who also appears in the master's painting of the civic guard, to Seligman & Co. for $34,500.

"The Philemon and Baucis," so curiously like the "Disciples at Emmaus," in its composition and mode of lighting, brought $32,000. (Scott & Fowles.) Hals' "Portrait of a Woman," the elderly Dutch vrow sitting in her arm-chair with placidly folded hands made quite a commotion before falling to Knoedler & Co. for $137,000. The peaceful and not particularly interesting old lady now holds the record for the highest price ever paid at a picture sale in America. "The Singers," two boys' heads painted with great vivacity and force and touched to life by the powerful brush strokes, were bid up to $33,500. (Seligman & Co.) The two small pieces, "The Singing Girl" and "The Violin Player," went to Edward Brandas for $16,100 each. Peter de Hoogh's intimate and charming "Interior," brought $12,800. (Dowdeswell & Dowdeswell); Jan Steen's "Siesta," a comfortable after-dinner scene in an arbor with a woman resting her head upon the table $10,500 (Kleinberger Galleries); and the admirable "Glass of Lemonade," full of Ter Borch's fine workmanship, $10,300. (Knoedler & Co.) Hobbema's "Ford," to Duveen Bros. for $10,000.

The list of landscapes, interiors and genre subjects would be so long that one must necessarily pass on to other schools. The English present a Reynolds' "Portrait of Lady O'Brien," for which W. W. Seaman, agent, pays $20,200; to our mind, Romney's "Mrs. Ralph Willett," a charming old lady in a filmy cap and russet gown was far more attractive, but it stopped at a cool $6,100. (O. Bernet.) The vivid Harlow "Portrait of a Boy," a young, black-eyed thinker of mischief goes to Knoedler ($3,600.) Lawrence fine interpretation of the fine, nervous profile of Canova (Collier & Co., $8,300) closes the list of likenesses. Then comes Turner, "Rockets and Blue Lights," a rather vague painting of a ship in distress drawing to port, the subject-matter quite subordinate to the iridise-ing of colors that vibrate from the centre of the canvas in waves of pure blue, rose, yellow and subdued green. Duveen Bros. win in close contest, price $129,000. "Grand Canal, Venice," also Turner, $80,000. (W. W. Seaman, agent); "St. Michael's Mount," to the same, $25,000. We have said that Alma-Tadema's "Spring," a classic May-Day procession, full of girl-figures, flowers and glistening marble brought $22,600. (Henry Reinhardt.) Burne-Jones two beautiful companion pictures, the "Princess led to the Dragon," with its lovely white-robed maids and the splendid deep-blues of the soldiers' vesture and armor and that other, "Princess Chained to a Tree," where the esthete and the scholar are felt in every line of the drawing and in every movement of the brush—and also the profound artist, save for one fault—these two canvases brought only $2,000 apiece, but their owners are to be congratulated. Capt. J. P. De La Mar has the first and Mrs. W. Jones the second.

France contributes a number of fine paintings beginning with Boucher, "The Toilet of Venus" (Duveen Bros., $25,500); Watteau's "Fête Champêtre" (Mrs. Chelsea, $19,900), and Greuze's head of a young girl, "Rêverie" (Boussod Valadon, $22,000) on to modern and contemporary art. The Barbizon School is paramount. Corot's two exquisite companion pieces: "Morning," with its delicate greys of pearly sky, pearly water and tremulous foliage, and the "Fisherman," in just the same key of mist and dewiness between the dawn and day, with the man's red cap in both for the note of contrasting color, bring the one (Fisherman, Duveen Bros.) $80,500 and the other (Morning, Howard McCormick, $52,100). Diaz' fine forest scene "Gathering Fagots," goes to Scott & Fowles for $30,100, and the same firm takes Millet's "Pig Killers" at $44,100, and Rousseau's "Paysage du Berry" at $26,100.

Troyon's "Going to Market," a country road, a cart with figures in it and cattle around it, rises to the quite phenomenal figure of $60,500. (Duveen Bros.) Daubigny's "Banks of the Oise, near Anvers" is bid up to $17,500, at which figure Scott & Fowles obtain possession of it, but a number of his landscapes, and very charming ones, go for a good deal less than this, and also several Dubigny's, Dupre's and Rousseau's.

Finally are two portraits which should have been noticed above as they belong to the old art of France. Both come from the one time collection of Horace Walpole at Strawberry Hill, and are small, six by seven inch, panels. The first is an unknown man by François Clouet, a magnificent head, auburn-haired, auburn-bearded, with an air of indomitable will and character. He wears a fur trimmed coat and a black velvet cap. (Knoedler, $4,650.) The second is the likeness of François, Dauphin de Viennois et Duc de Bretagne, son of Francis I, an elongated, rather sad face of a youth in early manhood. His black doublet and the drooping feathers in his cap add to the melancholy of his appearance. Both these panels are gems of workmanship and significant portraiture. The latter is by Claude Corneille. (O. Bernet, agent, $5,000.) G. F. P.

LITERATURE

The Thief of Virtue. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. New York: John Lane Company. Price $1.50.

When one thinks of Mr. Phillpotts one recalls Thomas Hardy. The two invite, nay compel, comparison; and a very good critic has stated that with the exception of Thomas Hardy, Mr. Phillpotts is the foremost English novelist. Both writers contribute little or nothing to the gaiety of nations. They are pessimists because they are paganizers. With the loss of religion, as has so often been pointed out, the light of humor is extinguished.

"The Thief of Virtue" is a long, a sad and a not uninteresting story. It begins with stormy love making. Philip Ouldsbroom, forty years old, suddenly determines to marry. He chooses Unity Crymes, engaged to Henry Birdwood. Ouldsbroom has a farm; Birdwood has nothing. Therefore, Unity, loving Birdwood, marries Ouldsbroom. In the issue, the mother gives birth to a child, which the husband foolishly believes to be his. He carries his belief to the end. Birdwood and Unity alone know better. The story is enlivened by a variety of sicknesses and deathbed scenes. There is screaming comedy or, if you will, farce in the religious dialogues between Ouldsbroom, the pagan, and Twigg, the Baptist.

Throughout the story, Ouldsbroom remains the central figure. He dotes madly on the boy—his boy. Martin, the boy, is religious—according to the pagan idea of religion—that is, he is cold, just, mean, exact, stingy, gloomy, without any sense of humor. Martin is so good that he drives Ouldsbroom to drink. While drunk he causes the death of the wife. This death stops neither the drinking of Philip Ouldsbroom nor the irritating goodness of Martin, his supposed son.

Next, there is another marriage. Martin chooses a spouse after the old man's heart. But the differences of the two grow with the years. Philip Ouldsbroom is not even privileged to live in a fool's paradise. No, he is breaking his heart endeavoring to attain a fool's paradise. He sets all his energies, first, to mould a supposed son; secondly, to get control of a supposed grandson. His life is ugly and broken and wholly ineffectual. The author before ending the book buries everybody in whom the reader may chance to be interested. In description and portrayal of character and development of plot, Mr. Phillpotts is a master. This story will doubtless add to the gloom of the dereligionized reader and appeal strongly to people of a "mortuary turn of mind."

Lost Face. By JACK LONDON. New York: The MacMillan Company.

The title of this book is misleading. "Lost Face" is but one of seven short stories included in the volume. There can be no doubt that Mr. London has caught the art of the short story. While the seven are of varying merit, all show the ear-marks of the genuine short-story writer. Mr. London, throughout, deals with the hardy rascals of the North. The primitive man at war with the elements—the regions of snow and ice—the awful cold in which no man can stand and live—these are the subject-matter of these extraordinary and unusual stories. "To Build a Fire"—the simple tale of a man and his dog in the ineffectual struggle against an atmosphere seventy-five degrees below zero—is a masterpiece. Mr. London may earn for himself the title of "The Kipling of the North." One misses in his tales the note of mercy, of love and of the supernatural. FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

The Life of St. Clare, ascribed to FR. THOMAS OF CELANO, O.F.M. (1255-1261), translated and edited by FR. PASCAL ROBINSON, of the same Order, with an appendix containing the Rule of St. Clare. Philadelphia: The Dolphin Press, 1910. $1.00; by post, $1.08.

Father Pascal Robinson has done his work admirably. His introduction and notes are learned and modest, and his exposition of the reasons for ascribing this Life to Fr. Thomas of Celano satisfactory in every way. We take the liberty, nevertheless, of calling attention to the following, which seems to us not happily expressed: "It may be well to recall that Celano wrote at a time when the tendency to believe that God continually interfered with the course of nature ruled everywhere." We would prefer to say: "at a time when Faith, comprehending the subordination of the natural to the supernatural in the dispensation of Grace, could obtain, according to the eternal counsels of God, those wonders promised it by our Lord, which its decay in our days has made less frequent." This would appear more in harmony with the redemption of the creature (Rom. viii, 21), of which the Church has just been singing:

"Unda manat et cruor:
Terra, pontus, astra, mundus,
Quo lavantur flumine."

Water flows and blood, in which stream the land, the sea, the stars, the world, are washed. Of course we do not mean to insinuate that every miracle set down as happening in the Ages of Faith is authentic. On the other hand, the expression we object to seems to imply that every such record is suspicious. There is a slip in note 162, in which Cardinal Rainaldo Conti is said to have been "afterwards Alexander III," instead of Alexander IV, as note 149 and the index rightly have it.

As the book is published by the Dolphin Press, it is unnecessary to say that in print, paper, binding and price, it deserves the highest commendation. It is an artistic production challenging comparison with the best work of the best publishers.

Tabular Views of Universal History, compiled by GEORGE PALMER PUTNAM, A. M., and continued to date by LYNDY E. JONES and SIMEON STRUNSKY. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Just as its name indicates it sets before the eye and thus associates in the mind the history-making events of the world's life. Let us open the book at the year 1804. The column "Progress of Society" notes the first use of a locomotive steam engine; "U. S. History" gives us the Tripolitan war, the Hamilton-Burr duel and the start of the Lewis and Clark expedition; in "Great Britain," Pitt again becomes premier; in "France," the Duc d'Enghien is shot; in "Germany," we see the final collapse of the Holy Roman Empire; in the column "Elsewhere," war breaks out between Russia and Persia. Thus, in six columns, we have a glance at the world in 1804. This one illustration shows the value of the book as a work or ready reference in historical questions.

LIBRARY NEWS AND NOTES.

What is the public library doing for the Catholic school? This is a matter which concerns Catholic teacher and pupil alike, and is worthy of more attention than has hitherto been bestowed upon it. The single text-book in the school curriculum is passing and the use of many books, especially for supplementary reading by pupils, is becoming more and more prevalent in our system of education. Pupils cannot fairly be called upon to buy many books; those that they use continually from day to day for study and recitation they should own; but books which they need only for partial or occasional use should be supplied to the school. The natural sources of this supply are two: the school board and the public library.

In some large cities the school board furnishes libraries to each school. But not only is the expense of this procedure burdensome and in many cases prohibitive, but the practice is justly open to the criticism that the proper work of the public library is thereby duplicated. The public library is the natural and the appropriate source of supply for books to be used by the public who pay for them. Hence the more usual procedure is for the school or the pupils to buy books needed for daily use, and for the public library to supply books for teachers' and pupils' reading. There are four modes in which this is commonly done. First, by cards issued to the pupils or teachers entitling them to draw books from the public library. This card confers no special privileges upon the holder, who obtains his books from the library building or from the stations or branches like any other card-holder.

The second mode is by the traveling library, which is a collection of fifty or more volumes, selected by the teacher or by the library, and shipped to the school. The books may be used for reference in the school building or may be taken home by the pupils, according to the rule governing the privilege; the traveling library may be retained from three months to a year without change, or it may be returned and another library obtained in the same way.

The third form of school library is the school deposit, a somewhat larger collection, in some cases including several hundred volumes, which is loaned to the school for an indefinite period. The school circulates them among its pupils, keeping a record of statistics of use if requested to do so by the library. The fourth mode of co-operation between library and school is by the school branch of the public library, maintained in the school building. The expense of heat, light, etc., is often borne by the school board, and the attendants and service are furnished by the library.

With this explanation in mind let us consider the replies received by AMERICA to its queries, addressed to sixty-seven American public libraries, asking them, first: "Do you circulate books through Catholic parish schools?" secondly, "If so, is this circulation by means of traveling libraries or otherwise?" Forty-two libraries replied. Twenty of them circulate books through Catholic schools; twenty-two do not. Ten libraries circulate books by means of traveling libraries; eight maintain school deposits; two place books in school rooms for reference use only. A few extracts from the more detailed replies received may be interesting to quote here.

Mr. Edward E. Eggers, librarian of the Carnegie Free Library of Allegheny, Pa., writes that thus far there have been no requests for books from the Catholic schools for Polish, German, Croatian and Bohemian children, but the English-speaking schools are waking up to their opportunities. "Several months ago," he says, "the head teacher of the largest English school was much pleased to hear that a collection of books could be had for the use of her pupils, and upon her request a collection of about 250 books was sent to this school. These books were divided among three classrooms, and the results thus far have been decidedly gratifying; an average of 175 books being loaned for home use this week (February 16, 1910). Since then, the matter has been presented to the rector of another large parish, and he is now engaged in collaboration with his teaching force in the selection of a collection for his school."

Mr. L. M. Clatworthy, librarian of the Dayton (Ohio) Public Library, writes: "We have a school library department which sends small traveling libraries to schoolrooms upon request. So far only one or two Catholic schools have asked for them." From the Los Angeles Public Library Mr. Charles F. Lummis writes: "Teachers in Catholic parochial schools have the same privileges in this library as any of the other teachers. Books are sent out when requested by schools and by colleges; scholars frequently request lists of books on special subjects."

One Eastern library "tried to place deposits in these [i. e. Catholic Schools] and the offer was declined for lack of room." The New York State Library is not a public library in the usual sense of the word; but it is the distributing agency for a large number of traveling libraries, made up in varying form, and sent throughout the State whenever they are asked for. At Omaha "the teachers select books up to the number of pupils in each room. They may be retained all the year."

Mr. William E. Foster, librarian of the Providence Public Library, has taken unusual pains to gather data for AMERICA upon all the points of our interrogations, and we shall have occasion to quote him frequently. In fact, Mr. Foster sent a book of clippings bearing upon the points of interest, and also copies of his Annual Report, Monthly Bulletin, and a handsome volume giving the Proceedings at the Dedication of the Library. Providence circulates through the Catholic schools, "two of which in particular have made very large use of the library. The teachers come or send to the library for books." At St. Louis "traveling libraries are sent to schools, also collections of supplementary readers (30 titles in a set)."

We see, then, that public libraries are supplying books to Catholic schools in cases where such requests have come to them; and presumably this service is acceptable and welcomed by the Catholic school. Some libraries stated that they had never had a request for books from a Catholic school. Is it not time that our Catholic teachers, religious and secular, realize the advantages at their door? The public library has many books that are of use to Catholic teachers and pupils. These books may be obtained upon request, free of charge. Only such books as are called for will be sent. Nothing but books by accredited Catholic authors need be asked for, if only such are desired. Surely there can be little objection to making use of an institution that Catholics pay to support under these circumstances.

Mr. E. Francis Riggs is equipping, at the cost of $10,000, a needed addition to the Riggs' Memorial Library at Georgetown University, which was founded by him under Father Richard's administration, in memory of his father, the late George W. Riggs, and his deceased brother, Thomas Lawrence Riggs, once a student at Georgetown. It is connected with the main library by an ornamental marble staircase. The central reading room of the main library is lighted from the sides and ceiling. The alcoves, affording shelter for 125,000 volumes, are furnished with every appliance for study and consultation. A tablet has been erected by the faculty attesting the devotion with which the founder dedicated his gifts to the memory of his father and brother.

Among the treasures in the library are one hundred volumes printed between the years 1472 and 1520; three manuscripts anterior to the fifteenth century, and others of later periods, together with a number of facsimiles, such as the Duc de Loubat's splendid reproductions, in photochromography, of ancient Aztec manuscripts. There are also notable books embracing galleries of paintings, histories and treatises dealing with art and biographies of the great masters.

In the new extension will be placed shortly the entire division of history—a magnificent collection for those who wish to delve among historical treasures. Authors will find all conveniences and facilities for the most advanced research. One section will be devoted to Maryland colonial history and the history of the District of Columbia. Thus the Riggs' Memorial Library, through the munificence of its patron, E. Francis Riggs, and the scholarly direction of the librarian, Father Henry J. Shandelle, S.J., is rapidly acquiring a world-wide fame. As was intended from its inception, the Georgetown University Library now supplements the Congressional Library with rare books, especially religious works, which are not possible to acquire elsewhere.

EDUCATION

The article, "Education in Cuba," in the current Educational Review, presents a rather striking evidence of the folly of attempting to foist upon a people new systems altogether foreign to its history, inheritance, tradition and genius. The writer gives an interesting account of the efforts made by United States officials, in the days of the protectorate, to introduce American public school ways into Cuba. Popular education was practically unknown in the island until American intervention brought to Cuba her first educational awakening. The Church had done what was possible, but it was not within her power to do more than to encourage the spread of private schools. The expenses of these were met by tuition charges ordinarily quite beyond the means of all save the well-to-do. The first thought of the Americans, when in control of Cuban affairs, was to put the people to school. A complete system, taken from the school laws of the State of Ohio, was established, and under zealous officials put into effective operation throughout Cuba. As might have been expected the new system quickly degenerated when the Americans withdrew from the island. The sudden and violent change was too much for a people little prepared for the intricacies of the system, and, as the writer adds, partisan politics and small graft did much to vitiate its working. His conclusion is: "It will be necessary for Cuba to retrace her course, working out anew for herself her system, and better adapting it to the genius, form of government, and state of advancement of her people." It may be well to note a concession made by the writer, who appears to be well acquainted with educational conditions in Cuba: "We prescribed it [education], in too great quantity in succession to Indian, Negro, Filipino and Cuban, with the same result in every case—the patient's stomach turned."

The same issue sketches a new plan of elementary school work to be tried this year in the schools of Cleveland, Ohio. As the superintendent of schools in that city explains, his purpose is to meet the needs of the exceedingly large percentage of children who terminate their school education with the elementary grades. One fixed course of study will be followed by all children in the first four grades. For the fifth and following grades in the grammar school an option will be allowed between two courses, the one designed for those going on to high school, the other arranged to meet the needs of children looking to early entrance upon life work. Supplementary to this, elementary industrial schools are to be organized as separate centres of instruction. In these will be provided a course of study, half of which is devoted to the more practical portions of the fundamental academic branches, and the other half to industrial studies and activities. The matter of choice in the course thus left open rests with the parent. The experiment in school training which the new plan embodies will no doubt be followed with interest by elementary school men. The question how to give something like complete work to the large number of children who do not pass beyond the elementary grades, has claimed much attention in recent years.

The tendency to make education practical, to regard its result in the individual as "a weapon in the struggles of life," is probably more apparent in America than in any other land. This tendency is due to the demand for young men qualified to take their place in commercial and industrial life, and the fact that not more than five per cent. of pupils entering the public schools afterwards finish high school, is the plea to make the training of school years "worth the while," especially for those who are to enjoy but a limited share of its advantages. No doubt this view inspires recent advocates of vocational teaching in elementary schools. But vocational subjects find their defenders as well even in the case of the training of the five per cent. who go on to high school work. Heretofore secondary schools have been commonly regarded as a preparation for college and university training, and the tendency has been to make their curriculum more and more literary. The article under review would correct this tendency in favor of greater extension of vocational teaching in high schools.

"That our high schools," he says, "are earnestly endeavoring to meet the needs of all, we are certain; that those preparing for college generally are well cared for, we will admit, but that there are great numbers of pupils whose inclinations are towards business and commercial lines, and for whom suitable instruction is not provided, I think no one will deny. These the high schools must serve by giving adequate courses; if not, their usefulness will be minimized and other schools of an industrial and vocational character will come forward to claim the work as theirs."

Paul Bakewell, a well-known Catholic lawyer of St. Louis, has published a reply, entitled "A Plea for Fair Play," to certain misleading statements made in an address to students of the School of Mines and Metallurgy at the School of Mines of the University of Missouri. The speaker was Calvin M. Woodward, Ph.D., LL.D., at the time Dean of the School of Engineering and Architecture of Washington University, St. Louis Mo. The address having been later published under the auspices and at the expense of the State University, Mr. Bakewell naturally assumes that Prof. Woodward's statements contained therein are endorsed by the University of Missouri. We quote Mr. Bakewell's opening paragraph. "Manifestly the purpose of these statements" (he refers to claims made by Mr. Woodward concerning the origin of early Universities) "is to give the confiding, listening student a sketch of alleged early university conditions and in doing so to credit Protestantism with the production of 'early universities' and with the growth of learning. By plain inference, if not by direct statement, the students who heard this address and antecedently knew no better, attentive to this ex cathedra utterance, could not but be prejudiced against that established form of Christianity which existed before Protestantism and which exists to-day, and which is the religion of millions of citizens of the United States and of hundreds of thousands of citizens and taxpayers in the State of Missouri. I shall presently expose the inaccuracies (not to say absurdities) embraced in these opening sentences of Prof. Woodward's lecture; but the questions which I first venture to suggest are these: What right has the University of Missouri, supported as it is by the taxpayers of this state, in any of its branches, by the publication of an address containing such statements, to permit Catholicism to be attacked, at least indirectly, and Protestantism to be favored at the cost of Catholicism?"

The fourth of the series of public lectures given by the Fordham University School of Law, was delivered at the Chamber Music Hall of Carnegie Hall, on April 14th, by the Hon. John J. Delany, formerly Corporation Counsel of the City of New York. Mr. Delany spoke on "Professional Ethics." This was Mr. Delany's second lecture on this subject. The last lecture of this series will be given by the Hon. Charles E. Littlefield, formerly Member of Congress from Maine, who is now practising law in this city, on "The Law in Relation to Labor Unions," on May 12th, at Carnegie Hall.

Dr. James J. Walsh, of Fordham University, is delivering a series of four lectures on Education to the teachers of the Philadelphia parish schools on Saturday afternoons, at the Catholic High School. The last will be on April 23d and the subject "American Catholic Education."

The Rev. Dr. George A. Dougherty was appointed Vice-Rector of the Catholic University at a meeting of the trustees of the institution, held in Washington on April 6. The Rev. Patrick J. Healy was promoted to a full professorship on the Patrick Quinn Chair of Ecclesiastical History, and Mr. Joseph Dunn was made a full professor on the Ancient Order of Hibernians Chair of Celtic Languages and Literature. As a mark of gratitude to Michael Cudahy, Esq., a member of the Board of Trustees and a liberal benefactor of the University, there was created the Michael Cudahy Chair of Mathematics. It was decided to build this summer a central heating, lighting and power plant, with room in the building for the schools of electrical and mechanical engineering. The structure will cost $75,000.

SOCIOLOGY

A few earnest women have inaugurated a movement to establish, in New York City, a non-sectarian home for those suffering from incurable diseases. While some care is taken of the victims of cancer, epilepsy and tuberculosis, it appears that up to the present those suffering from all other incurable diseases are woefully neglected. The founders of the movement are raising a fund which will be the nucleus of a future substantial income, whereby a home outside the city may be maintained for these victims of disease. A sum of money has already been contributed by a few persons interested in the work, and an invitation to cooperate is extended to the charitably disposed.

The society has already been incorporated under the title of the "Foundation Society for Home for Incurables." President, Miss M. E. Walsh, First Vice-President, Miss L. M. Marston; Second Vice-President, Miss A. Stein; Treasurer, Miss A. Pearce; Recording Secretary, Miss M. E. Parlati; Corresponding Secretary, Miss G. S. Cramer. Communications are to be addressed to the Secretary, 280 Broadway, New York.

According to William Sidney Rossiter, a Census official of Washington, the non-Catholic population of New England has not increased for sixty years. In Massachusetts 355 persons in every thousand were recorded as Catholics in the Census of 1906; in Rhode Island there were 400; in Connecticut, 298; New Hampshire, 277. Some of these figures are double those shown sixteen years before. All these States show a practical decline per thousand of total population from 1890 to 1906.

Some time ago the Calumet Juvenile Protective League of Chicago promoted yard gardening as a means of keeping children off the streets. The children took to it at once and last spring found the garden movement in possession of South Chicago. Instruction in the art was given in the schools, and the children put precept into practice in their own back yards. They had enemies to contend with. Cats, chickens and other animals were against them. But perseverance generally won success, so that many a yard formerly foul with garbage became bright with flowers and vines. What is most gratifying is that the fathers and mothers are interested in the work which conduces greatly to physical and not a little to moral cleanliness.

We mentioned lately that a strong agitation had been begun in Australia against the practice of the owners of stations—in America called ranches—of refusing employment to married couples with children. A correspondent of the London Times shows that there is abundant reason for the agitation. He quotes three cases of his own knowledge, one of a couple that had been accepted but who were afterwards refused on account of their child; the second of a thoroughly competent couple whom the best employment offices were unable to place for the same reason; the third of a couple who were discharged on account of the birth of a child. He appeals to the people of England to take the matter up, the more so as many of the station owners live in England.

In view of the increasing movement of immigration into Eastern Oregon, the Rt. Rev. C. J. O'Reilly, Bishop of Baker City, has established a Bureau of Information where homeseekers may obtain information concerning church and school accommodations, Catholic societies and all such phases of Catholic life. This new factor will be instrumental in causing newcomers to settle in well-organized communities and in sections where it is planned to establish regular missions. The Rev. H. A. Campo, of Baker City, is in charge of this bureau.

O Circulo Catholico of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, has undertaken in union with other Catholic organizations a vigorous campaign against the indecent shows which thrive in that city. The attention of the President has been called to these flagrant violations of the penal code, which corrupt the young and give to foreign visitors who chance upon them a wrong notion of Brazilian culture and morals.

There are in London a number of pigeons belonging, according to the popular notion, to the City. A newspaper went against this idea lately, asserting that they belonged to nobody. Delighted to learn this a poor man set to work to catch some to feed his hungry family. He had taken five when a policeman took him and carried him before the Lord Mayor. He raised the question of ownership as his defense and put in clippings from the aforesaid newspaper as evidence. It was agreed that the pigeons had no certain owner. The Lord Mayor, though he represents the city, did not claim them. He therefore told the unfortunate man that he could not be charged with larceny which consists of taking what belongs to another. But the dead pigeons had got into his pockets some way unknown to law, so he must be punished with a fine of five shillings or three days' imprisonment for unlawful possession, which in London seems to be the taking to one's use of what belongs to nobody. Crowner's quest law is not extinct.

Assistant Attorney-General Denison has gone to New Orleans to conduct an inquiry on the part of the Government into the operations of the American Sugar Refining Company in that city. The company has refused to permit an examination of its books, and it is said to be Mr. Denison's purpose to find a way of compelling them to do so.

ECONOMICS

A course of lectures on economic farming, embracing such points as the treatment of different kinds of soil, the diseases of plants and their cure, the destruction of noxious insects, etc., was begun at Columbia University in January, under the direction of George J. Powell, president of the Agricultural Experts' Association. It was thought the attendance would not be above fifty, but already it has reached two hundred. Of these many are farmers, but the larger number are business men, either commuters wishing to make the most of their small properties, or owners of large estates planning some branch of farming for themselves or their sons. Anything that helps to a more productive use of the land is one of the greatest benefits that can be conferred upon the nation to-day.

The warm weather of March this year has been the subject of newspaper comment and of much admiring conversation. But is there any tradition of mid-February, 1842, when the sun struck through open windows as though its rays were concentrated through a burning-glass and Wall Street baked and blistered; when ladies walked in Broadway wearing silk and satin and carrying parasols, and the sight of great blocks of ice carried into barrooms and of huge watermelons displayed for sale was a refreshment in the heat? Was it really so, or was it merely—Dickens? For "American Notes" is our authority, and the great story teller admits the season to have been an unusual one.

The relative value and position of the leading ports in exports for the eight months of the present fiscal year ended March 1, on both Atlantic and Gulf Coasts, were as follows: New York, $422,916,183; Galveston, $147,716,460; New Orleans, $92,241,563; Baltimore, $57,581,913; Savannah, $54,472,354; Philadelphia, $50,370,843; Boston, $47,739,279.

The relative position of the leading ports in exports during the first eight months of the fiscal year 1909 was: New York, $395,898,389; Galveston, $159,788,509; New Orleans, $101,785,273; Philadelphia, $56,959,827; Baltimore, $54,654,568; Boston, $52,768,575; Savannah, $41,207,318.

During the first eight months of the fiscal year 1908 the relative position of the leading ports in exports was: New York, $486,537,590; Galveston, $131,699,790; New Orleans, $121,703,083; Philadelphia, $78,259,538; Boston, $69,677,537; Baltimore, $66,943,189; Savannah, $52,814,093.

The oil fields of Mexico, as far as already known, embrace parts of the states of Vera Cruz, Michoacan and Chihuahua and of the territory of Tepic and nearly the whole state of Chiapas. The Southern Pacific Railway, which uses the crude oil for fuel, consumes 40,000 barrels of Mexican oil daily. Messrs. Hearst and Keene are interested in developing the industry.

The British steamer Pericles, a new twin-screw ship of 11,000 tons, has been lost off Cape Leeuwin, the southwestern extremity of Australia. As usual the captain was a man of singular efficiency, taking a great interest in ocean currents of which he now knows more than he did before. Reports state that the ship struck in fine, clear weather three miles south of the Cape. The captain said he had laid a course to clear the cape by seven miles and a half. It is hardly necessary to add that, according to him, the rock he struck is uncharted. The insurance companies will have to pay two million dollars and perhaps more. Naturally they would like to know why, with the whole southern ocean, of sea room, the efficient captain laid a course to clear Cape Leeuwin by only seven and a half miles. But they have often had to ask similar questions, and have not received much satisfaction.

A remarkably long wireless transmission is announced by the Department of the Navy. The cruiser "Tennessee," five days out from Honolulu, was in connection with Table Bluff, on the California Coast, distant 4,580 miles.

SCIENCE

Civil engineers are not of one mind regarding the value of Brennan's monorail. One writer to the London Times points out that while ordinary tramway rails weigh 130 pounds a yard, that is 260 pounds a yard for the two, the monorail will probably have to be at least 300 pounds a yard. Moreover, as the whole weight is concentrated on that rail, the ties and roadbed will have to be heavier than when the weight is distributed over two rails. He adds that the strain on the roadbed is greater as the speed increases, and dwells on the difficulty the Germans had to keep it in order during the experiments of a few years ago with electric motors, when a speed of 120 miles an hour was attained. Finally, he says that as yet the monorail car has hardly reached a speed of 60 miles an hour, and that were he to design a road for speeds from 150 to 200 miles an hour, he would be more inclined to use three rails, or even four.

The persistent complaints of employees, forced to ply their trade under the light of the so-called Cooper-Hewitt mercury-vapor arc light, have moved scientists to attempt to temper this greenish-blue brilliancy and bring it nearer to ordinary sunlight. The United States Bureau of Standards publication communicates the following as the result of the experiments of Herbert L. Ives:

"For the best results in color rendering, apart from the integral color of the mixture, a large proportion of tungsten light rather than a small might be recommended, because the resultant pinkish character of the white would be less noticed by the eye than the disturbance of the scale of color values which occurs with a deficiency of continuous spectrum background. The behavior of the carbon lamp is similar to the tungsten, although the integral color is too pink to be called a good white."

A new locomotive, designed for the smokeless combustion of bituminous coal, is being tried by two or three railways running out of Chicago. The principle involved consists in coking the coal and consuming first the hydrocarbons expelled as gas and afterwards the coke. The construction involves a large magazine or retort within the firebox. This receives the coal and liberates the gases. When coking is complete the contents are turned into the firebox and a new charge is introduced. Rotary blowers are used to supply the air needed for perfect combustion. Many locomotive engineers doubt whether in practice it will be possible to maintain in these engines the intense heat necessary for the production of steam in the quantity a locomotive demands.

According to the Electrical World, the Colorado Electric Power Company has succeeded in transmitting an energy of 100,000 volts over an altitude of 13,700 feet to a distance of 150 miles through lines exposed not only to wind and snow, but also to excessive sleet. The success is to be attributed to skilful tower construction, and to the use of suspension insulators. The towers are on an average 720 feet apart; their mean height is forty feet. The insulators consist of four suspension disks with a capacity of 25,000 volts each. The results of eight months' operation have shown the system highly satisfactory.

The total output of Tungsten concentrates in the United States for the year just covered was 1,958 tons, as against 671 tons for the year 1908. Of this Boulder County, Colorado, yielded 1,401 tons. This ore was about 60% tungsten trioxide. With the growing demand for the tungsten incandescent lamp the production must grow rapidly.

The Los Angeles aviation meet, held in January last, has resulted in the foundation of the "Los Angeles School for Aerial Research." Californians desire to see this school become the most authoritative purely scientific institution of its kind in the world. A $10,000 laboratory has been offered by the Los Angeles Motor-drome, and numerous involved mathematical problems of air pressure, etc., will form the subject matter of investigation.

A new method of electroplating which dispenses with the plating bath and all expensive sources of electricity, has been developed by A. Rosenberg, a chemist in England. Magnesium finely powdered is mixed with a salt of the plating metal or with the powdered metal itself, and ammonium sulphate. The mixture moistened with water is then spread over surface to be plated. The magnesium, strongly electro-positive, reacting with the moist electrolyte, goes into solution, while the metal is deposited.

Sir William Ramsey is accredited with the statement that the so-called Alpha particles of radium are in reality but a gaseous substance, and that, when emitted by radium, they are possessed of two-thirds of the total energy of the parent. The amount of the gas evolved is directly functional of the mass of radium and is ever being produced. Laboratory experimentation shows that it would take some 1,750 years to reduce radium energy by one-half. The velocity of the ejected Alpha rays he places at 40,000 miles a second.

The German army has adopted a newly-invented bullet of the sharp-nosed type. An expert who witnessed tests with this new missile states that the wound caused is terrible—far worse than that effected with the blunt-nosed type. The danger zone is greatly increased, owing to the flatness of the trajectory, it being estimated that the range of harm is some 900 yards.

Professor Poynting, in a recent lecture before the Midland Institute Scientific Society, offered some astonishing figures concerning the earth's net weight. He placed it as 13 with 24 zeros after it—pounds. The mean density he figures out as 5.493. The latest figures up to these are those of Boys, which are 5.527.

The Bureau of Plant Industry of the United States Department of Agriculture has determined to give the cork-raising industry a thorough test in the United States. Accordingly 2,000 one-year seedlings of cork-oak have been handed over to the department of forestry for experimentation. The experimentation will be carried on in California.

Though most of our large cities bordering the coast have, for years, been utilizing salt water for street sprinkling purposes, the public is generally ignorant of the fact that this method has been shown to be three times as effective as fresh water sprinkling. Such is the conclusion of a series of experimentations along the Pacific coast. It is found that the salt of the water causes the particles of dust to cohere, so eliminating clouds of dust under high wind conditions; also, that the salt, hygroscopic in nature, absorbs the moisture of the night air to deposit it automatically on the ground.

The Navy Department has ordered fleet-collier No. 8, now building, to be engined with Westinghouse turbines and the Melville-MacAlpine reducing gear, both of which have been noticed in this column. Marine engineers will watch with interest the testing of these machines, especially the latter, which, if successful, will increase notably the efficiency of marine turbines.

PERSONAL

The celebrated sculptor of Vienna, Theodore Charlemont, is at work on a memorial soon to be unveiled in Brunn, Austria, in honor of Father Gregor Mendel. On an ornate pedestal, to be erected in the centre of the place facing the Augustinian monastery over which Father Mendel long presided as Prior, a life-size statue of the famed biologist will stand clothed in his religious habit.

The memorial is due to the priest's admirers in the field of scientific research. One hundred and fifty of the world's greatest scientists—Japan and Egypt even find place on the list—signed a call for subscriptions to erect a monument "to this rarely modest and world-famed investigator" within the shadow of his retired monastery in the Moravian capital. It is only since 1900 that the name of Father Mendel, who died in 1884, has filled its proper place in the esteem of men. In that year the Dutch botanist, Hugo de Vries, called attention to the scientific value of a brochure of some forty-four pages, which though published by Father Mendel thirty-five years before, had escaped the notice of scientists through more than a generation. As is now generally admitted it marked a turning point in the critical investigation of biologists. The book details the work done whilst he was Professor of Science in the Brunn Gymnasium, to establish the laws, since known by his name, regarding the principles of heredity discovered by him in his experiments on hybridization in plants.

There has been much discussion in Dublin papers concerning "The Fox Chase," a composition of great variety, which it seems can be rendered with full justice only on Irish pipes. It consists of the gathering of the hunters and hounds, the tallyho, the chase, the death, lamentation and fox-hunters' jig, and is imitative throughout. There are only about seven pipers in Ireland who can render it in its entirety, and one outside of Ireland, Mr. Patrick Tuohy, of New York, who is admitted to be "the world's champion piper." He has a phonograph record of the best version of this famous Irish tune.

Hon. Pietà F. X. Saldanha, a prominent coffee grower and manufacturer of South Canara, in the Madras presidency, has been chosen to represent his province in the General Council of British India. Belonging to a distinguished Catholic family, his selection as the sole representative of the province has caused great rejoicing among his European, Eurasian and Indian fellow Catholics.

His Holiness Pius X has honored Mr. David T. Kenney, of Plainfield, N. J., by appointing him private chamberlain, which is equivalent to a steward of the Papal Household, and Knight of the Cape and Sword. The honor is in recognition of Mr. Kenney's work in the interest of the Catholic Church in the Trenton diocese, and was conferred at the request of Bishop McFaul.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The Cathedral at Rangoon, Burma, has just been consecrated by the Bishop of the diocese, Mgr. Cardot, who was assisted in the consecration of the altars by Mgr. Marcou, of Tonkin, and Mgr. Basle, of Bangalore. It is a beautiful building 261 feet in length with twin steeples rising to a height of 225 feet. It is dedicated under the title of Mary Immaculate. Her statue stands over the chief entrance, and the stained glass windows have for their subjects the types and prophecies of the Old Testament which refer to her. The altars and the pulpit are rich and handsomely carved. Altogether it is one of the most notable churches of the East. The Lieutenant-Governor gave a beautiful example of that religious impartiality which the great ones of the world have been known to allege as their chief title to our affection and respect. Their tremendous dignity obliges them to "Sit as God holding no form of creed

But contemplating all"

and indeed, not merely contemplating, but even patronizing all. Accordingly Sir Herbert White, though he was on the point of setting out with a Buddhist company for Calcutta, to receive from the Viceroy, as we chronicled last week, the sacred relics of Gautama, did not disdain to honor with his presence the consecration of this Christian temple, for which every Catholic should be profoundly grateful.

The Eleventh Annual Meeting of the International Catholic Truth Society was held on March 31, at the offices of the Society, 407 Bergen St., Brooklyn, N. Y. The Rev. William F. McGinnis, D.D., presided. The reports of the various committees and the many letters that have recently been received by the Society show that the advantage of having the Truth Society in touch with Catholic organizations is now generally recognized. The Remaining Department which supplies Catholic magazines, newspapers, etc., to poor families living in isolated places, supplied over 8,000 families with good reading matter, and the pamphlet department has sold and distributed gratis over 140,000 pamphlets during the past year.

In the course of the year the Society has had the gratification of seeing many works of solid merit by Catholic authors placed in the Public Libraries and several text books for the use of Public School pupils were corrected and revised by members of the Society.

Representative Joseph E. Ransdell, of Louisiana, addressed the Catholic Converts' League of Washington at the Catholic University of America, on April 3, and drew statistical comparisons between the number of Catholics in the North Atlantic and the South Atlantic states. "In the North," he said, "twenty-five per cent. of the population is Catholic, and eighteen per cent non-Catholic; while in the South, three per cent is Catholic and thirty-six per cent non-Catholic. In Louisiana thirty-one per cent is Catholic. Many of the non-Catholics are earnest, God-fearing men and women, and it is only from ignorance of the True Faith that they are not found in the Catholic Church." He suggested that the Catholic Converts' League should be made national.

The Most Reverend Donatus Sbarretti, Apostolic Delegate to Canada, arrived in this city in the morning of April 8, on his way to Rome. His Excellency was the guest of the Editor-in-chief of AMERICA during his stay in New York, whence he sailed on the North German Lloyd steamer, "Prinzess Irene," the following morning for Naples via the Azores and Gibraltar through the Mediterranean. He takes with him to the Holy Father the decrees of the First Canadian Plenary Council to submit them for examination and approval. Mgr. Sbarretti is accompanied as far as Rome by the Rev. J. A. Carrière, parish priest of the Most Holy Redeemer, Hull, Que. The Apostolic Delegate, who hopes to return in time for the Montreal Eucharistic Congress next September, expressed his great satisfaction at the complete success of the Quebec Plenary Council and bestowed on the Editor of AMERICA a copy of the Pastoral Letter of the Fathers of this Council just issued.

A press despatch from Rome states that the Pope has ratified the appointments of Dom Vincent Wehrle, O.S.B., abbot of St. Mary's abbey, at Richardson, Neb., as Bishop of Bismarck, N. D.; the Rev. Joseph F. Busch, head of the diocesan missionary band at St. Paul, as Bishop of Lead, S. D., and the Rev. T. Corbett, rector of the cathedral at Duluth, Minn., as Bishop of Crookston, Minn.

Denis Broderick, who died lately in England, left all his property, nearly $200,000, after the death of his wife, to be divided equally between the dioceses of Southwark and Achonry, for the education and maintenance of students for Holy Orders.

The influx of English-speaking Catholics into the San Luis Valley, Colorado, has been so considerable that new congregations are forming in half a dozen towns. At Alamosa, the Americans, who have till now attended Mass in the Mexican church, have bought six lots for church purposes, and hope to have at an early date a church and priest for themselves. It will be their first church with resident priest and regular attendance in the valley. Rev. Stephen Good, S.J., is in charge of the laudable work.

The annual pilgrimage of the diocese of Namur to Lourdes will take place from May 30 to June 7, and will be presided over by the Vicar General, Father Miest. During the pilgrimage the magnificent statues presented by the diocese will be blessed. The preacher on the occasion will be Father Dubar, S.J.

At the house of retreats of Notre Dame du Haut-Mont, near Mouvaux, France, forty-six general retreats, in which 1525 retreatants took part, were given in 1909; besides there were sixty-eight individual retreats.

Plans have been completed for the new St. Patrick's Church, Philadelphia. The corner-stone will come from Armagh, Ireland, and is a gift from his Eminence, Cardinal Logue, Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland. The stone will be hewn from the rock on St. Patrick's Hill, where, tradition says, St. Patrick often preached, and on which now stands St. Patrick's Cathedral at Armagh.

OBITUARY

The death of the Bishop of Antigonish on April 6, removes the oldest member of the Canadian Hierarchy and one whose merit and influence were unique. John Cameron was born at South River, Nova Scotia, February 16, 1826, and was therefore in his eighty-fifth year when he died. Having received his early training in his native district and at a famous grammar school at St. Andrews, he was sent by Bishop MacKinnon to the Propaganda in Rome, where he entered November 12, 1844. He studied ten years in that celebrated college with distinguished success in literature, science and theology, was ordained priest July 26, 1853, and returned home in September, 1854. A few weeks afterward he was put at the head of the new college at Arichat. The following year the college was transferred to Antigonish, and Dr. Cameron became its first president there, calling it the College of St. Francis Xavier, which, under his fostering care, has since developed into the University of St. Francis Xavier's College. While continuing to govern the college, he was appointed parish priest of Antigonish and West River in June, 1855, and, amid his onerous duties, taught the ecclesiastics of the seminary, attached to the college, dogma and scripture for two hours each day. In 1863 he was appointed to the parish of Arichat and labored there until 1870, when he was summoned to Rome as coadjutor Bishop of Arichat. He was consecrated in the chapel of the Propaganda by Cardinal Cullen on May 22. This being the year of the Vatican Council, the Right Rev. C. F. MacKinnon, Bishop of Arichat, was also in Rome; but owing to ill-health, he came back to his diocese before the Council was over, leaving the newly-consecrated Bishop in his stead. Soon, however, the Council was suspended on account of the breaking out of the Franco-Prussian war; but Bishop Cameron did not leave the Eternal City before he witnessed its capture by the invading hordes of Victor Emmanuel.

In 1877, when Bishop MacKinnon resigned, the Right Rev. John Cameron became Bishop of Arichat, and there he continued to live until 1880, when he transferred his residence to Antigonish, to which the see was transferred August 23, 1886.

No bishop in Canada enjoyed more fully than Bishop Cameron the respect and confidence of the Holy See. In May, 1885, he was sent as Papal Delegate to Three Rivers, P. Q., on the subject of the division of the diocese. On assuming the administration of the diocese he found a heavy debt which he paid off in a few years. He collected many thousand dollars for St. Francis Xavier's College, partly to improve the building and partly to form an endowment fund. His social influence was very great, and helped to frame and direct the policy of some of Canada's ablest statesmen.

Bishop Cameron's health was seriously impaired during the First Canadian Plenary Council at Quebec last autumn, and he had to return to Antigonish before its close. The end came rather suddenly in the evening of April 6, when high fever set in, and a few hours afterward, at half past ten o'clock, he calmly breathed his last. This Gaelic-speaking bishop had in his diocese eighty thousand Catholics, of whom forty-five thousand descended from ancestors evicted from the Scottish Highlands, speak Gaelic, as do sixty of his 104 priests who, with the laity, mourn their very great loss.

The death of the Right Rev. Mgr. Corbishley, President of the Ushaw College, Durham, England, occurred on March 25. Joseph Corbishley was born in London, May 30, 1851, and was sent early to Ushaw College. After taking his B. A. degree at the University of London he was appointed to teach classics at Ushaw. Three years later he commenced his studies in theology and was ordained August 15, 1875. For a time he was professor of mathematics and then of science, and when Bishop Wilkinson became President of the College in 1890, was chosen by the latter as vice-President in which position Mgr. Corbishley performed the most important duties of his life work. As years went and collegiate work became difficult for the aged President the labors and responsibility of the vice-Presidency increased in proportion. It was in recognition of Father Corbishley's administrative work that he was appointed a Domestic Prelate to Pope Leo XIII, in December, 1896. On the death of Bishop Wilkinson, Mgr. Corbishley continued to govern the College and eventually, in June, 1909, became its President. The London Tablet declares his loss to be a very serious one for Ushaw.

The Very Reverend Alexander McIsaac, late of Mount St. Vincent, Halifax, died March 28, at the age of ninety. He was the first native of Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, who became a priest. Several other Island boys had entered upon ecclesiastical studies before Alexander McIsaac, but death or misfortune overtook them all in their student stage. This gave rise to a tradition among the pioneers of Cape Breton that no one born on this island could become a priest. When Father McIsaac was ordained by Archbishop Walsh in November, 1845, he broke the imaginary spell. Since then, one single county of the four counties of Cape Breton, Inverness, has produced forty priests, a bishop and an archbishop. The late Canon McIsaac, who had been more than sixty-four years a priest, was remarkable for self-denial, earnest and continuous work for souls, cheerful and profound piety and heroism in the typhus fever epidemic of 1847 and the Asiatic cholera of 1851 and 1866. When the Nova Scotia government offered him a grant of money for his services to the sick and dying, he, who had hardly a change of clothing, gently but firmly refused to accept any material compensation for what to him was a labor of love.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

"The Winter's Tale," The New Theatre.—An Elizabethan presentation of Shakespeare's play far surpassing anything in the classical repertory yet offered by The New Theatre Company. The program stated that the play was produced "after the manner of Shakespeare's time." But this must be taken with some qualifications. The mechanical devices and elaborate costuming, which are at the service of the New Theatre, were scarcely available for an Elizabethan stage. Howbeit in matters of detail the essential character of the presentation of a play in Shakespeare's day was preserved and proved highly effective in rendering Shakespeare according to his text, which is rarely done now-a-days, and in setting forth the integrity of his drama, an innovation upon the present tradition of the stage, which has not hesitated to mutilate and transpose without scruple in order to accommodate Shakespeare to modern histrionic conditions. The result was a clear conception, on the part of the auditor, of the continuity and logical movement of the play, and, therefore, a proper appreciation of Shakespeare's art.

"The Palace of Truth," The Garden Theatre.—The Ben Greet players gave an admirable and successful revival of this fairy tale comedy of Gilbert, little known to the theatre-goers of this generation. The company is well balanced and intelligently trained.

"All the Comforts of Home."—The Georgetown University Dramatic Association deserve praise for their recent rendition of Gillette's comedy. In spite of the fact that the play as originally given was somewhat altered by the elimination of all the female characters, none of the essence of its fun was lost. A large and appreciative audience welcomed and greeted the performers in this, their first appearance in New York. The proceeds of the performance are to be given to the fund for the erection of a statue in Washington to Archbishop John Carroll.

CHARLES McDUGALL.

H. E. Krehbiel gives to the readers of the New York Tribune a judicious bit of serious comment on the "Elektra" of Richard Strauss, produced at the Manhattan Opera House. Following the accepted standards of art the critic places the "Elektra" among those artistic abortions which fortunately pass quietly away. Nearly every one of the elements which make the old opera or the modern lyric drama attractive is wanting in this new operatic miracle or rather monstrosity. We give here the concluding paragraph of the criticism:

"The noise of the explosion of 'Elektra' is over. How long will the reverberations last? Until public curiosity is satisfied. Not a moment longer. That has been the story of Richard Strauss' operas from the beginning. Each is looked forward to with the expectation that it will provide a sensation, a new thrill. The sensation having been felt, the thrill experienced, there is an end of the matter. Such art works are not like jealousy, 'which doth make the meat it feeds on.' Interest burns itself out speedily because it finds no healthy nourishment in them; nothing to warm the emotions, exalt the mind, permanently to charm the senses, awaken the desire for frequent companionship or foster a taste like that created by a contemplation of the true, the beautiful and the good. Pathological subjects belong to the field of scientific knowledge—not to that of art. A visit to a madhouse or an infirmary may be undertaken once to gratify curiosity; esthetic pleasure can never come from frequent contemplation of mental and moral abnormalities or physical monstrosities. No pleasure can accrue to lovers of beauty from the fact that there is harmony between such dramas as 'Salome' and 'Elektra' and the musical investiture which Richard Strauss has given to them. Taste for the plays is likely to be paired with taste for the music; and the reason is that the taste, like the things which it approves, is unhealthy. Curiosity is easily satisfied; the taste for truly beautiful things grows with its gratification, and though it changes its ideas, it changes them slowly and never departs wholly from its fundamental principles. Even with the deplorable tendency of to-day toward nervous degeneracy, with all its sorrowful consequences, there is no need to fear that neurasthenia will overwhelm all forms of art, or even dramatic music, speedily. Mozart and Beethoven have not yet been dethroned, and the banishment of their music to the limbo of forgotten things is not imminent."

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

"Strange that New York has no memorial to this remarkable man," says Richard Spillane, writing for the Press on Thomas Dongan, the Catholic Governor of Colonial New York. "No statue, no street, no avenue, no circle recalls him or his work. But what does it matter so long as the eternal hills (the Dongan Hills of Staten Island) that front the sea and first meet the gaze of the immigrant straining his eyes for a glimpse of the land of promise as he nears the gateway of the Western World bear his name, or so long as the Dongan Charter, written in ink which, it seems, never will fade and on parchment which, it seems, never will wither, rests in its metal case among the city's most valued treasures?"

The seminarists of the diocese of Tübingen have published a report of their success in promoting good reading in 1909. They secured fifty-eight subscriptions to Catholic dailies and eighteen to Catholic reviews. They distributed 18,670 copies of daily papers, 4,590 copies of other periodicals, and 3,050 circulars. Lastly, 3,400 good works were performed for the furtherance of the interests of the Catholic press.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Apostolic Delegation,
United States of America,
Washington, D.C., April 11, 1910.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A year ago the first appearance of AMERICA inspired great hopes that a new era for Catholic journalism had begun in the United States. Those hopes have been amply justified. The need was felt for a paper that would have the confidence of the Catholic public, and command as well the respect of those outside the Church. AMERICA by its literary excellence, by its scholarly and temperate tone, by the able manner in which topics of current and permanent interest are treated, has won for itself universal respect and admiration. As an exponent of Catholic truth it has dissipated many prejudices, and brought non-Catholics to a better appreciation of the Church's position, and at the same time has been highly instructive and edifying to our Catholic people.

I am confident that under the able direction of its editors, AMERICA will maintain in the years to come the high standard it has reached, and that as it grows older it will not belie the fair promise of its youth.

With earnest prayers for your continued success, I remain,

Yours sincerely in Christ,

D. FALCONIO,

Apostolic Delegate.

ONE CONVERT'S REASONS.

The following letter was written by a convert who, in his community, occupies a very prominent position, both socially and professionally, and is noted for his literary attainments.

My dear friend: Our talk this afternoon has greatly impressed me, especially your solemnity of manner in stating your conviction of the truth of the cardinal doctrines of Christianity. A man's soul so prepared, when free from prejudice, is the good soil in which the seed of revealed truth must eventually take root to bring forth fruit to the glory of our Creator. This, after all, is that for which we are put upon this earth—to faithfully serve God here in order to gain His eternal benediction and reward. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him."

I do not agree with you as to the future of the soul, but believe that as the body has but one death, so the separated soul has but one life which begins at the moment of death, when it faces its Judge and hears its doom for all eternity.

There are heresies from which you and

I would shrink in horror, but which may nevertheless be made by Scripture to appear plausible, when interpreted in accordance with man's fallible judgment. You must admit that Christ did not come into this world to create confusion of belief.

He prayed for unity among His disciples. His prayer must have been answered. He founded a Church and said: He would be with it always, even unto the end of the world. He said other sheep He had which were not of this fold, but there eventually should be one fold and one Shepherd.

Scripture tells us to hear the Church. What Church? The Church we are to hear must speak with one voice, teach one unvarying doctrine, must be as visible as a city set upon a hill. I looked in vain for any Church that answered to this description until I found that a Church had existed in the world for four hundred years, before the Canon of Scripture was officially promulgated as such. By whom? All Protestants admit that this was done by the Bishop of Rome, and I found that he was the successor of Peter, whom Christ made the Rock of the Church, and for whom He prayed that his faith should not fail so that he might strengthen that of his brethren.

I began to believe that the Church could not exist unless built upon the Rock against which the gates of hell shall not prevail, and that all other churches are but houses built upon the sand, which, when the floods come, shall fall. The divisions of Christendom are caused by the floods of diversity of opinion, all due to private interpretation of Holy Scripture, which requires an infallible interpreter just as your will, if obscure, may need the interpretation of a court, and, as we know, the Constitution, when questions arise under it, requires the interpretation of the Supreme Court.

So you will see that I cannot agree with you as to authority. If there is one subject that demands authoritative treatment it is that upon which our eternal salvation depends, for we are told that unless we become as little children we shall in nowise enter the Kingdom of Heaven. If to deny temporal authority is anarchy, the rejection of spiritual authority is rebellion against the infinite—to deny that we are spiritual beings, that we are possessed of a soul—for the soul is not of the temporal but of the spiritual world.

These were in part the thoughts that led me into the Catholic Church before I had read a Catholic book or consulted a Catholic priest. Since I came into the Church these views have grown into my life as positive convictions, and I can truly say with the blind man in the gospel to whom sight was restored that whereas I was blind, now I see.

CHRONICLE

Taking the Census.—On April 15, an army of 70,000 interrogators, men and women, began the task of numbering Uncle Sam's children in preparation for the thirteenth census. The enumeration will cover all the States and two territories of the Union proper and also Hawaii and Porto Rico. Alaska, the Philippine Islands and Guam will not be included as other arrangements have been made for those dependencies. Under the statutes governing the work, the entire enumeration must be completed within a month; in the cities the work is limited to fifteen days. It is expected that some of the returns from the cities will be received by the last week of June though the exact population of the entire country will not be determined before September.

Progress on Panama Canal.—The Canal Record announces that the entire excavation as contemplated in the original Panama Canal project has been completed. Under that plan, which was approved by Congress at the beginning of the American occupation, 103,795,000 cubic yards of earth were to be removed. But later, in order to let through warships of the Dreadnought type and the giant liners under construction, the War Department ordered the widening and deepening of the cut. These changes involve the removal of about 70,000,000 additional yards of material and that is all of the work of excavation that remains. The record of achievement is without precedent in engineering undertakings. As excavation did not begin in earnest until 1907, the bulk of the work for which nine years were given has been accomplished in three and a quarter years. Last month 3,067,479 cubic yards of material were taken out, and this in face of the heaviest rains ever known on the isthmus in March. In 1908, 37,116,735 cubic yards were removed, in 1909 35,096,166, making the total for the two years 72,212,901, a monthly average for the entire period of over 3,000,000 cubic yards.

Kitchener in America.—Lord Kitchener, commander of the British forces in the department of the Mediterranean, and the Far East, arrived in San Francisco from Tahiti on April 6. He has been making a tour of inspection in Australasia and is on his way to England. In a communication to the British consul-general, Lord Kitchener expressed the desire to be received as a private citizen. In Australia he organized a citizen army on a basis of universal service; all able bodied men of suitable age are to be regularly drilled and equipped, so as to be ready for effective service at any time. In addition he arranged a regular army on a peace footing of 80,000 men, besides advocating the establishment of a military college similar to West Point.

Lord Kitchener was the guest of the Superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point on April 16. The coming of the famous British army officer was an event in the history of the institution, and he received every opportunity to inspect it in detail. On Monday evening the British general attended a dinner in his honor given by the Pilgrim Society at the Waldorf-Astoria. There were five hundred guests on the occasion. The Hon.

Joseph H. Choate presided and the speakers included Ambassador Bryce, Mayor Gaynor, Secretary Meyer of the Navy, President Butler of Columbia and Patrick Francis Murphy. Lord Kitchener sailed for England on Wednesday.

Governor Pardons Col. Cooper.—The tragedy in Nashville, Tenn., on November 9, 1908, which resulted in the killing of former United States Senator Carmack of Tennessee by Col. Duncan B. Cooper and his son, Robin Cooper, was vividly recalled by the action of Gov. Patterson granting a pardon to Col. Cooper directly after the sentence of twenty years' imprisonment, imposed upon the latter, had been confirmed by the Supreme Court of Tennessee. Colonel Cooper is the close personal and political friend of Governor Patterson, who is the leader of the Anti-Prohibition forces in Tennessee. Senator Carmack was the chief of the Prohibition movement. Patterson was an important witness for the defense at the trial of the Coopers for the killing of Carmack.

The action of the executive is generally regarded as having been prompted alike by friendship and by prejudice, as a wanton abuse of his prerogative and an example of defying the courts which may have serious consequences.

Quebec Pulpwood.—On the 12th inst., Premier Gouin announced in the Quebec House of Assembly that his government had decided to prohibit the exportation of all pulpwood cut on crown lands before it was manufactured in Canada. When the Premier was asked when this prohibition would come into effect, he replied that an order-in-council would be issued during this session of the Legislature. Though the understanding had hitherto been that the prohibitory Quebec act would not take effect until September 1, Premier Gouin's announcement did not come as a surprise to the Federal authorities in Ottawa, but it gave rise to considerable speculation as to the exact effect it will have on the United States' duty. At present, owing to the remission of 25 cents per cord upon crown lands pulpwood manufactured in Quebec, paper made from such pulpwood is taxed $6.10 per ton upon entering the United States, while Ontario paper pays only $5.75 per ton. In New York Mr. John Norris, chairman of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, said last week: "The announcement by the Quebec Premier precipitates a serious situation in the paper trade and tends to embarrass many paper mills which have supplies of pulpwood cut but not yet delivered in the United States." A few influential American newspapers have proclaimed that this Quebec prohibition is a distinct reversal of the recent Canadian tariff agreement. But Senator Root, of New York, when interviewed several days after the prohibition had been severely criticized, merely remarked that, while along the border of the two countries there is a strong sentiment for reciprocity in natural products, everyone feels that the time has passed for reciprocity in manufactured products.

News from Great Britain.—A widespread belief that the king's health is unsatisfactory is denied absolutely by his physicians from Biarritz, where he is staying.—Mr. H. Benn, member for Greenwich introduced into Parliament a resolution in favor of Tariff Reform. The Nationalists abstained from voting and the Government majority against it was only 33.—The Asquith Peers resolutions passed the House of Commons in committee of the whole by majorities ranging from 105 to 111. Mr. William O'Brien and his followers were absent. Mr. Asquith attempted to make immediately his statement as to the course he would pursue if the Lords rejected the resolutions. Mr. Balfour protested that this would cut off the Opposition's opportunity to criticize and was sustained by the chairman of committees. Mr. Asquith's statement was made therefore on motion to adjourn. He said that if the Lords refused the resolutions he would advise the Crown as to the steps to be taken to give them statutory effect. Should he fail in this he would either resign or dissolve Parliament, but he would not dissolve except under conditions securing to the new parliament the power of carrying the judgment of the people into law. Mr. Balfour followed concluding his speech by saying that the Premier had bought the Irish vote for his Budget at the price of the dignity of his office and of the great traditions of which he was the guardian. During all the proceedings the House was in a tumultuous state.

Irish Questions.—Interest was divided during the week between the proceedings in Parliament and the decision of the National University on the position of Gaelic in its curriculum. Mr. Redmond had stated at Tipperary that his experience made him suspicious of all English parties in their dealings with Ireland, and hence his insistence on a definite course of action from which there could be no retreat. The Budget and every other question were subsidiary to Home Rule, which the dominance of the Lords prevented the Liberal party from enacting; therefore, unless the Government insisted, according to their pledges, on guarantees that would eliminate that dominance, and in default thereof, go to the country, Ireland could not support them. That matter settled, satisfactory adjustment of the Budget could be easily arranged. The consequent compliance of Mr. Asquith with the Irish party's demands has strengthened its already strong position and put a damper on Mr. O'Brien's new All-For-Ireland League. Mr. O'Brien's main contention at his inaugural meeting was that the party was dominated by the secret society of Hibernians, "a kind of Catholic Orangeism." It was pointed out that Lord Castletown, his chief speaker, is the grand master of Irish Freemasonry, and that another speaker was the secretary of the Orange Society.—Some twenty members of Parliament, several prominent clergymen and numerous representatives of the County Councils, Gaelic Leagues and other bodies, have declared insufficient the National University Board's decision, to make Irish necessary for graduation but not for matriculation. Its requirement for matriculation, it is contended, is essential, as that would stimulate the study of Gaelic in the primary and secondary schools which are all ambitious to prepare students for the university and win its scholarships. The protest seems partially due to a misunderstanding of the Board of Studies' resolution, of which the exact terms have not yet been published. AMERICA is informed by private advices that the decree requires every student after 1912 to qualify in Irish either at his matriculation or during his first college year. The Senate will finally pass on the matter in May.

Australia.—The Government of Victoria will issue no more coal mining leases at present. The Premier gives as the reason the necessity of coal to the life of a civilized community. He says that the State alone requires now 1,250,000 tons a year, of which over 300,000 tons are for State railways. He will ask power from Parliament to sell coal at actual cost for domestic use and local manufactures.—The elections in South Australia have given the Labor party a majority of two.

Indian Sedition.—The Calcutta Police Bill which gives the Police Commissioner power to forbid summarily any public meeting or procession he holds to be dangerous, has passed the Bengal Legislative Council by 36 votes to 5.—The Kal, a notoriously seditious sheet of the Deccan has suspended publication, being unable to make the guarantee deposit required by the Press Act.—A warrant is out for the arrest of the well-known Arabindo Ghose for seditious writing in his newspaper, Karmayogin. Mr. Ghose is supposed to be in the Himalayas doing yoga, that is, in English, making a spiritual retreat. Natives report having seen him last at Agra, disguised as a mendicant. His friends say he will surrender.

Egyptian Nationalism.—The arrangements between the Egyptian Government and the Suez Canal Company for a renewal of lease has been rejected by the General Assembly. The company had agreed in October, as chronicled in AMERICA, to share the profits with the Egyptian Government on the expiration of the present lease and admit three government representatives on their board. The Nationalists raised an agitation against the compact. The Canal being in Egyptian territory, its profits should accrue to Egypt alone, which would be under no obligations to the European company once its lease had expired. The Khedive found it prudent to announce in February that he would submit the question to the National Assembly, which is only a consultative body but has been using this question to acquire legislative powers. The agitation was at its height when Mr. Roosevelt, on March 28, delivered before the Egyptian University the famous address which implied Egyptian unfitness for self-government. Ten days later, April 7, the General Assembly rejected the Government's proposals by 66 to 1, whereupon crowds paraded the streets of Cairo shouting: "Down with Roosevelt." As the Government undertook to abide by the decision of the Assembly, the renewal of the Canal lease is permanently rejected.

French Socialists Active.—The French Socialists are preparing to celebrate the first of May, their annual labor feast, by noise, disorder and violent speeches. This year the holiday will come just one week after the general election of the 24th inst. During the last few days the Socialists have put forth new pretensions. They now demand that all offences committed during the brawls caused by strikes shall be judged not as ordinary delinquencies but as simple political misdemeanors entailing neither suspension of civic rights nor exclusion from certain towns or districts. Each day witnesses in Paris long and tumultuous processions of Socialists. On Saturday, the 16th inst., three thousand navvies carried in triumph on a litter covered with red hunting one of their comrades who had just come out of jail, but who had been forbidden to appear in Paris for five years, and they openly defied the police to arrest him, affirming that all the workmen of Paris would prevent his arrest. A long calico streamer carried by the paraders, bore the inscription, "At your peril try to arrest our comrade." This attitude of the Socialists is causing general uneasiness throughout France. The regular recurrence of strikes is inflicting enormous losses on the country. One after the other the great English and German companies are forsaking Marseilles for Genoa, owing to the frequency of strikes in the great French port.

Electoral Campaign in France.—The Catholics are continuing an active campaign for the return of Deputies favorable to the Church. Archbishop Amette, of Paris, has issued a letter urging the faithful to vote for the men who will support "morality, justice and religious liberty." Although the law, by denying to women the right to vote, inferentially bars them from office, a score of women, led by Mesdames Durand and Pelletier, have proclaimed their candidacy for the Chamber. These women thus hope to attract enough attention to secure a discussion of the suffrage question in the new Parliament and pave the way for attaining the right to vote in civic and subsequently in national elections. They say that they can muster eighty thousand supporters in France. They demand equal salary for work equal to that of men, hygienic schoolhouses and hospitals and the abrogation of that part of the Civil Code which exacts of wives obedience to their husbands. Mme. Durand, who is opposing Georges Berry in the Ninth Arrondissement of the Seine, recently placed a male idiot on the platform, sarcastically pointing out that he had a right to vote and that she had not. The unified or most radical Socialists have a candidate in every district in France and are fighting desperately to increase their present membership of fifty in the Chamber.

Shrewd Policy of Germany.—The Kaiser has given new evidence of the shrewd policy actuating his government in its effort to extend Germany's influence and to win commercial advantage in South America. Expressing a personal interest in the Buenos Aires forthcoming international exhibition, designed as a celebration of the centennial anniversary of the founding of the Argentine Republic, Emperor William has designated Gen. von der Goltz, a foremost diplomat and Germany's greatest living military strategist, as his personal representative at its opening. This action, following the arrangements made by the German Government for an official representation and for one of the most elaborate displays of German manufactures ever shown at a foreign exhibition, will be rightly interpreted by Argentina as a recognition of its progress and power by one of the greatest nations of the world. Of course, German prestige and trade advantage will be increased by this winning policy the nation has learned to play so successfully.

Questions before Austria's Reichsrath.—A very serious situation confronts the Imperial Reichsrath on reassembling this week following the Easter holidays. It is necessary that the factions, which have made the present parliament helpless, come together, and that a working majority be assured which shall be large enough to settle the urgent questions pressing upon its members. All-important among these is a finance program to meet a threatening situation. The deficit in imperial administration already amounts to more than 60,000,000 Kronen and it is imperative that a further deficit be avoided. At least equally urgent is the question of the finances of the provinces, since even the most progressive lands of the Empire, Bohemia, Moravia and Silesia, are on the verge of bankruptcy and, if one excepts Lower Austria, none of the Crown lands are in a satisfactory condition. So desperate appears the state of affairs that it seems the present revenue of all these lands will not be sufficient to meet the demands for salaries of officials and teachers or for the necessary expenditure for hospitals, asylums and other State institutions, whilst all public works have been suspended. The problem of the bond issue of 80,000,000 Kronen is, too, a matter touching the great interests of the Empire. This issue is needed because of the expenses incurred in the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina and remissness concerning it might argue disloyalty to the fatherland. The apparent peace which ruled between Germans and Slavs just before the Easter recess meant little; the rumblings of discontent following its announcement boded ill for its permanency. A stronger pact is required so that necessary business may be transacted by the Reichsrath. The existing condition practically imports a test of constitutionalism itself. If the needed legislation by parliamentary process be not enacted owing to the impossibility of peace between the present factions, not this parliament merely may be doomed, but parliamentarianism itself may see its end in Austria.

Prospects of the Khuen-Hedevary Cabinet.—As noted in the Chronicle, the reaction following the brutal attack upon the Hungarian Premier, which led to the dissolution of parliament by royal decree, has inspired his followers to build high hopes on the coming elections. A correspondent mentions two other reasons which indicate that the Premier's prospects are bright. The members of the recently-dissolved Constitutional Party, under their old leader, Andrássy, are working zealously for the interests of Graf Khuen-Hedevary, and the Catholic People's Party, which is daily growing in numbers and influence, is apparently favorably disposed in his regard since the appointment of Graf Zichy as Minister of Worship in his Cabinet. The new Minister of Worship is not a leader of the Catholic Party, but he is one of the most influential Catholics in political life to-day. He is reputed to be close to the Emperor and he evidently has the confidence of the heir-apparent. He is, moreover, head of the non-political Catholic organizations of Hungary. Graf Zichy's entrance into the Cabinet makes it assured that the "liberalism" of the Khuen-Hedevary party will not inspire legislation inimical to the interests of the Catholic Church. A marked prejudice did exist against the Premier, following his appointment, because his record led men to believe him in entire accord with the so-called liberal policy which has done or attempted much injury to Catholic interests heretofore. But the appointment of Graf Zichy, a loyal Catholic, to the portfolio of Minister of Worship, has removed the prejudice.

Brazilian Catholics Reassured.—The election of Marshal Hermes da Fonseca to the presidency of Brazil was viewed with great alarm by the Catholics, but he has stated in an interview that he contemplates no interference with the Church. When asked his opinion on divorce, which Catholics feared he would introduce, the new President declared that he is entirely opposed to it, for he belongs "to the old school, the school of morality." President Fonseca added that he had reached the eighteenth degree among the Freemasons, but when he found that they had other objects than those of beneficence, he had broken off all relations with them. He has donated the material for the construction of a chapel in the town of Sapobemba.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

High Prices—Is Gold to Blame?

It has been suggested that the cause of the general rise in prices is to be found in an excessive supply of gold due to an increased production extending over many years. The idea is plausible. Gold is a commodity as well as the things it buys. If the value of these is expressed by their relations to gold, its value must be expressible in terms of the relations it bears to them. As their value falls, that of gold rises; and if gold falls they must increase in price. It is generally admitted that any abnormal excess in the production of a commodity lowers its value. Now, as all know, the yearly production of gold during the sixty years elapsing since its discovery in California and Australia, has been very great, and has been enormous since the modern methods of treating low grade and refractory ores came into general use and the great South African mines were opened. Hence gold has necessarily fallen in value, and the prices of other commodities have risen in the same ratio.

But if this reasoning be valid, the increase added each year to the stock of gold should have brought about a corresponding increase in prices; while, as a matter of fact, during a large part of the period in question there was a fairly constant diminution in the cost of the necessities of life. The causes of this come into two general categories. One includes the extension of railways and the multiplication of ships of large capacity, whereby new sources of supply were reached and the cost of transportation diminished; and also the engaging in the production, manufacture and distribution of those necessities, of aggregations of capital so great that a percentage of profit, small compared with that required in other times, would yield a princely income. In the other category are found the numerous applications to this business of the discoveries of physical science, such as the Bessemer steel process which cheapened and improved all machinery and by making high boiler pressure possible opened the way to the multiple expansion of steam and many other economies; the vacuum pan for sugar refining; the refrigerating machine which makes it possible to carry perishable food from most distant lands and to preserve it for any length of time, and others in every trade. Those of the first category must be referred directly to the increase of the world's capital due to the great gold production: those of the second must be referred to it indirectly, for without it the great expenditure called for by these applications, when made on a large scale, would have been impossible.

Hence, we see the immense production of gold of the last half century, not only not increasing prices, but actually conducing to lower them; not only maintaining its value in regard to other commodities, but even creating such a demand for itself as to increase that value. To understand this the better let us examine more closely what has been the function of gold in the development of the economic condition of to-day.

In itself gold is, one might say, worthless, differing in this from corn, wool, iron, coal, timber, cotton, cattle and a hundred other commodities, which by reason of their connection with the sustaining of human life, have each their intrinsic worth. From the economic point of view, therefore, gold is merely the medium of exchange which facilitates, or rather, if operations on a large scale be considered, makes possible the production and distribution of these commodities. An example will show this clearly. Let us suppose a man returning to New York from Alaska or the Pacific Coast with a million dollars dug out of the earth. He resolves to put up a fine building; and straightway mechanics of various kinds come together for the work. Their end is to obtain for themselves and their families decent shelter, food and clothing, the conveniences of life in moderation and, if they are wise, a provision for these things against the contingencies of the future. The gold with which their employer pays them enables them to exchange their labor and skill for these things, and when the building is finished, it is occupied by merchants dealing in them.

Now it is easy to see that the increase of gold means the multiplication of such operations, since gold necessarily requires investment. It therefore draws men to towns which thus have grown marvellously. But the means of living are produced, not in cities, but on the farm and the cattle ranch, in the forest and the mine, often far away and even beyond the sea. Railways and steamships, therefore, come into existence with their multitudes of workmen to swell in part the urban population, and merchants and their employees and manufacturers and factory hands multiply till the cities count their inhabitants by hundreds of thousands and millions and the very means taken to supply their needs raise up new hosts with needs to be supplied. So new roads are built and more ships are launched and other mines are opened and virgin forests are laid low and every corner of the earth is explored for an answer to the question asked centuries ago by the Sea of Galilee: "Whence shall we get bread that these may eat?" and when ships and trains return laden with the reply of every region under heaven, behold the very answering has created another army to be clothed, housed and fed! And all this, the multiplication of consumers, the multiplication of products, the exchange of these for the labor of those, is effected by the agency of gold which of itself can neither clothe, nor warm, nor feed, nor shelter.

Man is, first of all, a consumer. All through his infancy and youth he consumes without producing; and even in his maturity he produces because he must needs consume. There is, therefore, on the land no such thing as an absolute producer, though in cities there are grown men and women, absolute consumers, who consume without producing anything. Nevertheless, not a few looked upon as such share indirectly in production and many do so directly. Thus every factory hand is a producer, and his manufactured product is consumed even by those who draw the raw material from the soil. Still, as the country-people are the principal producers and the townsfolk, consumers, we may identify the class of producers with the former and that of consumers with the latter. We have seen that the first effect of the increase of gold was to draw people from the country to the towns, to convert producers into consumers; and that its next effect was to open new sources of supply to keep this well up to the demand. But one looking into the statistics of the great capital possessing countries sees, too, that the increase of the consuming urban population is in excess of that of the producing rural populations, strengthened though these be with labor-perfecting machinery. One sees, too, that there must be a limit to the new sources of supply.

For years the United States practically fed Great Britain and contributed no small share to the feeding of a great part of Europe. Now the time is approaching in which it will need all its resources to feed its own immense cities. Canada, Argentina, Australia, New Zealand are taking up the task it must gradually abandon, and Siberia, no doubt, will soon enter the field. There are probably great possibilities in Africa. But all will tend gradually to come to the condition, more or less, the United States is in to-day. And it is to be noted that when a country, growing normally, ceases to export food it very soon begins to import it. Hence with the growth of the great West will probably come a time when Canada and the United States may have to contend with Europe for the food products of other regions. Moreover the question to-day involves not only the normal growth of countries but also the increase of mere consumers, the personnel of the huge armies and navies and of the trades connected with their equipment and support. Here then we find one cause of the rise of prices, the growing difficulty of keeping the supply of the necessities of life up to the demands of the consumers.

The Irish Party and the Church

Grave misstatements, occasioned no doubt by the intensity of the struggle for political advantage, have been sent abroad regarding the attitude of the Irish Party towards the Catholic Church. The New York Evening Post gave recent editorial indorsement to the contention of its English correspondent that the Irish bishops, directed by the Vatican, are at one with English ecclesiastics in their Toryism and are gradually influencing a willing people in the same direction; that they are distrustful of Mr. Redmond and his party who are radical and anti-clerical at heart, and that they support Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Healy on religious grounds.

All these allegations are as groundless as the information that Mr. Redmond received his education at a godless college or that Mr. Justin McCarthy, who has been a practising Catholic for years, is an agnostic. The Irish leader received his "godless" education in the Jesuit college of Clongowes, of whose alumni association he has been several times elected president. It so happens that not only are the Irish bishops Home Rulers without exception but that several demand a more advanced and comprehensive measure of autonomy than the average Irish member. The most cogent statements we have seen of the case for Home Rule as essential to educational, industrial and, indirectly, to moral and religious development, have been made by Irish prelates.

Some bishops have exercised at times the right of other Nationalists to criticize occasional acts or tendencies of individuals or groups, but these have also made it clear that they are earnest supporters of the Party as a whole; of which their generous contributions to its funds and their accompanying letters and pronouncements give ample evidence. The rulers of the dioceses in which Mr. Healy lives and in which his constituency is situated disagreed with the party leaders in opposing the re-election of such a competent and honest, if uncongenial, colleague as the member for Louth, but the O'Brien movement has no support among the episcopate, and the clergy stand conspicuously aloof. Scarcely a week passes without some such declaration as this, from Dr. O'Dea of Galway, for many years acting president of Maynooth:

"I have always believed the Irish Party to be honest, and not the tail of any English Party, as so many critics have opprobriously alleged; and, believing this, and believing also in the competency of the Party, I trust their judgment, regard their relations with English Parties as the result of the closest study and fuller opportunities than we in Ireland can command, and I consider I am serving Ireland best, and not only Ireland but, in a measure, higher interests as well, by giving the Party my whole-hearted support, and thrusting from my own door the suspicions and aspersions with which they are assailed. In token of this trust in the Party, and because of the unusual demand on the Party funds in the present crisis, I double my usual subscription this year."

The hierarchy is aware that the Irish party has faithfully represented their views in parliament and frequently secured them legislative enactment; that they have been consistently the champions of Catholic interests throughout the British Empire, and their Catholic members are not only Catholic by conviction but, with possibly one exception, exemplary in the practice of their religious duties.

Equally groundless is the inference from the decrease in the Freeman's Journal dividends that the new Irish proprietors are losing interest in Home Rule. The decline of the great Dublin journal is due not to Nationalist lukewarmness but to the establishment of a rival Nationalist daily, which being cheaper, less partizan and more cleverly conducted, has won a wide circulation not only among Home Rulers but among the increasing number of Unionists who are veering in the direction of self government. The greater diversity of interests and enlargement of opportunity, created by peasant proprietorship, have rather intensified the demand for power to protect and control them.

Already the demand, if not so feverish as formerly, is more forcibly and intelligently framed. Nationalist organs are no longer satisfied with the name of Home Rule. They are making a careful study of the kind of autonomy that will meet the nation's financial and industrial needs, and their columns bristle with communications advancing sound reasons for accepting no system which will not give Ireland control of her domestic and foreign trade. The Gladstone measures would not be acceptable now. A critical examination of needs and values has served to reinforce sentiment and crystallize it into intelligent and permanent conviction. And again among the latest to give strong expression to the necessity of a self-sufficing Irish Parliament, with full fiscal powers, is an Irish prelate, the new Bishop of Clonfert, until recently Dean of Maynooth.

The magazines edited at Maynooth, most authoritatively representative of Irish ecclesiastical opinion, mention the Irish Party only to approve its attitude or defend it from attack. The Irish Ecclesiastical Record has paid tribute in several recent issues to their zealous and skilful service in securing a National University endowed with such powers as have enabled it to extend its charter to Maynooth. The April issue of the Irish Theological Quarterly takes editorial exception to misrepresentations of the party's policy and conduct regarding Catholic education in England. Referring to a statement of a Mr. J. D. Newton in a German Catholic review that the Irish party were in opposition to the English hierarchy and allied to the Liberals whose prime minister had pledged himself to bring all schools under public control, it points out that Mr. Asquith and other ministers had held out hopes of special provisions for Catholic schools, and continues:

"That there were and are misunderstandings between the different sections of the Catholics in England we quite believe, but that Mr. Redmond leads one party against the Archbishop and Bishops is absolutely incorrect. Mr. Redmond has had a difficult card to play in connection with the English school question especially in view of the attitude of the English Tory Catholics, but Mr. Redmond has always acted in consultation with the competent ecclesiastical authorities in England. This is evident from the letter of thanks addressed to him by the Archbishop of Westminster. Nor is it right to insinuate that the Archbishop and Bishops of England issued an address to their flocks to vote Tory, as opposed to Mr. Redmond's address in favor of the Liberals. This is precisely what many of the Tory Catholics were anxious that the ecclesiastical authorities should do, but the ecclesiastical authorities were too prudent not to recognize that an alliance with any political party is a dangerous experiment for the Church. They drew up a series of questions which were to be put to the different candidates and they ordered that the replies should be read in the churches, and the people should be exhorted to vote according to their conscientious convictions. Such articles as this of Mr. Newton addressed to a prominent foreign journal are calculated to stir up strife and contention and to arouse passions that might not easily be quelled."

The Maynooth publication does not place much reliance on Mr. Asquith's declarations before or after elections—"interpreting the promises of the Prime Minister," it says, "would require the services of a trained exegetist"—but it does rely on the competency and willingness of the Irish Party to protect Catholic interests whether in England or Ireland, and to formulate and execute national policies in accord with Catholic principles. The declarations of the Bishops and of the organs that represent them are satisfying evidence of the harmonious relations between Ireland's ecclesiastical and parliamentary representatives; while the Irish Party's record in the past and the character of its membership give ample assurance that the trust reposed in it has not been misplaced.

Art and Mrs. Grundy *

For a large portion of the public who are struggling towards the light in the labyrinths of art, Mr. Hunecker is a guide, philosopher and friend. It is to his credit that, finding so many humble learners at his feet, he does not lose his head and indulge in eccentricities. He maintains in general a manly and straightforward attitude and abhors dreamy posturings and misty inanities. He is always aware that there are other things in life besides music and pictures and decorative splendors, and, for one who has saturated himself so thoroughly with the atmosphere of art, he succeeds to a remarkable degree in preserving his sense of proportion. In the present volume he speaks of "the man crucified to the cross of aspiration by his unhappy temperament" and describes canvases as "giving forth the opalescent overtones of an unearthly composition," but, when an enthusiasm, which is convincing in its sincerity, does not quite carry him away, he avoids that meaningless artistic jargon which leaves the reader without an idea and language without a word wherewith to meet future contingencies of a higher order. To use a favorite device of Mr. Hunecker's, that, namely, of explaining one artist in terms of another, he is the Harry Thurston Peck of art criticism. He gives the literary flavor to the treatment of subjects unrelated to literature; he has read and memorized prodigiously—in one paragraph of the present book he refers casually to eleven different authors; he carries his learning like a man of the world, carefully concealing everything like pedantry and the academic strut; if a word or a phrase suits him he does not stop to enquire about its standing in the dictionaries.

In his "Promenades" the author takes us through some of the European galleries and narrates his personal impressions of certain great masterpieces of the "primitives." But, outside of these rambles and a few short essays on general topics allied to the main subject of his book, he devotes most of his space to "Impressionists," painters and etchers. The French Impressionists, as a school, are quite modern; Edouard Manet, who flourished during the latter half of the nineteenth century, is recognized as their leader, if not founder.

Impressionism fundamentally is an insistence on color over line; it replaces the broad distinction of light and shadow with that of light and modifications of light. The latter distinction was not unknown before, but the new painters emphasized it to the puzzlement of painters and critics alike. Readers of "Fors Clavigera" and of "The Gentle Art of Making Enemies" will recall the famous lawsuit originating in Ruskin's indignation over Whistler's "Nocturnes." "I never expected," wrote Ruskin in describing them, "to see a coxcomb ask 200 guineas for flinging a pot of paint in the public's face." Some Monticellis look like pictures that were exposed to a pelting rain before their paint had dried. To the uninitiated many famous impressionistic studies, especially of landscape, will always remain mere leather and prunella. By paying strict attention, however, to writers like Mr. Huneker, by earnest striving and the arduous cultivation of a temperament, one may hope in the course of time to find the angle of vision at which the riot and confusion of extreme impressionistic art will assume the outline and definition of a real picture.

"These are but wild and whirling words, my lord." But it is not our purpose to discuss technicalities; we desire to call attention to certain wide issues suggested by the French School of Impressionism. The movement may be described loosely as a revolt against the rules of the game. It is hard to be brilliant according to rule. The only alternative for a maximum of ambition and a minimum of ability is to score any way you please. If the umpire cannot be cheated or frightened appeal to the baser passions of the spectators. This is the perennial refuge of incapacity combined with impudence and towering aspiration. We cannot escape the conviction that much of the impressionistic revolt has been merely a manifestation of a very ugly human tendency. The principal promoters of the revolt were men of far less than first-rate genius. "How thin and unsubstantial modern painting is if compared to this magician!" cries even Mr. Huneker in the presence of the Frans Hals's exhibit in Haarlem. They, moreover, won a hearing by audacious appeals to the grosser instincts of human nature. The colors they revelled in most of all were the nacreous surfaces of life's foul drains. "Art for Art's sake" was the formula which supplied a cloak for their hypocrisy or self-delusion—it is hard to tell which. Mixed with their shrewd desire to operate in a field, which the masters with superb disdain left practically untouched for such as they, was doubtless a bitter and unmanly pique against the rules and the verdict of the umpire. And so Monsieur Rops must needs spend fourteen hours a day sulking in his lonely tent and working hard at splenetic commentaries on the diabolism of society.

Parallelisms of the same tendency among men, whose "sails are bigger than their boat," are not wanting in the world of letters. Consider how much larger Walt Whitman looms in his studied eccentricities of form than if he had invited comparison by conformity with the rules governing the rest of our poets. He is a veritable mountain in his majestic isolation because there are no hills. Whatever we think of his poetry, we feel bound to admire his perspicacity in calculating ultimate effects. He, too, believed in the power of heavy spices to overcome the popular disinclination for strange dishes; or, to return to our former illustration, he, too, appealed to the commonest passions of the grandstand to disregard the umpire and the rules. We think the principle we have been enunciating will explain most of the lubricity in our modern poets, philosophers and writers of fiction.

The defense that art has nothing to do with morality seems to us so false as to verge on conscious hypocrisy. Mental confusion, so prevalent amid our boasted educational processes, may, of course, excuse those who act on the formula. There is a curious wavering of faith in this sophistical creed in one passage of Mr. Huneker's book. "We have always," he tells us, "held a brief for the Art for Art theory. The artist must think first of his material and its technical manifestation, but, after that, if his pulse beat to spiritual rhythms, then his work may attain the heights. It is not painting that is the lost art, but faith." Exactly. Mr. Huneker is at one with the discarded Mr. Ruskin.

The word "Art" has a variety of meanings, and we can explain the long and fruitless controversies about art and morality only on the supposition that these various meanings replace one another stealthily in the middle term of the argument. The two meanings that are oftenest confused is art, as a way of doing a thing, skill, technique; and art, as the product or effect of skilful performance. To the moralist the natural or acquired skill of any act is a negligible element. We can admire the art, or dexterity, of a pickpocket whilst seriously disapproving of the deed itself. The way a painter composes the colors of his palette, prepares his canvas, grades values, is all a matter of indifference to Mrs. Grundy—the scornful appellation applied by the art world to moralists collectively. It is characteristic of that world to attribute all sorts of denseness to Mrs. Grundy, and volumes of corruscating wit have been used up in perforating objections which she has never advanced. Mrs. Grundy has no quarrel with the dexterity of painters, etchers or sculptors. In this sense, art has absolutely nothing to do with morality, for dexterity may be manifest in the vilest of vile paintings. When Mrs. Grundy speaks of a necessary connection between good morality and good art, she uses the word art of the finished product, just as we might say, "The art of Velasquez is stored in this Museum." She says that a painting can be morally good or bad, that when it is bad the artist has committed a grave sin to the spiritual injury of all who will look upon his picture without having been previously hardened, by experiences not always desirable, against the impressions such a painting by its nature tends to produce.

Finally, we go a step farther and maintain with the sanest criticisms in art, that morality has very much to do with the merely esthetic value of an art-work. The statement has recently been ascribed to Rodin that "what people call ugly is often fuller of character than what people call beautiful, because the inner truth comes out more forcible through ugliness than through regularity." Rodin is defending moral ugliness in art, but in this sentence he supplies his own refutation. Almost anyone can detect depravity in a human countenance, but it is only a rare person who can recognize nobility when he sees it, and to reproduce that nobility in words, or on canvas, or in stone, requires nothing less than sheer genius. The veriest caricaturist can give us boulevardiers and bayaderes, but not a convincing Madonna. That is the reason why Whistler's portrait of his mother raises the average of his work into its high position despite impressionistic vagaries. This is the reason, also, why Mr. Hunecker prefers the saner and lovelier art of Louis Legrand to his studies of nocturnal Paris.

It is a pity that critics like Mr. Hunecker—no weak and nerveless esthetes, but strong men who preserve an intellectual quality in their appreciations—do not recognize more clearly and denounce more forcibly the false note in "modernity." We do not want them to fulminate pharisaic and solemn comminations against individuals, but we expect them to state without fear or favor the principles of common sense which lie at the heart of all great achievement in every art. "Modernity" is a neurotic condition rather than a reasoned point of view, and writers who have kept their heads in a general hysteria are under a certain obligation to insist on obvious truths and ancient platitudes. Not the least of these is the commonplace uttered by Tennyson that the Good and the Beautiful are sisters that "never can be sundered without tears."

The Carnegie Educational Fund

When, in 1906, Mr. Carnegie set aside $10,000,000 in 5 per cent. mortgage bonds of the United States Steel Corporation, as an endowment for the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, few comments were made which were not eulogistic of the act. Men saw for a time only the munificence of the gift. To assure members of the teaching bodies of the higher educational institutions of English-speaking countries of North America a retiring allowance or pension appealed to them as a means to remove a sordid element, hitherto affecting the dignity of a noble profession. No professional men are more self-sacrificing than those of the teaching fraternity; none, as a general rule, are so meagrely recompensed, none so unassured as they of a competence which shall make certain a dignified, seemingly old age when retirement from active life shall have become imperative. Four years' experience of the conduct of the affairs of the Foundation has modified somewhat men's original judgment. The reality of the part which it is destined to play on the broad stage of American education is becoming better known, and the enthusiasm of many who welcomed its first announcement is tempered, until criticism of its provisions is general enough to demand attention.

The criticism is various, but the note sounding clearest in the gamut of charges made is that of ungenerous discrimination against religious schools and of influence inimical to Christian teaching. Mr. Carnegie, it would appear, is among the happily decreasing number of men who see in definite religious control of a school, misnamed sectarianism, something essentially incompatible with the ideals of a liberal education. In the letter announcing his Foundation, the new patron of higher training excluded from its benefits such colleges "as are under the control of a sect, or require trustees (or a majority thereof), officers, faculty, or students to belong to any specified sect, or which impose any theological test." One may wonder whether Mr. Carnegie appreciates the handicap which this ungenerous discrimination puts upon religious schools. In the profession of teaching, one need not be told, the honorarium received for work done is quite as attractive as in other professions, and an institution cannot expect to draw and hold good men unless it be able to make as generous provision for its faculty as do other like institutions. If a school cannot offer as ample rewards to teachers as other schools, it will find it difficult to compete successfully for teachers of the highest ability, nay it may lose its best men to institutions not straitened in material resources.

This result, flowing directly from the exclusion of religious schools from participation in the privileges of the Foundation, does not, of course, appeal to the managers of the Carnegie Fund. One of their implied objects is precisely the elimination of the small colleges which find a lack of material resources an obstacle to their wider and fuller development. Yet there are among our leading educators men who set weighty store by the superior advantages these small colleges possess in the opportunity of personal influence and formation their smaller classes ensure. Even were this not the case few among us will view with equanimity the "trust" principle entering into educational life. Its possibilities in other fields do not so allure as to make one eager to see it extended to an absorbing and crushing of weaker and smaller colleges by some few great schools.

This loss of monetary help and of material advantage because of respect for religious convictions will be a new experience to non-Catholics. Catholics will not mind it much. Long years of sacrifice for principle's sake have made the latter well acquainted with the hardships entailed by their insistence that education without formal religious training is likely to do more harm than good. In a way, indeed, Catholics are finding a certain comfort in the refusal to extend to denominational colleges the benefits of this fund for pensioning professors. Whilst with their principles they neither expect nor are they likely to accept any assistance from the Foundation as at present conducted, they welcome its provisions as an occasion in which non-Catholics may come to have clearer appreciation of the Catholic stand in regard to education. Catholics maintain that formal religion is not an affair of half an hour on Sunday, but that it permeates the whole life. To permit the years of a youth's training to be passed without the controlling influence of his religion is to them a crime. True, defenders of Mr. Carnegie's policy argue that the conditions of his Foundation do not imply cutting loose from organized Christianity. They demand, as is noted in the last report of the Fund, only the exclusion of a "sectarianism which limits academic freedom by imposing a denominational test on teachers or pupils, or by warping administrative policy."

One might hesitate to set his judgment against this contention, were there not ample reason to show it to be as unfounded as it is plausible. Brown University, if we may credit a report of one of its own committees handed in last June, is as free to-day from sectarianism, in the way the Carnegie Fund appears to define it, as any college in America. No trace of sectarian influence is ever seen in the assembly of its trustees and fellows, in the meetings of the faculty, or in the instruction of the class-room. And yet Brown and twelve other educational institutions, just as strong as Brown in their disavowal of sectarian control and influence, are excluded from the privileges of the Foundation because of a mere legal dependence upon religious bodies. This legal dependence, as a committee delegated by these institutions to submit their petition for recognition by the Carnegie Fund Trustees declares, involves merely technical provisions in historic charters that are found in actual practice not a bar to the complete liberty and autonomy of the colleges concerned."

But there is a far more serious charge contained in recent criticism of the Foundation. Mr. Carnegie is, of course, a Christian and his philanthropy does not in any manner, one may presume, lessen his desire to cherish and promote the Christian faith in all the life of the people. One may question, then, whether he realizes just what the conditions he imposes for participation in the benefits of his Foundation make logically necessary. If the schools which are to enjoy the privileges of his Fund are to eliminate every control exercised by a religious or Church body, as well as every theological test imposed on students or faculty, how can they be Christian? It has become fashionable in the last few years to speak of Christianity in a very wide and loose sense.

Even Unitarians, who deny the Trinity and the Divinity of Christ, are wont to say pretty things regarding the need to safeguard the helpful influence of Christian forces and ideals. Yet it seems easy enough to realize that there can be no question of Christian faith, no professions of moral and religious aspiration based on that faith, where there is not whole-hearted acceptance of Christianity's fundamental doctrines. And if by drastic enactment formal presentation of these doctrines be excluded from an institution, if, as the conditions of the Carnegie Fund insist, no theological test whatever may be imposed on students or faculty, does not the very munificence of its provisions make it evident that no greater enemy of Christian teaching exists to-day than this same Foundation? Have not the attractions of its monetary advantages been powerful already to lead certain institutions to take steps construed by their own friends as a sacrifice of Christian principle for material advantage?

This is not a Catholic question, nor a Protestant question. It is a Christian question whether it be for the best interests of education to have built up for educational achievement an immense fund weighted down by conditions inimical to religious teaching. For inimical it is to strengthen colleges and universities in which, whilst Agnosticism may be freely taught, no definite Christian test of belief or practice may be ensured in teacher or in student.

M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

Dr. Carl Lueger, a Modern Tribune of the People

II

Space does not allow us to follow the subsequent successes of the Christian Socialist party under Lueger's leadership. Another decade was required before their success was as complete in the country as it had been in Vienna. Suffice it to say that since the elections for the Reichsrat in 1909, for the first time under universal suffrage, they are the dominant party in Austria. They have routed Liberalism and it is now a political nullity; at present they are in danger only from Social Democracy, the offspring of Jewish Liberalism, and the heir to its hatred against the Church. Against this danger the realization of their program of economic and industrial reform and organization would seem to be an effective bulwark. It must be added that the triumph of the Christian Socialists has brought with it an ever-increasing revival of religious life throughout Austria, that a quarter of a century ago would have been impossible. Catholic Austria has found itself again, and Catholic social works, Catholic school associations, Catholic labor unions, Catholic women's clubs, the Catholic press, in fact, every field of Catholic endeavor has been entered and is being vigorously cultivated, and life and growth abound where before reigned death and stagnation.

Lueger's activity during his thirteen years' incumbency of the Burgomaster's chair, the longest incumbency since the opening of the constitutional era of Austria in 1848, was astounding, and the Vienna of to-day is almost entirely his creation. When he assumed office the Liberals prophesied speedy and dire disaster for the city under his administration; at his death, and even for years before, all, without distinction of creed or party, united in bearing testimony to its phenomenal growth in size, beauty and completeness of industrial and municipal organization. A typical testimony is that of Dr. von Derschetta, leader of the German Peoples' Party, who declared some years ago that owing to Lueger Vienna is at present the equal of any capital in Europe, and that Lower Austria is, in the field of social politics, an example to the world. The mayor of Athens, Dr. Merkuris, after a visit in 1906, called Vienna the "Luegerstadt" (the Lueger city), because in every department he saw evidence of Lueger's creative and administrative genius. Similar views have been expressed by burgomasters of numerous other European cities after studying the administration of Vienna. Nor have the members of the many congresses, scientific and other, which have met with increasing frequency in Vienna during the past half-decade or so, failed to grow enthusiastic both over the city and its hospitality, the Viennese hospitality of old, which Lueger restored, and understood, as only a born son of Vienna does understand, so well how to dispense.

A mere catalogue of Lueger's achievements in Vienna would fill several columns of AMERICA. We must confine ourselves to a mention of the most important. First of all, the city has been nearly trebled in size and population, its extent at present being over one hundred square miles, with a population of 2,100,000 souls. The public gas and electric lighting has been municipalized; private lighting, too, is rapidly going over to the city works. The splendid system of electric street railways is also municipal. The latest figures to hand show a profit of $2,111,600 a year for the railways, while in 1907 the city gas works showed a profit of nearly $600,000; the electric works in 1908, of $840,000. Lighting and transportation service were never so cheap and so good in Vienna as now. A new aqueduct—the second great one, the first was completed by Lueger—will be opened this December. It will lead the water from the Styrian Alps a distance of one hundred and twenty miles through underground tunnels to an immense subterranean reservoir in the suburbs.

Settlements for the poor and insane—they cannot be called asylums or hospitals—have been erected on the hills at the city limits. City employment bureaus have been established, which in 1908 found places for 53,000 men and 92,000 women. Nor have the schools been neglected. During his term of office Lueger erected more schools than had been built under all the Liberal Burgomasters put together. Not to mention the reorganization of the city normal school, by January 1, 1908, the primary and grammar schools numbered 406, with 6,604 teachers and 346,879 pupils. Destitute school-children are fed and clothed, shelters for the homeless ones are provided, and large playgrounds in the fields just outside the city have been established, to which the children are conveyed in special cars, are fed, medically examined and treated if need be, and sent back home improved and restored in health. What is more, a large seaside home for convalescent children has been opened at San Pelagio on the Adriatic.

Further, Vienna has been transformed into a veritable garden city. It contains at present two hundred and seventy-four parks of various sizes, to say nothing of the great park and boulevard, nearly two miles wide, that is gradually surrounding the city. One sees flowers everywhere in Vienna; even the lamp-posts in the principal thoroughfares are garlanded with them.

Allusion only can be made to the great central cemetery, one of the show-places of Vienna, with magnificent parks and avenues; to the great city slaughter-house and central market; to the municipal savings-banks, the life-insurance and old-age pension fund; to the public baths (one of these is a bathing resort on an island in the Danube, gotten up like a sea-beach, that has become so popular that it must soon be enlarged); to the canals and new bridges, and to the regulation of the Danube and the Wien. What makes all this achievement the more remarkable is that it was done in the face of the opposition of Jewish-Liberal capitalists, who refused to lend a penny for the work; the necessary loans, at least at the outset, had to be floated in Germany, and despite the enormous outlay for this imposing work, it was all effected without the slightest increase of the taxes and votes, while interest on the loans—the city debt at present is between $80,000,000 and $91,000,000—has been covered several times over. Incidentally Vienna has given the world a splendid example of the success of municipal ownership.

From what has been said, an insight can be had, perhaps, into the character of this extraordinary man. He has been compared by some to Caius Gracchus and to Daniel O'Connell; others have seemed to discover in him resemblances to both. Some he reminds of Windthorst, and there are indeed many points wherein they agree, although their fields of action were, in many respects, entirely different. The name "Volkstribune" (a tribune of the people) so often used by his countrymen to describe him, characterizes him, perhaps, as well as any other. Work was his element; with this he coupled a marvellously rapid and penetrating judgment, which enabled him to come to a decision on a subject long before his colleagues had possessed themselves of the details. To his possession of this faculty his co-workers have borne frequent testimony, of his eloquence we have already spoken; to this he joined a real Viennese wit, which he could render very bitter when he chose and which his enemies learned to fear.

Lueger's integrity was unimpeachable. No enemy ever accused him of using his high position in the least to his own advantage; the salary of the Burgomaster he cut in half, leaving it only $5,000 a year; and he died comparatively poor. Equally unsullied was his loyalty to Austria and the Hapsburg dynasty; he was called the "yellow and black Lueger" in allusion to the national colors of Austria. Among all classes he enjoyed an enormous popularity. People spoke of him habitually as "our Lueger." Significant of his tenderness of heart was his love of children, a love which they returned in full, greeting his carriage with cheers and crowding around him if he alighted to touch his hand or receive a glance or a word. Lueger was unmarried, and lived with his two sisters who survive him.

He was a fearless, outspoken Catholic, and no matter at what cost to himself, never hesitated to profess his faith. All through his great fight against Liberalism, he insisted on putting the defence of Catholic interests in the forefront, even though powerful personages, who could not stomach his "clericalism," withdrew from his support. He was tolerant, too, in the best sense; but woe to those who openly despised and insulted the Catholic name, or sought to corrupt the Faith of Austrians, it mattered not whether the attempts were cloaked under the guise of Jewish-Liberalism, National Germanism or Los-von-Rom propagandism. Especially marked was his devotion to Our Lady, which he inherited from his mother. It was well known in Austria that, as soon as he had brought some great municipal work to a successful conclusion, he made a pilgrimage of thanksgiving to Mariazell, the Lourdes of Austria. This happened also on his recovery from his first great illness in 1907, during which he caused Mass to be said daily in his room. The whole Catholic nation was edified by his resignation and cheerfulness in the face of death, and with the piety with which he received the last Sacraments. One of his last conscious acts was to recite the rosary, with the priest who visited him. His beads, a gift from his mother, were always with him throughout his life. He died with his beads in his hand.

Such in bold outline was the life and work of the great man for whom Austria is in mourning. He has shown her the way to greatness in the program he gave his party of a greater Austria, in which Slav and Magyar and German shall dwell together in harmony under the Hapsburg dynasty; the autonomous States forming, it may be, the United States of Austria under a federal government; Catholic in religion, but justly tolerant of all other creeds; with the industrial and economic advancement of all the people as an enduring political basis. May not their fellow-believers in every land join with the Catholics of Austria in their prayer at his tomb: "Er ruhet im Frieden—May he rest in peace."

Practical men poke fun at the program of the Ministry for progressive school reform and social improvements in Italy. Where the Premier seems to imagine he will be able to work out his reforms with the turn of a hand, insurmountable obstacles face him at the very start. Well-informed critics affirm that his proposals imply one hundred and fifty millions more cash in hand than the country possesses. One must conclude, therefore, either that to meet his proposed outlay for the army, the navy, the commercial marine, for social improvements for working people and for school reform, the Premier means to introduce his covertly-threatened protective tariff tax, or that he is in no way in earnest regarding the projected reforms. The Premier asks for an expenditure of 10,000,000 liras for school development in 1910, 20,000,000 in 1911, 30,000,000 in 1912 and 40,000,000 in the years following. To bolster up his plea he has much to say regarding the "cultural" mission of the Italian people, and one smiles quietly as he notes the admission that a large percentage of the Italian people to-day can neither read nor write.

Bishop Broyer rests the future of his vicariate in the Navigator Archipelago on his Catholic schools. The Little Brothers of Mary have three boys' schools and other teachers conduct seven for the girls. There is also an industrial school for boys, a school of domestic economy for girls and a school for training catechists. Baptisms of adults average fifty a year.

Since the convention of 1899, most of the islands belong to Germany. Great Britain has a few small islands towards the west and the United States has some to the East. When seven men-of-war, representing these three countries, intervened in 1889 and bombarded the villages on the shore, King Mataafa showed himself a hero. On March 16 of that year a terrific hurricane drove some of the ships ashore. "Let us show them that we are true Christians," he said to his soldiers, and placing himself at their head, led them to the beach where they succeeded in rescuing many of their ship-wrecked enemies. In reward for this, Mataafa was exiled to the Marshall Islands, but his bravery and popularity brought about his recall to his native land. He is still alive, an old man of eighty and a devoted Catholic. By order of Emperor William, he is treated with great respect by the German governor.

Patriotism in Chinese Schools

SHANGHAI, MARCH 6, 1910.

Patriotism, as distinct from love of home, has been till recently an unknown virtue in China. The child was brought up exclusively within the family circle; good roads lacking and inter-provincial communications being rare, he saw nothing beyond his native village or town, and on reaching man's estate ignored that love of country which embraces a whole empire. With the modern development of education, the extension of railways linking province with province, and the growing power of the press recording and commenting on all important events, China's youth is learning to be patriotic. Provincialism still lingers in some remote places and holds in check at times the Central Government, but it will gradually be crushed and China will live as one united empire in the hearts of her 400,000,000 subjects. Young China may be expected to be very patriotic, especially in a noisy and anti-foreign way, and this spirit is developed in too many of the Government schools. The following facts will illustrate this amply:

The troubled state of Manchuria in these latter times compelled the Government to suppress all telegrams referring to foreign loans, railways, municipal rights and other matters still in suspense between China and the Powers. This was a wise step, as nobody is so well aware of the credulity and fitfulness of the people as the Court. Neither could the native press be trusted. It is too much in the hands of former students in Japan, investigates little the accuracy of its information, takes rumors and gossip for truth, is violently anti-foreign, and instead of allaying fears, poisons the popular mind against this or that Power as occasions arise. The press, having been muzzled, the students in the schools drew up what is now known as "the carved melon circular," and sent it from one province to the other. This circular originated in Mukden, thence was forwarded to Peking and Paotingfu in the province of Chihli; from the North it penetrated southward and reached successively Shantung, Honan, North and Central Kiangsu. Nanking sent it to Shanghai, and this latter place dispatched it further south to Chekiang, Fukien and Kuangtung provinces.

The contents of the circular were that China had been divided up among the Powers. Japan held Manchuria, Russia Mongolia and Ili, France Koangsi and Yunnan, the American fleet had lately visited Woosung and was in hiding somewhere on the coast, while the English had a strong army and a powerful fleet centred in Hongkong. In many places these statements were taken as true and caused much excitement and unrest among the ignorant masses.

The incidence of a comet which appeared at the end of January, and was erroneously taken for that of Halley, increased the panic. This comet was observed in Peking, Nanking and here in Shanghai on the evenings from January 22 to 24. It appeared all of a sudden about 15 degrees ahead of Venus, then approaching perihelion and dimly visible in the western sky. The nucleus had almost the apparent diameter of Venus, while the tail, projecting towards the zenith, increased from 10 degrees at first to 30 at the end. After the 24th it moved away rapidly and by the 26th had quite disappeared. The phenomenon was, however, interpreted as a sign of dynastic change and impending disaster for the Empire. The schools nurtured in the anti-foreign spirit suddenly developed a bellicose attitude. Stirring speeches were delivered and plans proposed. China's end is near approaching, it was said; we shall be soon slaves of another country like Egypt and Corea. Such words were calculated to influence the minds of the indifferent and stir up popular hatred and prejudice.

In many places, notably in Honan and North Kiangsu, the students asked for arms but were generally refused them except in a case or two. Military drill was the order of the day. In other places the schools were disbanded, and the students being free enrolled themselves in volunteer corps to meet the invading foreigner. What surprises most in all this commotion is the inertia of the Government and of the heads of the schools to nip in the bud such outbursts of juvenile patriotism. As the rumors originated in the Government schools, they were to all appearances cooked by those who knew, and these acted for a purpose. It was only after two months of sterile agitation that any serious step was adopted, and even then it was at the urgent request of the French Consul General in Shanghai. The Taotai, chief official of the city, has at last issued a proclamation denying the fact that the country had been divided up among the Powers, and prohibiting the further spreading of such a rumor under pain of rigorous punishment.

We thus enjoy quiet for some time, but the whole agitation and the active part taken in it by the students show how a new patriotic spirit is awakening throughout the country. In April and May, when Halley's comet will approach the earth and become visible to the naked eye, a new panic may again break out. Anti-monarchists and other designing persons, who are numerous in this country, are ever on the lookout for such events, and handle them with the greatest cunning to stir up the fears of the ignorant and superstitious masses. Education, it was thought, would enlighten and clear away prejudice and distrust, but as it has been amply shown here, it tends rather to increase hatred, while the press on its side renders a sorry service to the nation.

Mid-Day Missions in Paris

PARIS, APRIL 1, 1910.

A hackneyed reproach addressed to the French priests by over-zealous Catholics is that they have, in certain cases, omitted to adapt their methods to new manners and customs, that they are behind the times, out of touch with modern development. If, as is possible, there is a grain of truth in this, it would be unfair and unjust to overlook the efforts that are now being made, in Paris especially, to meet every kind of spiritual need; to create new institutions when the old ones no longer suffice or to modify existing habits whenever the spiritual welfare of the Catholics is at stake.

The Paris midinette, as the young work-woman is popularly called, is a well-known type. Refined, pretty and elegant as she often is, the moral dangers that surround her are manifold and need not be dwelt on. They exist in all large towns, but in Paris more than elsewhere on account of the persecution that is slowly and surely destroying religious landmarks throughout the country.

These young girls, who, when mere children, are exposed to the evil influence of the Paris workshops, were able in former days to take advantage, if they wished to do so, of the spiritual resources of their parish churches;

this has now become impossible. Within the last few years, certain quarters of Paris, those especially that were inhabited by the working classes, have been almost rebuilt and thousands of families who could not afford to pay higher rents, were obliged in consequence to remove to the suburbs, that now form almost a new city. The big shops that represent the commercial activity of the capital, the dressmakers, milliners, etc., where French and foreign millionaires spend their money, have not moved. They are situated in the wealthy part of Paris that extends round the boulevards, and many a midinette has daily to make a long journey in going to work and in returning to her poor home in a distant suburb. The churches are then closed, and even were the tired girl so inclined, it would be impossible for her to kneel for five minutes before the tabernacle, much less to join in any religious service.

Two years ago this state of things attracted the attention of a few young work-women belonging to the parish of the Madeleine. They knew by experience how difficult it is for girls who, like themselves, worked for their living far from their homes, to enjoy any of the privileges that to the rich and leisured come so easily; they knew too that a word in season, a wholesome reminder of things eternal and unseen, works wonders in souls that the necessities of life expose to daily, almost hourly peril. They decided, therefore, in order to give their wishes a practical form, that special missions must be preached for the midinettes, at half past twelve, during the time that is allowed to them for their mid-day meal and recreation, which instructions must, of course, take place successively in the different churches that are nearest the big shops and fashionable dressmakers and milliners: the Madeleine, St. Louis d'Antin, St. Roch, etc.

"It was an idée de génie," said a Paris priest, "but not devoid of boldness, for it seemed, at first sight, somewhat rash to expect the light-hearted, merry, pleasure-loving midinette to shorten her stroll along the sunny boulevards, to listen to a sermon."

However, the promoters of the good work began bravely. They caused papers to be printed where the hour of the mission was announced; these they gave away broadcast in the workshops, at restaurants and in the streets, and then, in some fear, waited for the result. At first the attendance was small, then by degrees the congregation grew larger; from one hundred, it increased steadily until at a recent mission twelve hundred midinettes were gathered round the pulpit.

The proceedings are necessarily rapid, for the girls' time is limited: at 12:30 a hymn is sung; at 12:35 the preacher begins his discourse, which is familiar, clear, attractive and easy to grasp; at 12:50 he ends his sermon. The whole thing last exactly twenty minutes. These missions generally go on for a fortnight and are always ended by a Mass at seven and by a general Communion.

The audience naturally varies according to the parish in which the service takes place; here dressmakers are more numerous, elsewhere milliners or shop girls form the greater part of the congregation; some are saints and heroines, others have an appearance more worldly than angelic, a few, a curious fact in a Catholic country, have never heard a sermon or been inside a church, nevertheless they listen attentively and ask to be allowed to carry away "the songs" that are given them, meaning the hymns.

After every mission, results are obtained, though it is difficult, when estimating spiritual victories to make use of statistics. It is a certain fact that within the last three years, from seven to eight thousand young girls have at one time or another, been brought into touch with the Church, owing to these missions, also that the question of religion is no longer kept out of sight, but openly discussed in many fashionable workshops. Those who profess to be practical Catholics may be laughed at or blamed, as the case may be, but they can no longer be ignored. Some of the midinettes have an heroic spirit: one hung up a crucifix in her atelier. "Who has done that?" said the astonished and not over-pleased directress. "It is I," replied a blushing girl. "Well, as it is there, it may stay," was the reply. In another large workshop, a group of girls formed a syndicate with the object of suppressing immoral conversations, a new and unexpected form of the power of association that is now so much to the fore in all social questions.

As may be supposed, the attendance of the midinettes at the mid-day sermons means much self denial. They have to hurry over their meal and sacrifice their stroll in the fresh air. Some are called upon to endure persecution. One girl was turned out of doors by her father because she owned that she followed a retreat. Sometimes, early Communion is a difficulty: twelve young girls who had not been able to receive Holy Communion in the morning, waited till the mid-day sermon, rather than give up their purpose. That, in spite of so many difficulties, the missions de midi live, prosper, and extend their sphere of influence, is due, after God, to the founders and promoters of the work.

These young girls, who are themselves workwomen, are known as les zélatrices, they are, in fact, the good angels of their companions. It is they who remind the latter of the days, hours and churches where the missions take place and they display much tact and resourcefulness as well as the courage that braves reproach and derision. It is they who introduce the new comers to the different institutions that have gradually been founded for their benefit, to the catechisms, where special instructions are given to those who have not made their first Communion, to the lending libraries established on purpose for them and opened at the hours that suit them best. A superior course of religious instruction has lately been founded for those who wish to complete their religious training. It is also the zélatrices who introduce their companions to the restaurants, founded for their benefit, where they find wholesome food, at a moderate price, and also a wholesome moral atmosphere. In one of these restaurants that adjoins a chapel, a sermon is occasionally preached during these meals, in order to save time.

The work thus described has existed for only three years and is flourishing in many parishes. On February 27, thirty-six young zélatrices, the foundress and chief promoters, were received by the Archbishop, who warmly approves of their work. It was a novel sight to see these smart, bright, young girls at the archbishop's house, and those who knew at the cost of what brave efforts they fulfil their self-imposed mission looked at them with respect. Under many a pretty blouse beats the heart of an apostle.

The chaplain of the Montmartre group of midinettes has established Homes of Rest, where, during their brief holidays the tired girls may enjoy the pleasures of the country together with the refreshment of a kindly, moral atmosphere. Some of their letters, written from these homes are truly wonderful, not merely from their keen appreciation of the welcome rest, but from their depth of feeling, delicate and grateful thoughts, their high-minded tone and innate refinement of soul. In some of these country villages, where these midinettes come to rest, they contrive, poor as they are, to give more than they receive. They are bound to no religious practice, and are left in this respect, perfectly free, but many of them attend daily Mass, others in a village of the Département de l'Oise undertook to adorn the chapel, and their deft fingers, that all the year round trim hats or dresses for the leaders of fashion, lined the Tabernacle and embroidered cloths for the altar. The attendants of the missions de midi are only a handful compared to the thousands of girls who fill the Paris shops and banking houses, but since a handful of fishermen saved the world, the Church, unlike the world, believes more in the earnestness of the workers, backed by the grace of God, than in mere numbers.

ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

Death of the Primate of the Serbs

The Slav world, and the Catholic hierarchy alike, mourn the loss of Archbishop Milinovitch of Bar in Montenegro, Primate of all the Serbs. During a quarter of a century the venerated prelate filled this important post to the satisfaction of his temporal and spiritual superiors and to the great solace of the flock confided to his care. Like many other sons of Catholic Dalmatia, he treasured his Serb nationality together with his heritage of faith, and succeeded in combining the interests of both to the common advantage of race and religion.

The vocation of young Simon Milinovitch was determined at an early age, and his bent for serious studies carried him easily through gymnasium and college. At twenty-three he entered the Franciscan Order—his teachers—and was appointed Professor at Senj, where he became Director after he had received his diploma at the Vienna University.

In 1878 the treaty of Berlin assured to Montenegro the territory of Bar, and Prince Nicola, encouraged by the Holy See, revived the ancient bishopric, securing for it all the privileges it had enjoyed previous to the Turkish invasion. Thus were friendly relations between an enlightened Sovereign of the Greek-Orthodox faith and the occupant of the Chair of St. Peter greatly increased and strengthened.

About this time the famous Bishop Strossmayer had already trained a youthful band of apostles destined to spread the Southern Slav movement towards union and keep it in pace with the march of Catholicism. It was natural that Prince Nicola of Montenegro should address himself to the popular Croatian prelate for assistance in the selection of the first Catholic Bishop of modern Montenegro. Bishop Strossmayer at once designated the learned and zealous Franciscan, who had, besides a strong national sense, a rare capacity for guiding and elevating the people. Prince Nicola's choice was sanctioned by the Sovereign Pontiff and Archbishop Milinovitch was duly enthroned. Slav Catholicism gained thereby a worthy representative and the Church a model dignitary.

During his tenure of office many remarkable events occurred in which Montenegro always obtained the advantage. The Papal grant of the retention of the old Slav Liturgy in the Catholic churches of Montenegro is attributed entirely to the efforts of the titular of Bar. The Slav Liturgy had been discouraged in other Slav lands, and even permanently superseded by the Latin.

This vexed question which is sorely troubling the Church just now on the Istrian and Dalmatian coast has been spared to Montenegro by the tactful patriotism of Archbishop Milinovitch. Another memorable service rendered to Slavs was his successful contention for a share in the benefits of the St. Hieronymus College in Rome, resulting in a decision favorable to Serbs. Henceforth Serb students are taught in this institution by Serb instructors and allowed to use the Cyrillic alphabet.

But, above all, the brilliant diplomatic victory of Prince Nicola in obtaining from the Holy See the recognition of the title "Primate of all the Serbs" for the Archbishop of Bar and his successors, is largely due to the personal prestige at the Vatican of the first Titulary and the able manner in which he seconded his Sovereign's efforts.

The veteran ruler of the principality is a wise and tolerant statesman who aims at securing the full trust of his Roman Catholic subjects. The father of the Queen of Italy, long before his daughter's conversion, was known to be free from creed prejudice, and without entering on ungracious comparisons it is safe to assert that nowhere, in lands where Court and Government are orthodox, have Roman Catholics such a fair field.

While furthering the external policy of his fatherland to the utmost of his power, Monsignor Milinovitch did not neglect internal progress. By careful administration of his very slender resources, he managed to place the Church on a solid, if modest, material basis; to repair and beautify the Cathedral of Bar and the episcopal residence; to advance education and to establish a methodical form of assistance to the poor. His benevolence was far-famed, for the manner in which this servant of Christ, living himself in penury, exercised charity towards his flock, seemed little short of miraculous. His hand was equally open to all in distress, irrespective of creed, and his name is blessed by orthodox and Catholic alike.

As a writer, Monsignor Milinovitch won fame in archeology, theology and history, and was the recipient of many Italian and Servian decorations for literary merit. Prince Nicola treated him as a dear personal friend and ranked him, at official functions, on exactly the same footing as the Orthodox Metropolitan. The telegrams exchanged over his grave between Pius X and the Prince show sufficiently how great is the loss sustained in his demise by Church and State, but the best proof of the virtues and lovable qualities of this fervent server at God's altar is the deep mourning of the lowly to whom he was friend and father. BEN HURST.

The college of Maria Hilf, a monument of the Catholic canton of Schwyz in Switzerland, was recently destroyed by fire. Little was saved of the store of literary treasures in the old-time college edifice, and only through heroic efforts the inmates, professors and students were rescued. The library, a noted one in Europe for its rare manuscripts and ancient documents, is a complete loss. The damage, 2,000,000 francs, falls upon the Episcopacy of Switzerland, who controlled the college.

A double railway with tunnels from Como to Chur in the Grisons is planned, one branch to go via the Splügen Pass, the other via Bellizona and the Greina Pass. Signor Vingoli of Parma, the promoter, in applying to the Swiss Government for the concession, declares that he has the capital, $16,000,000, guaranteed.

Expulsion of Peruvian Parish Priests

Since in Chile the Catholic religion is the religion of State, the action of the Government in expelling priests from Tacna, as given in the daily papers, looks like persecution by those of one's own household. Religion, however, has nothing to do with Chile's action in regard to the expulsion of the Peruvian priests. The truth is that, as a consequence of war, Chile took over the administration of the Peruvian province of Tacna in 1884. The agreement then was that at the expiration of ten years the citizens of the province should decide by vote whether they would remain Peruvians on Peruvian territory or become Chileans, the province becoming a part of Chile. For one reason or another, the popular vote has never been taken, although Chile has given unmistakable signs of her intention to effect the formal and definitive annexation of the province.

The expulsion of the Peruvian priests is one of the signs. In both Peru and Chile, a parish priest needs government authorization for the discharge of his functions, because in certain matters he acts as a government official. The Chilean authorities, therefore, directed the Peruvian parish priests in Tacna to secure their commissions from Chile, but as such an action on the part of the priests would be construed as a recognition of Chile's sovereignty, they very properly refrained from what would necessarily have a political bearing and, possibly, momentous political consequences. They had been already duly authorized by Peru, in whom the sovereignty of the disputed province was nominally vested; by seeking authorization from Chile they would have thereby to some extent recognized Chile's pretensions. They prudently left the question to the decision of diplomatists. By expelling them Chile openly declares her intention to hold the province.

Some One Has Blundered

We crave the indulgence of our readers in harking back to a threadbare theme. We have observed in our reading of current literature of the newspaper type what would seem to be a concerted effort to confuse the public mind and to destroy any reputation for common sense and practical wisdom that the Vatican authorities might happen to possess in the eyes of the world at large. One periodical, devoted to balancing the principal editorial opinions of the week in relation to the doings of the day, carefully manages to leave the impression that in the eyes of the country at large the Vatican acted in a very narrow and blundering fashion in closing its gates to the distinguished man who was our President. By a similar process of judicious selection the news agencies abroad have cabled to this country only such editorial expressions of opinion as will tend to deepen the same impression. Articles are already beginning to appear in which Cardinal Merry del Val is pictured as a man who opposes truth and reason on every possible occasion, as witness his conduct in the destruction of the French Concordat and his ruthless treatment of those rare and clear, white souls, the "Modernists."

It is well in a controversy that is apt to revive at any time to cling tenaciously to the main facts as set forth in the statement of the Cardinal Secretary of State. It was there pointed out that the Methodist centre in Rome "systematically joined hands with the worst and most anti-clerical and anti-Papal elements in the City of the Popes and in Catholic Italy, and they do so notoriously and in the most aggressive and insulting manner." Not a particle of evidence in disproof of this plain assertion has appeared anywhere; on the contrary, a public statement by a Methodist official in Rome has supplied abundant confirmation of the charge made by the Cardinal. "The Holy See," continues the Cardinal, "after the unfortunate Fairbanks incident, had every reason to fear that Mr. Roosevelt unwittingly and in perfect good faith might be led into showing open sympathy and friendship for this hostile centre of aggression against the Catholic Church in the heart of the Catholic world. Consequently, when Mr. Roosevelt applied indirectly and confidentially for an audience with His Holiness the Pope, the wish was courteously expressed that he would avoid being dragged into the objectionable position of appearing to publicly support the offensive campaign against the Pope in his own residence. Mr. Roosevelt replied, refusing all conditions or agreements, and thus allowing the possibility of his accomplishing what would be offensive to His Holiness. This was amply confirmed by his own secretary, Mr. O'Laughlin, who, when asked whether without any formal promise or expressed condition, Mr. Roosevelt would, as a matter of fact, not go to the Methodist centre in Via XX Settembre, replied that he would give no assurance, and that, in his opinion, Mr. Roosevelt was just the man to do it. In view of this attitude the audience became impossible. It is simply a question of common courtesy, and surely common courtesy is not incompatible with the rights and freedom of an American citizen."

We have italicized the very sensible comment of the Cardinal on the facts of the case. Although one may detect in it a veiled irony for Tarasconian gasconade about manly independence, not sure of itself except in rude exaggerations, we fail to observe either in the comment or in the statement of the facts, which no one has denied, any blundering on the part of the authorities of the Vatican. There was a blunder, "and the other man was"—Mr. Roosevelt. We can find no excuse for him except that, after his rough sport under Afric suns, civilization was, during the first days of his return to it, what a china-shop is to any redundancy of animal spirits.

One must be suspicious of cabled news from abroad. Everyone understands the nature of the political censorship of continental news reports. The ownership and sources of editorial inspiration of some of our American publications would form an interesting subject of inquiry for Americans of every shade of Christian belief.

An instructive by-play of the now historic incident is the way it brought to the front those Catholics who think it a duty to differ from the Church in everything outside of faith and morals.

Bureau of American Republics

One of the conditions which Ferdinand VII of Spain sought to introduce into the treaty for the cession of Florida in 1819 was intended to prevent any friendship between the United States and the revolted Spanish colonies of Latin America. His attempt failed. Yet, when at the suggestion of Simon Bolívar a General Congress met at Panama in 1826 to discuss matters concerning the American republics, our country sent as representatives two mere spectators who took no part in its deliberations. The general move in the new republics towards the abolition of slavery probably had a sufficiently deterrent effect upon the United States to make it chary of any decisions of the Congress. Much to Bolívar's disgust the Congress ended in failure, for only two South American countries were represented.

Outside of treaties of amity and commerce and other diplomatic civilities, the first successful attempt to bring the American republics together was made by James G. Blaine, then Secretary of State, in the winter of 1889-1890 at Washington. His action looked to the improvement of commercial relations and the diffusion of knowledge about them, for he had seen that if the Latin Americans knew little about the United States, our merchants and exporters knew no more about Latin America. A second Pan-American Conference, held in Mexico in the winter of 1901-1902, was a distinct advance over the first, but the third, held at Rio de Janeiro in 1906, put the finishing touches to the scheme.

Thanks to the ability and industry of Secretary of State Elihu Root, the undertaking was put on a permanent footing, its international character was duly emphasized and secured, and its headquarters were fixed at Washington. The first director of the Bureau was found in the person of Hon. John Barrett, a gentleman familiar with South American affairs, for he was our Minister in Bogotá when he was called to the new position. The Bureau is under the control of a Governing Board, which consists of the Secretary of State and the diplomatic representatives at Washington of the Latin American republics. The cost of maintenance is secured by pro rata contributions from the countries concerned.

The object of the Bureau is primarily to build up trade by furnishing trustworthy information to merchants, manufacturers, exporters and importers and to prospective investors in mining or agricultural pursuits, and secondarily, to furnish professors, editors, artists and travelers with a variety of information which will arouse their interest in Pan-American affairs. It publishes a number of descriptive handbooks, maps, etc., a list of which is sent free on application. The Bureau is the custodian of the archives of the Pan-American Conferences, has charge of the correspondence connected with them, and prepares programs for future conferences. The next conference will be held at Buenos Aires, Argentina, in July of this year, when that progressive republic will celebrate the centenary of its independence.

The library of the Bureau, which numbers about 18,000 volumes, comprises historical, descriptive and statistical works of all American nations. It also receives copies of all Government publications from the twenty-one republics. This library, which is supplied with current Latin-American periodicals as well, is accessible without charge. The palatial new home of the Bureau is on Seventeenth between B and C streets. It represents an outlay of $1,000,000, of which Andrew Carnegie contributed $750,000, the remainder coming from the commercially allied republics.

In the decorations of the building, a space remains vacant for the escutcheon of Canada, and a pedestal for the bust of some prominent Canadian will be kept until needed; for it is confidently hoped that the Dominion will join this American commercial league. The formal inauguration of the new building will take place on April 26.

Failure in the Emmanuel Movement

Two or three years ago the Emmanuel Movement in the Protestant Episcopal Church began to be talked about. It takes its name from Emmanuel Church, Boston, and at first seemed a benevolent aiming at the lessening of sickness. By degrees people recognized it to be a system of mental and faith healing. Then came its specific note distinguishing it from every other system and constituting it a Protestant Episcopal delusion. Its directors claimed healing powers as ministers of the Church; Christ's promises to the Church were their title, and they did not shrink from the logical consequences, that what he promised was only a special skill in psycho-therapeutics and that his own miraculous powers, instead of being those of the Creator over the creature, were nothing more. The gladness with which one of the most conservative of the sects accepted the movement shows clearly the deplorable state into which these have fallen. Here and there an individual made his protest to deaf ears. Many, perhaps, were flattered by the idea: "If we can show miracles in our Church what a weapon we shall have against Rome." Anyhow the movement grew, and a year ago Bishop Nichols of California set apart for the new healing a ward in St. Luke's Hospital, San Francisco, and brought an adept from Boston to direct it. We are now told the work has failed and the adept is going home. Bishop Nichols attributes the failure to the depressing influence of the hospital. The constant atmosphere of suffering, he says, makes cures impossible. As he would hardly limit the miraculous powers of Christ in the same way, it is reasonable to hope that this failure will result in freeing what faith survives among Episcopalians from a diabolical illusion.

Chile Answers Speer

A certain Mr. Speer who wriggled into The Literary Digest of February 5, and disfigured its pages with sectarian misrepresentations of the Church in South America has received some free advertising in El Mercurio, a Liberal party paper of Santiago de Chile, in its issue of March 19. After reproducing for the edification of its readers an exact Spanish translation of Mr. Speer's extract from the so-called "letter of the Pope to the Chilean clergy," El Mercurio rises to make a few remarks: "It is unnecessary to say that the letter is a fraud," declares our Chilean contemporary. "If it is not, let Mr. Speer give us the name of the Pope that signed it with its date, and some reference that will prove its authenticity. While he is busy at that, let him know that in the Chilean dailies of 1904 there appeared an official communication from Rome which states precisely the contrary of what he avers. The Sacred Congregation of the Council, under date of March 21, 1904, congratulates Archbishop Casanova of Santiago on his work 'in promoting the solemnity of divine worship, in strengthening ecclesiastical discipline, in favoring education, in defending the faith and in encouraging piety among the people.' It goes on to say that their Eminences 'rejoice that in so great a labor, and in gathering in a harvest so abundant and so salutary he is aided by his clergy whose learning, piety and zeal deserve his praise.'

"It is simply ridiculous and so it would be judged by Chileans whether Catholics or not to say that the Chilean clergy have no tenderness for the poor when we all know that there is no work of Christian charity with which a priest is not concerned either as a director or as an enthusiastic supporter. As far as income goes, let Mr. Speer compare what his ministers in the United States get with the modest allowance, ironically called 'congruous,' which our priests receive. Then shall we see who seek first the kingdom of God. Further we will say to Mr. Speer, in answer to the mass of vile insinuations contained in his article, that Chile is not only Christian but also civilized and would not tolerate for one moment the presence of a priesthood such as is pictured in that apocryphal papal letter. It seems to us that a Christian propagandist ought to observe the natural virtues of sincerity and justice, without which there can be no evangelical virtue at all.

"At all events, with religion or without it, no man of honor will fail to keep the commandment, 'Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.' If up there in the North there are propagandists who are not gentlemen, let Mr. Speer devote his zeal to their conversion, for charity begins at home and Chile can afford to wait."

El Mercurio descends to particulars, giving names and details of the work undertaken by the Chilean clergy for the relief of the poor and the pest-stricken and in the cause of temperance and concludes: "Who supplied Mr. Speer with his information about Chile? In Valparaiso where he got it only they could have deceived him so shamelessly who are enemies of Chile or sectarians with whom to slander an opponent is to serve God or country or both."

We regret that, in spite of a large extra edition of the issue of April 9, in which the Roosevelt incident was chronicled, we have been unable to supply the demand for copies of AMERICA of that week. The record of the event will, however, be reprinted in an early issue of "The Catholic Mind."

The Department of Commerce and Labor's Report for March, 1910, of the foreign trade of the United States, shows for the first time in fifteen years an unfavorable balance. But twice before has this balance against us, $19,254,000, been overtopped by the returns of our foreign trade for March: in 1869 by the eagerness of foreign capital to take advantage of our paralyzed industries following the civil war, and in 1893, by the menace of a panic, the disastrous effects of which are still in evidence. But an even more portentous feature of the present Report is the evidence it adduces of the spread of the national sin of extravagance, public and private. Never before now has the detailed statement of imports contained so overwhelming a preponderance of luxuries. No wonder the discontent of the poor is growing and that the sweep of dangerous economic and social principles is spreading. In a desperate strait the average man is willing to try any scheme which promises to bring him relief from a condition that has come to be intolerable.

RELIGION IN THE INDIAN SCHOOLS.

The following general regulations for religious worship and instruction of pupils in Government Indian schools were issued March 12, 1910, from the Office of Indian Affairs, Department of the Interior:

1. Pupils shall be directed to attend the respective Churches to which they belong or for which their parents or guardians express a preference.

2. Should a question arise as to which Church pupils belong, they shall be classed as belonging to a certain denomination as follows:

(a) Those whose names are to be found on the baptismal record of said denomination, or who have been formally received as members of such denomination, or who belong to families under its instructions, except where the children are under 18 years of age and parents or lawful guardians make written request that the child be instructed in some other religion.

(b) Those who, regardless of previous affiliations, Christian or pagan, having attained the age of 18 years, desire to become members of any denomination.

(c) Those of any religion whatever, under 18 years of age (or over that age, unless they make voluntary protest), whose parents or lawful guardians, by written request, signify their desire that their children shall be reared in a certain denomination.

3. Ample provision shall be made for the conveyance of those who are too young or unable to walk in cases where the Church services are held at a distance from the school. Hours of services are to be agreed upon between the attending pastor and the superintendent. Where these services can not be held in or near the school on Sunday, the pupils must be sent to Church on week days, provided arrangements can be made between the attending pastor and the superintendent so as not to conflict with regular school duties.

4. Pupils shall not change Church membership without the knowledge of the superintendent and consent of parents or guardians.

5. Pupils who belong to no Church are encouraged to affiliate with some denomination—preference being left to the pupil if he be 18 years of age or to the parent or guardian if the child be under 18 years of age.

6. Proselyting among pupils by pastors, employees or pupils is strictly forbidden.

7. Method and promptness and a pervasive desire to co-operate with the discipline and aims of the school must characterize the work of those to whom the spiritual interests of the pupils are intrusted.

8. Two hours on week days are allowed each Church authority for religious instruction, the hours to be decided upon by superintendent and pastor.

9. Each Sunday all pupils belonging to a certain denomination shall attend the Sunday school taught, either at the school or in a near-by church, when by mutual consent of the attending pastor and superintendent such a place has been selected.

10. Pupils will have every facility in attending Confession, preparatory classes, and Communion by handing their names to their religious instructors, and these in turn shall hand their names to the matron or disciplinarian—this as a precaution to account for the presence of the pupil.

11. Truancy, tardiness, or misconduct on the part of pupils attending Church or Sunday school, either away from or at the school, must be promptly reported to the superintendent.

12. For special services in Church or at the school, special permission, granted at least a day in advance, must always be procured from the superintendent.

13. In the general school assembly exercises, as distinguished from the several Sunday school exercises under separate denominational control, the following only must be observed for the strictly religious part:

(a) Substitute the Revised Version for the King James Version of the Bible, for scriptural readings, and confine these to the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles.

(b) Either form of the Lord's prayer as given in the Revised Version.

(c) For song exercises use the "Carmina for Social Worship," omitting the following hymns: Nos. 106, 108, 110, 111, 119, 161 and 165.

(d) These assembly exercises are to be conducted by the superintendent of the school, or some employee or pupil designated by him, but not a minister or priest unless the superintendent should be one, in which case he acts ex officio.

(e) The privilege of addressing the school at these exercises will be cordially offered to all ministers and priests, but doctrinal instructions or denominational teachings must not be permitted.

14. Regular and compulsory attendance is demanded on the part of all pupils at the regular assembly exercises conducted by the superintendent of the school.

15. Superintendents shall be required to carry out these regulations. They are required not only to co-operate loyally with this Office in holding the balances equally between all Churches, granting them equal privileges and excluding special privilege, but must not under any circumstances allow their personal prejudices or Church affiliations to bias them in any way.

R. G. Valentine, Commissioner.

Rev. William H. Ketcham, director of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, is of the opinion that the above regulations will prove a great blessing for Catholic Indian Missions in Government schools. "They are not in every respect what we, as Catholics, would wish for Catholic children, but are a vast improvement on the regulations of the past," said Father Ketcham, "and I am sure that we can never expect to have broader and more favorable ones."

"The objectionable features have been reduced to a minimum. Practically, Catholic pupils are absolutely exempt from services held by preachers and from non-Catholic Sunday Schools. Their physical presence at the assembly exercises, from which the features most revolting to Catholic sensibilities have been eliminated, is all that remains of enforced Protestantism, and many Catholics think it is better to submit to this than to insist that the school as a school should not recognize the Christian religion at all. Each Church represented among the children has the right and obligation of caring for the religious worship and needs of the children."

"While these regulations are exceedingly fair and place all religions on an equal footing, strange to say, the Protestants have objected to them most strenuously, and had, as it was represented to the Indian Office, seventeen different denominations interested in Indian work who were opposed to the leading features of these regulations. Later, the representation was made that fifteen denominations were in opposition to these regulations."

"They objected to the compulsory feature especially, and it was contended that the Government should not compel any child to attend any 'denominational service,' but it should compel all children to attend a Christian service—a 'non-sectarian service,' of course.

"I, on the other hand, contended that in these schools the Government stands in loco parentis—that it has assumed the obligations and duties of parents, and that it should exercise parental rights and compel children to attend the churches to which they belong, or to which or for which their parents or guardians express a choice.

"On the whole, we are well pleased with the regulations and think they will result in a great benefit to all the children and to the schools themselves."

LITERATURE

The Indian and His Problem, by FRANCIS E. LEUPP. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. Price $2.00 net.

A former United States Commissioner of Indian Affairs has taken the reading public into his confidence and has presented it with the fruit of his own study and observation and his own harassing trials. What the Indian was, what he is, what he will become—these are the great divisions of a work which shows on every page intelligent sympathy with him and an earnest purpose to promote his best interests. No words are wasted in empty declamation. The author goes to the root of the difficulty, shows how the Indians were treated when they were looked upon as domestic yet independent nations, lays bare some of the rascality with which the department was well-nigh honeycombed, relates the generous but mistaken efforts of philanthropists to handle a subject of which they knew nothing, and presents the more inviting picture of what an enlightened public policy is now attempting to do, to atone for the mistakes of the past.

We are gratified to note that our preference for schools in Indian towns and for industrial education which may be of some practical use toward gaining a livelihood are in complete accord with the result of his riper and wider experience. The chapter on "Theory and Fact in Education" might well be studied by many educators who are not in charge of Indians, though it speaks with most telling force to those who have the welfare of the red man at heart. His remarks on co-education should be graven on plates of brass for a perpetual remembrance.

His severest condemnation falls upon the practice of taking (we might say kidnapping) Indian children, shipping them far away to a different climate and there training them for years in branches of study that they can never utilize when they return to their own. Back on the reservation, they feel estranged from their kindred, they miss the electric light and steam heat, and they end by lounging around until the day for Government payments gives them a chance for a celebration. Many schemes for the betterment of the Indian have been suggested and tried on the hapless objects of their attention. Some have been as wild as that of the philanthropic Englishman who proposed a society for furnishing ulsters and overshoes to the Fiji Islanders. And the result of them all is that the Government must now begin at the beginning and teach the young Indian how to earn his keep.

The author's preference for mission schools (p. 30) as distinguished from Government schools is sustained by well-chosen arguments. The confusion that must result in the Indian's mind from the variety of precept and practice which he sees in various religious bodies has its counterpart in China as it has, for that matter, among very many of the whitest of the white Americans. One missionary, said an observant Indian father, threatened the little redskins with future punishment if they played their harmless games on Sunday; another missionary sanctified the same day by devoting a part of it to tennis. The unsophisticated parent was in a quandary. But he was speechless when a Mormon missionary with four wives assured him that such a thing was pleasing to God, and a Protestant preacher with one wife gave one as the limit of matrimonial venture, and a priest told him that God would be displeased if the priest tried to divide his time between mission work and a wife. Whoever wishes to think and speak understandingly of the Indian question, which has been a problem since the days of Washington, ought to study Mr. Leupp's admirable book.

History of Medieval Philosophy, by MAURICE DE WULF, translated by P. COFFEY, D.Ph. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

A reaction has set in in favor of the philosophy of the Schools. It began somewhat less than a century ago, the pioneer work being done by such men as Fathers Kleutgen, Liberatore, Sanseverino, Cardinal Zigliara and others. Their chief aim was to give to the world a true presentation of the doctrine of St. Thomas; thus they hoped once more to enthrone scholasticism in its rightful place; for St. Thomas is the representative of genuine scholasticism. This movement received fresh impetus by the encouragement and sanction given it by the Apostolic See. It will always be one of the brightest jewels in the tiara of Leo XIII, that he proposed St. Thomas as the model on which Christian philosophers should form themselves. The present reigning pontiff is in full accord with his predecessor in promoting the study of the Angelic Doctor; for he clearly sees that this will materially aid him in realizing the motto which he set before himself on his accession to the Pontificate, "to renew all things in Christ."

Those pioneer workers in the cause of scholasticism have lately been joined by a new force, whose special purpose it is to unearth the buried treasures of the wisdom of the Middle Ages, and to harmonize them with the requirements of modern science. This harmonization must be possible, since truth cannot be opposed to truth. All that is required to bring it about are skilful workmen who know how to handle the tools prepared by their predecessors. This new force enlisted on behalf of scholasticism, is known as the Philosophical Institute of Louvain, founded by the illustrious Archbishop of Mechlin, Cardinal Mercier. Of this famous Institute, the writer of the book under review, Prof. Maurice de Wulf, is one of the most distinguished members and active workers. We feel confident that the "History of Medieval Philosophy" will go far towards accomplishing the object of the Institute, to reinstate scholasticism in its former place of honor, and to demonstrate the substantial harmony of its basic principles with the discoveries of modern science.

It is a pleasure, indeed, to review a book in which there is hardly anything except what is worthy of commendation. The "History of Medieval Philosophy" is a splendid exposition of the fortunes of scholasticism—of its rise, its successive steps of development, its culminating glory, its gradual decline and its final decay. The author opens his history with a brief review of the philosophical systems prior to the rise of Medieval Philosophy, in order to show to what extent the Schoolmen are indebted to the past for their teachings. He then proceeds to unfold the various phases of scholastic lore. Frequent critical observations are added to guide the reader to the right appreciation of the doctrines expounded. In the arrangement of the material the proper perspective is never lost sight of, the space allotted to the divers systems being always proportionate to their importance. Hence it is that the great synthesis of St. Thomas stands out most prominently; for it is the pivotal point of scholasticism. All along, due regard is paid to contemporaneous systems antagonistic to the teaching of the Schools, in order to set forth the mutual interaction between them and scholastic tenets.

To crown all, the work under review is written in a graceful, flowing style, sometimes rising even into poetic diction. In the perusal of the volume, one is struck with the vast amount of erudition displayed and the indications of painstaking research everywhere in evidence. Much skill has also been shown in condensing entire systems into a few lines or paragraphs. So difficult a task is this, that it may account for occasional rapid transitions and for statements, here and there, which it requires considerable mental effort to grasp. The full bibliography annexed to the end of chapters and sections, will prove a most useful help to those who wish to pursue the study of Medieval Philosophy still further or verify the writer's statements.

The author must be congratulated on having found so able a translator as Prof. P. Coffey, D.Ph., of Maynooth College. On the whole, we deem the "History of Medieval Philosophy" a monumental work. A careful examination of the book leads one to the conclusion that in giving it to the public, the author has erected to himself a "monumentum ære perennius."

A. ROTHER, S.J.

Crete, the Forerunner of Greece. By C. H. and H. HAWES. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price 75 cents.

Thirty years ago the world of learning was amazed and looked askance at the discoveries of Henry Schliemann, which it was forced in the end to accept, although in doing so it had to give up numbers of preconceived theories concerning early Greek culture. And to-day, once again, scholars are called upon to revise their theorizing by the startling discoveries made on the Island of Crete in a series of recent excavations, which go to prove that the home of the first European civilization within Ægean area originated there. The only wonder is that archæologists did not long ago turn their attention to Crete as a possible field of inquiry, in view of the fact that legends and semi-historical references pointed to the island (the last port of call between Europe and Egypt) as having played an important role in the most ancient of ancient times.

The Cretan excavations have been going on for a number of years, carried along purely scientific lines, and have yielded the fact that the soil is teeming with pre-Hellenic antiquities, thus proving that Crete was "the forerunner of Greece." All that has been done to date, in the way of exploration, has been carefully summarized in a small book, just published by Harper & Brothers, written by two well-known archæologists who actively participated in the wonderful discoveries that have been made: C. H. and H. Hawes, husband and wife. In fact Mrs. Hawes (Harriet Body), acting for the American Exploration Society of Philadelphia, discovered the city of Gourina, the most complete pre-Hellenic town yet uncovered on the Island of Crete.

The book is intended to give simply a glimpse of the Minoan world, the "Greece beyond Greece," in order to interest the general reader in the subject, and also as a safe guide to visitors. It is carefully written, and adheres to facts, except in the matter of chronology, which seems to be more arbitrary than scientific. City after city has been uncovered: Knossos, Phæstos, Palæocastro and a number of others, places which were in their glory years and years before the golden age of Athens. The excavations and the objects found make it plain that the inhabitants were cultured people and in full possession of many of the arts and crafts in which the Greeks in after times were so proficient: architecture, painting, sculpture, mosaic, engraving of precious stones, the chasing and repousse of metals, the moulding and ornamentation of pottery, the weaving and embroidering of cloth.

The Minoans, like others of the ancients, wrote their archives upon clay tablets, of which thousands have been found but have not been deciphered, for as yet no one has discovered the key to the writing, which has some analogies to the Hittite system. There is every reason to believe that the day is not far distant when these tablets will have to give up their secrets; then we shall know what these people of Crete thought, as we now know how they looked, dressed and lived.

Simon Bolivar, "El Libertador." By F. LORRAINE PETRE. New York: The John Lane Company. Price $4.20, postpaid.

This is the portrayal with knifelike keenness of a career in which vainglory, despotism, cruelty and lust successfully struggled together in discordant unison for the mastery of the nobler aspirations of a strong, resourceful mind. The struggle, many-sided and unequal, began in the mere youth and raged until, prematurely old, racked with bodily ailments and abandoned and hated of many who had groveled before him, the world-weary Liberator, being then in his forty-eighth year, reached the end of his tumultuous life. The introductory chapter on the mistaken and short-sighted method of governing, which Spain obstinately pursued in her American dominions, explains the political unrest that must have leavened nearly all the better class of native subjects; while the peculiar and perplexing combinations arising from the mixture of the white, red and black races aggravated the social condition and effectually prevented oneness of thought and action.

Bolivar was a creole. Born in Caracas, Venezuela, in 1783, of parents who traced their unbroken descent from distinguished families of old Spain, his early boyhood was spent under the care of the best masters that the city could furnish. He was little more than a boy when he began that feverish study of political questions which ended in his own transient aggrandizement and in the overthrow of Spain's enfeebled authority in South America. Bolivar was the Liberator. Yes, as far as doing away with the remnants of the royal prerogative of Ferdinand VII is concerned, Bolivar has the glory. But his attempt to set up any just and stable government in its stead was a complete failure.

Whatever his political theories may have been, he did not, and perhaps could not, establish representative government. He spurned the proffered title of Emperor of the Andes, yet he ruled with more than Bourbon absolutism and saw in fancy his sway extended to all Spanish South America. His power was in the sword. Fire, pillage and bloodshed marked his meteoric course. In him there was little to love, much to fear. His memory is not enshrined in the affections of the people. If, with all the flamboyant patriotism to which the Castilian tongue lends itself so readily, the people hail him as the Liberator, they exalt the man of resistless, relentless energy, not the solicitous father of his people: his hands were too deeply dyed with the blood of massacre.

With painstaking accuracy, the author traces Bolivar's life day by day, one might say, up to the last moment when he breathed his last in the arms of Bishop José M. Estevez of Santa Marta. Incidentally as it were, yet conclusively he demonstrates from the nature and temperament of the people the folly of hoping to find or found a Latin American republic in which manhood shall be the sole or chief qualification for exercising the suffrage. The gaps between creole and mestizo, Indian and zambo, can not be closed in a day. Issued on the eve of centennial celebrations of independence in nearly all parts of Latin America, "Simon Bolivar" is a history of the greatest of the revolutionary movements which drove Spain from the mainland and is a fair representation of the others.

H. J. S.

Desiderata—Nach Fünf Jahren. ERZÄHLT VON AUGUSTE V. LAMA. New York: Frederick Pustet. Price 75 cents.

Two novelettes of girl life bound together into one volume. The stories are graphically told, the characters strongly and sympathetically delineated, and the noblest Christian ideals ever kept before our eyes.

The author opens with an account of convent days only to lead us on to that most critical of all periods, when the convent gates swing open for the last time, to send forth their ward into a world so different from that which hitherto she had learned to know and love.

A more particular reference to the second of these narratives may prove of interest. The scene opens with the reception into the sodality of three candidates from the upper classes. They promise, at Sister Dominica's request, each to write her a letter after five years shall have elapsed. The varied experiences crowded into these five years form three most vivid chapters. At last the fifth year arrives, and with it come three letters to Sister Dominica's desk.

The first is edged in black. It is not written by the hand she had known so well, for that hand lies still and cold beneath the sod, far in a foreign land; but the heart of the sodalist had not forgotten her, and this is its last message at the end of a stormy life. The second consists of eight closely written pages. The writer had intended to carry out her promise orally, for was she not to be a nun behind those self-same cloistral walls with the dear Sister?—but all that was five years ago, and now she has just entered on her honeymoon, and her letter is filled with rapture. The last is from the madcap, passionate, queenly Victoria, whom society had awaited with open arms. One thing alone she had never dreamed of "Non Monaca, non Monaca!" she had exclaimed in terror to the Holy Father, when in an audience he laughingly had asked what should be made of her. "Non monaca?—O come Dio vuole!" had been the old man's sweet reply. A picture now fell from the folds of her letter. It was a picture of St. Teresa. In a convent of St. Teresa's order Victoria had assumed the veil and there had found at last the peace and joy of God.

Literary Notes

Brimful of energy and hope, The Missionary for April comes with its message of cheer. The line of battle is long, very long, and the ranks need recruits if the cause of the Church is to be presented properly to the citizens of the United States. We cannot give vocations to the priesthood but we can develop them. More priests is the cry. "Let us keep this appeal for priests ringing in the ears and echoing into the hearts of American Catholics, through pulpit, press and platform, through the voice of the spiritual director and the sweet insistence of the Catholic teacher in the Catholic school. The result will be vocations and foundations for the education of priests. God will be better served and America will be converted." Amen, say we. Notes from the field telling of the good accomplished make the future look encouraging.

What may almost be called an official life of the late Cardinal Vaughan is in preparation, and will be published about the date of the consecration of Westminster Cathedral next June. The work is in the hands of Mr. Snead Cox, the editor of the Tablet, who has had placed at his disposal an immense mass of material, including important documents from the records of Cardinal Vaughan's foundation, the Missionary College of Mill Hill, and from the archives of the dioceses of Salford and Westminster.

The Irish Texts Society has in press an edition in three volumes, edited by Rev. J. MacErlean, S.J., of the poems of David O'Bruadair, who lived during the siege of Limerick, 1690, and gave a vivid picture of the times; also three romances translated into Irish in 1706 from the Spanish of Juan Perez de Montabor, by Father Manus O'Donnell; and a third volume of the poems of Egan O'Rahilly, revised by Tadhg O'Donoghue. "Ireland from the Union to Catholic Emancipation" is the title of a new volume based on unpublished documents in the State Papers of Dublin Castle.

Regarding the Charlemagne manuscript which he recently discovered in the Vatican, Cardinal Rampolla says: "There can be no doubt as to its genuineness. It is well known also that he had often expressed himself in poetry, and a good example of his composition and style is the epitaph on Pope Stephen. The discovered document is an elegy on the death of his son, written in Latin, and when found was in two pieces, the joining of which was a laborious task."

In the Irish Book Lover, No. 7, Rev. Stephen Browne, S.J., Clongowes Wood College, County Kildare, asks the help of interested readers in completing a "Readers' Guide to Books on Ireland," which he has in preparation. It will consist of a classified list of books dealing with Ireland and the Irish, with a descriptive note for each title. The fictional section has already 520 titles and notes and the historical list 300. Messrs. D. J. O'Donoghue, Grattan Flood, Dr. McCaffrey of Maynooth and others are collaborating with Father Browne.

An Irish Opera, "Eithne," by Robert O'Dwyer, which had a successful performance in Dublin recently, is being prepared for publication. Father O'Neill, S.J., of the National University, says: "It is the finest thing in opera ever done by an Irishman, more profound and solid and much more Irish than anything of Balfe or Wallace."

The centennial celebrations of the Argentine Republic in May and of Mexico in September give timeliness to Dr. Warren Currier's sketch of the causes, progress and results of Spanish-American independence in The American Catholic Quarterly Review.

"Edmond Rostand and His Works" is the opening number of the April Irish Monthly. It is entirely eulogistic of the literary productions of the French dramatist.

PASTORAL LETTER OF THE FIRST CANADIAN PLENARY COUNCIL.

"The Pastoral Letter of the Fathers of the First Plenary Council of Quebec—September 19th to November 1st, 1909," was published on the 8th of the present month. This lucid and exhaustive pronouncement "on the Christian Spirit in the Individual, in the Family and in Society" is addressed to all Catholics, clergy and laity, throughout Canada, and is signed by the entire Canadian hierarchy: the Archbishop of Ephesus, the Most Rev. Donatus Sbarretti, Apostolic Delegate, and six other Archbishops; twenty-seven Bishops, of whom four are Vicars Apostolic, two Auxiliaries, and one Coadjutor; one Prefect Apostolic, and three Administrators of vacant sees. We here give a digest of its forty-one pages.

The Introduction states that the chief pastors of Canada, "after having confided their deliberations to the guidance of the Holy Ghost, and called to their consultations men most noteworthy for erudition, wisdom and piety, have enacted such decrees as they judged to be the most conducive to the spiritual welfare of the faithful committed to their care. These decrees, after having been submitted to the supreme authority of Rome will be made public, to be thenceforward a guide for your faith and a rule for your conduct." Thanking the faithful for their prayers which have been heard in the harmony and successful issue of the Council, the entire Canadian hierarchy exhorts them to receive this letter, as the common voice of the Episcopate, with respect, and to ponder carefully its teachings. "Taking our inspiration," say the Fathers of the Council, "from the admirable program which Pius X traced for himself at the outset of his Pontificate, and convinced with him that there is no salvation for either individual or society, that does not rest on that foundation 'which is laid, which is Christ Jesus,' we join our voice to his in exhorting you to 're-establish all things in Christ,' and to engrave the indelible impress of His spirit upon your private, your domestic, and your social life."

The great duty of a Christian is constantly to reproduce in his own life the essential features of the Saviour. Hence follows the duty of studying this Divine Model. How few are those who endeavor to study His actions, to drink in His words and to commune with Him in intimate and holy familiarity. A craving for profane sciences is freely indulged; it is considered a source of legitimate pride to know all about the people that attract public attention. But of Jesus Christ, His divine personality, His precepts and counsels, what definite knowledge is possessed by the generality of men? Under the plea of presenting Christ to us in a new light, more in conformity with human science, the so-called Modernists portray for us but an unseemly caricature of the Saviour. Far other is the Christ whom the Church adores and whom the Gospels and tradition represent to us. His spirit is unalterably opposed to the spirit of the world which He relentlessly condemned. His example and teaching breathe humility and obedience, whereas the world lauds false independence and insubordination. It is because His Church is a nursery of discipline and obedience that she has strewn the ages with works that perish not. The spirit of Christ is, moreover, one of self-denial and of sacrifice, opposed to the ever-growing worldly love of comfort, the eager quest of pleasure, the alarming increase of luxury which swallows up the fruits of labor, breeds dissatisfaction and inflames the most wicked passions. Christians should remember that the Gospel is inseparable from the Cross, and they should therefore accept with cheerful hearts the law of penance, which for sinful man is a law of resurrection and of life.

But in order to the strengthening of the will which these supernatural virtues presuppose prayer is absolutely necessary. In the supernatural order our soul's life looks to grace alone for support and grace is granted to him that asks for it. It is good for the Christian to lay aside from time to time his occupations, lift his thoughts to God, and refresh his soul with heavenly discourse. The food of our souls is Holy Communion. "Except you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, you shall not have life in you." The decree on daily communion, issued four years ago by our much beloved Pontiff, Pius X, has produced an irresistible movement of faith and love that is leading back the faithful to the Eucharistic Jesus.

The family, like the heart of the individual Christian, is a sanctuary that should be consecrated and sanctified by religion. It is an error altogether too common nowadays and extremely ruinous to souls, to think that one can serve two masters, by accommodating his conscience to opposite codes of morality. The stability and happiness of the Christian home depend entirely on the indissolubility of the marriage tie. The respect due to the inviolable and sacred matrimonial union places Catholic husbands and wives under special obligations. Husbands should devote to their homes all the time that business and social duties leave at their disposal. Wives should not allow social work, although now more necessary than ever, to interfere with those home duties for which nature and Providence have especially fitted them.

The training of children is truly the supreme duty, even as it is the great glory, of parents. The domestic hearth is the child's first school, in which Christian parents, knowing that their children have come from God and must return to Him, take pains to develop in them deep faith and habits of prayer. Then they send them to Catholic schools, avoiding, at all costs, as most dangerous, those schools in which all beliefs are treated as equal.

Besides being part of a family, man is a member of society, whether civic, provincial or national. Whatever be your office in civil society, fulfil it with integrity, holding the common good above your personal advantage, taking always as a guide your conscience as Catholics. Vote with wisdom and honesty. To sell one's vote is to sell one's conscience and to dishonor the fair name of citizen. Catholic legislators should bear in mind that the Church, while admitting the supremacy of the civil power within the limits of its own sphere, is herself supreme within her own domain, and demands that all her rights be respected.

As the press is the chief and largely the sole educator of the multitude, and as bad newspapers far surpass good ones in number and in influence, the responsibility of the Catholic journalist is as great as his apostolate is fruitful. He must confront error with truth and counteract the poison of evil reading by the antidote of wholesome and interesting articles. He must rise above party interests when those of religion are at stake.

Among the social plagues which the Fathers of the Council expose and combat at considerable length and with convincing arguments are: (1) intemperance, which paves "the way to every abasement, physical, intellectual and moral;" (2) mixed marriages, which are the cause of great losses to the Church, and which may be prevented by proper care on the part of parents to forestall the danger by avoiding occasions for meetings that may lead to such unions; (3) "secret societies more or less directly allied to freemasonry, which, under a variety of names, strive with the same untiring persistency to wipe out Catholicism from the face of the earth;" and (4) neutral associations, professing religious neutrality, which, although not yet under the formal ban of the Church, may some day deserve condemnation and thus expose such Catholics as have imprudently joined them to the painful alternative either of relinquishing the savings they have entrusted to these neutral societies, or of abandoning the practice of their religion.

The Letter concludes with the hope that the principles it embodies may guide all Canadian Catholics in their private and public life, and thus bring about the re-establishment of all things in Christ.

EDUCATION

The syllabus, prepared by the public school authorities of New York State for grammar schools after the present year, is meeting wide approval. That a six years' course of work is best adapted for primary grades is agreed upon by educators as a solution of the problem of the long time now demanded by the courses of secondary and higher schools. If students be ready to begin their high school work two years earlier than heretofore, their further training in the professional school or college will have been completed at an age compatible with a fairly early entrance upon their chosen life work. As was noted in this column, in the issue of February 19, the revised syllabus is satisfactory, as well, from an educational standpoint. The work to be accomplished in its primary grades can be fully attended to in six years. True, many fads of recent introduction will be dropped, but they will be replaced profitably by the restoration to their former importance of the three R's. The progress claimed for prevalent programs of primary grade studies does not appeal to many as an advance from good to better.

It is a mistake to crowd into work assigned for these years a series of topics useful, indeed, and in themselves educational, but which suppose a receptivity far in advance of the initial years of school training. Physiology, for instance, is a subject upon which stress is laid in most recent schedules of primary work. It is, too, one regarding whose fundamental notions children should have some information. But is it not better to impart this information through the occasional word of parent or teacher, than to oblige children to study the subject from a text-book which they can scarcely understand? Similarly subjects pertaining to science and mathematics beyond the capacity of primary students occur in these programs.

Modern educators urge better "co-ordination" of schoolwork. To effect this they speak of "drawing down the higher schools to meet more closely the lower grades." In the process that follows, the elements, at least, of science and of mathematics are required in primary grades, while fuller treatment is reserved for secondary schools. In consequence primary pupils labor with little benefit to themselves and with a loss of time that should be devoted to work of which they are capable. Better far a return to the old method of insistent drill in the three R's in primary schools. With these the pupil is ready for the advanced instruction of secondary classes; and those who cannot go further will, at least, have a rounded and complete training in the rudiments.

A feature of the report of colleges and universities this past year is a discussion of the problem how to keep a college educational. The question is not as readily answered as one might think. President Butler, of Columbia, a short time since, reminded us that difficulties in the way of attaining educational efficiency are not surmounted by assured material resources, such as ample endowments, buildings and equipment, nor yet by providing a competent faculty. These things alone, while admittedly important, do not meet present day influences inside as well as outside of the college, which tend to offset the formative work attempted in educational institutions. Dr. Winthrop Stone, President of Purdue University, is quite frank in the treatment of the question in his annual report to the trustees of the university. Speaking of the great varieties of activities coincident with the growth of student bodies, and developing customs, institutions and traditions innocent and valuable enough in themselves, he explains how they become an absorbing feature of student life and tend to weaken the forces which the university employs to attain its true purpose.

"The environment of the institution has a tendency to become mercenary in its attitude as the larger number of students brings larger disbursements of money for living and recreation; the purveyors of amusements offer inducements for wasteful expenditure of time and money; society advances its claims; the physical environment of the university may expose the student body to unsanitary conditions of living or to contagious diseases; and finally, immorality and vice are alert to the possibilities of their trade among young men." The aim of the college is to produce men morally strong even more than intellectually equipped, and the question how to meet these forces and to deal with them is by no means the least important of the problems to be faced by the educator. And, though no reference to the thought is to be found in the reports to which reference is here made, it is a problem which the Catholic feels must be solved in most part by the salutary influence of religion in education. The development of a sense of duty will be the best means to deal with such forces, and the sense of duty without religious motive is unthinkable.

A memorial, signed by over 2,000 students and graduates, praying that Irish be made a compulsory subject for matriculation for all Irish-born students, was considered, March 31, by the Faculties of the National University, and on the motion of Dr. Douglas Hyde, was approved. The Board of Studies has since decided that Gaelic shall be compulsory at some period of the University course.

SOCIOLOGY

The American Society for Visiting Catholic Prisoners has just published its fourteenth annual report. Its work is within the state of Pennsylvania, chiefly in Philadelphia, where it visits the Eastern Penitentiary, Moyamensing and Holmsburg Prisons. To the first it made 327 visits, visiting 5,758 Catholic prisoners, to whom it has made 127,725 individual visits during fourteen years. Moyamensing Prison was visited 84 times and 1157 Catholic prisoners were visited. The committee appointed to visit Holmsburg have difficulties put in their way by the regulations of the Board of Inspectors, who forbid all visiting on Sunday and public holidays. The same rule holds at Moyamensing, and its visitors have to take time from their business to perform this work of charity. The State Assembly passed an Act in 1909 to remedy this, but the superintendents decline to act until the Prison Inspectors change their regulations. The Visiting Committees distribute pictures, rosaries, scapulars, crucifixes, Catholic newspapers, etc., prepare prisoners for the Sacraments, and strive to help them after their release. A contribution of fifty dollars entitles one to be enrolled as a benefactor. The address of the Treasurer is: Ignatius J. Dohan, P. O. Box 15, Philadelphia.

The St. Francis Hospital, New York, under the charge of the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis, sends us its forty-fourth annual report. Each year shows an increase in the number of afflicted poor to whom the Sisters minister. With the exception of tuberculosis and incurable cases, none is denied admission no matter what his faith may be, for the Sisters count it their privilege to care for those who are least able to help themselves. The number of patients on January 1, 1909 was 302. 2,372 were admitted during the year. 2,148 were discharged and 240 died during the year, leaving 286 in the hospital on January 1, 1910. Exclusive of the number of patients admitted in a dying condition, the death rate was only 5.4 per cent. It is needless to say that funds are greatly needed for this most worthy charity.

Mr. John Mitchell, the labor leader, in a recent lecture on the Labor Unions at Cathedral Hall, New York, to a crowded audience, was introduced by Rt. Rev. Bishop Cusack as a man who had given years of devoted study to the conditions and problems of labor and was a master of his subject, the bishop adding that the Church is heart and soul with him as it is with every man trying to help his fellow-man.

ECONOMICS

A year ago Sir Christopher Furness, the well-known English shipbuilder, entered into a co-partnership arrangement with his workmen at West Hartlepool. It was to be tried for a year, and then the question of continuing it was to be voted on. It has now been rejected by the men by a majority of 106 in a total vote of 1,090. Many did not vote. Several reasons are alleged for its rejection; but the real reason seems to be the opposition of the unions and the Socialists. Speaking for the former Mr. Barnes, M. P., said the system is inconsistent with unionism. Had it succeeded the men would have come to regard their positions in the works as secure, and would have been detached from their fellows, as is the case with the men of the South Metropolitan Gas Co., who live selfishly in a world of their own, knowing nothing of the outside world of industry. On behalf of the Socialists Mr. Keir Hardie, M. P., spoke in the same tone, adding that the profits had been divided unfairly. The large number of abstentions shows the pressure the unions put upon the men, and how little care Mr. Barnes and Mr. Hardie have for the poor is shown by their words.

During the fiscal year of 1904 the cattle exported numbered 593,000: the indications are that for the present fiscal year they will not surpass 175,000. In 1901 the fresh beef export was 350,000 pounds: this year it may reach 75 million pounds. The export of bacon in 1898 was 650 million pounds: it will be less than 180 million pounds this year. In 1906 742 million pounds of lard were exported: this year the export will be about 400 million pounds. In 1892 the wheat exported amounted to 117 million bushels: this year it will be 50 million. Of corn 209 million bushels were exported in 1900: 36 million will be exported this year.

The price of cattle in 1895 was $62 per head; in 1903 $74 per head; in 1910 $90 per head. Bacon in 1897 was 7½ cents a pound; in 1910 12 cents. Lard was 5.1 cents a pound in 1897; in 1910, 12 cents. Wheat was 58 cents a bushel in 1895; 73 cents in 1902, and $1.03 in 1910. Corn was 31 cents a bushel in 1897; 41 cents in 1900, and 70 cents in 1910. These figures show conclusively the reason of high prices; the disproportion of the supply to the demand. Europe is ready to pay high prices for food and our farmers are unable to furnish more than a fraction of what they used to ship. It is noteworthy too that their surplus for shipping would supply this country for a very short time.

The Progressive Union of New Orleans has succeeded, after three years of persistent effort, in persuading the Hamburg-

American Steamship Company to establish a direct service between Hamburg and New Orleans. The city is now making strenuous efforts to secure the Panama World's Exposition. At a mass meeting April 7, presided over by Governor Sanders and attended by the State Committee of Five Hundred, $200,000 were subscribed for preliminary expenses. It was agreed that the State Legislature should be asked for authority to impose a tax of $4,000,000 for the purposes of the Exposition, the rate for New Orleans to be double that of other portions of Louisiana.

We have received a copy of the Electrical Worker for March last, in which the editor, Mr. Peter W. Collins, speaks out very strongly and to the point against Socialism as the enemy of Trade Unionism, declaring, moreover, it to be anti-religious and un-American. Workingmen would do well to read his editorial, especially the Electrical Workers, who have been suffering much lately from Socialistic organizations within their ranks.

SCIENCE

The Georgetown College Observatory has issued a convenient table for those who would view Halley's comet with the naked eye. While primarily intended for Washingtonians, the table with slight modifications will be serviceable for persons in the Eastern states. Sunrise and cometrise are given first, and the directions where and when to look for the comet:

	Sun rises	Comet rises
April 24.....	5.22 A.M.	3.24 A.M.
April 28.....	5.17 A.M.	3.08 A.M.
May 2.....	5.11 A.M.	2.55 A.M.
May 6.....	5.07 A.M.	2.46 A.M.
May 10.....	5.02 A.M.	2.44 A.M.
May 12.....	5.00 A.M.	2.48 A.M.
May 14.....	4.58 A.M.	3.00 A.M.
May 16.....	4.56 A.M.	3.28 A.M.

To see the comet, the sky should be sufficiently dark. This will not be the case later than an hour before sunrise, and with the present brightness of the comet it will be safer to allow an hour and a half. After the comet has once been found it can be seen in a brighter sky.

Moreover, the comet should be fairly above the horizon, say five or six degrees. This is about the apparent height of the top of a three-story house, seen from a block away, on reasonably level ground, of course. The comet reaches this height above the true horizon half an hour after it has risen. One's natural horizon is apt to be somewhat higher than the true horizon.

Hence one should look for the comet not earlier than half an hour after cometrise and not later than an hour before sunrise, but better an hour and a half.

The comet will be visible in the morning until the middle of May, but at an earlier hour, as the sun is rising earlier. One can figure out when to look by the table given above.

During April, at the time the comet rises, it will be some 10 degrees north of east. Half an hour later it will be 5 degrees north of east, and an hour later nearly due east. During the first half of May it rises farther north, approaching the point where the sun rises. It can be seen from any point from which there is a view of the east, if the house tops, etc., do not cut out the lower sky.

On May 17, 18 and 19 the comet will be too nearly in line with the sun to be seen unless it should be unexpectedly brilliant. From then on it will be visible in the west in the evening as soon as it grows dark enough. On May 20 it sets two hours after the sun, and later every night; so it can be seen well then at a convenient hour.

"The Total Amount of Starlight" is investigated by G. J. Burns in the March number of The Observatory. His own method was to put a star so much out of focus in a telescope that the apparent brightness of the disk it presented was equal to that of the sky. He says that Newcomb had used a somewhat similar method, and that Kapteyn had obtained his results by a mathematical formula deduced from the known brightness and known number of stars of all magnitudes. The latest determination is by Yntema, of Groningen, Holland. His procedure was to direct a plaster of Paris disk to the sky, and illumine it by sliding a small electric lamp in front of it and noting the latter's position when the disk ceased to be visible.

These methods gave different results, the total amount of starlight deduced from them ranging from 1350 to 2000 times that of a standard first-magnitude star. The color of the sky was found to be a troublesome factor, as in non-galactic regions it is at times dark blue, at times more or less milk-white, and near the horizon grayish.

Yntema found that there was some light, which he called earth-light, which was not due to direct starlight, and which he estimated to be at times as much as fifteen times as plentiful as starlight. He said it was caused partly by the diffused light of the stars, and might be a permanent aurora or an extension of the zodiacal light. It increases toward the horizon, and is sometimes observable even when the sky is overcast. It is evident that observations on the total amount of starlight and on the brightness of the sky call for moonless nights, and for exceptionally transparent atmospheric conditions and a location far from the artificial lights of a great city.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

On April 14., at the Cathedral, Burlington, Vt., Right Rev. Joseph John Rice, of Northbridge, Mass., was consecrated bishop of the see by Right Rev. Bishop Beaven, of Springfield. Bishop Rice is the fourth bishop from the Springfield diocese to be consecrated, since 1892, the others being Bishops Conaty, of Monterey and Los Angeles, Garrigan, of Sioux City, Feehan, of Fall River, and he is the third bishop to receive consecration from the hands of Bishop Beaven. One of the chaplains of the new bishop at the consecration was Rev. Albert R. Peters, S.J., who had baptized him. Bishop Rice was born at Leicester, Mass., December 6, 1871, and on December 10 was baptized by Father Peters in St. Joseph's Church, Leicester, at that time under the charge of the Jesuit Fathers attached to Holy Cross College, Worcester. He was graduated from the Leicester Academy in 1888, entered Holy Cross College in the fall of that year, and was graduated from the college in June, 1891. He entered the Grand Seminary, Montreal, in September, and was ordained to the priesthood in Springfield, on September 29, 1894, by Bishop Beaven. He then went to Rome and made a two years' special course of theology and canon law. On May 16, 1896, he received at the Minerva his doctorate of Theology. On his return to the United States in July, 1896, he was assigned to Oldtown, Maine, a French and Indian parish, where he remained until November, 1896, being recalled thence to St. Bernard's Church, Fitchburg, under the direction of the then Father, now Bishop Feehan. This parish has given two other bishops to the Church, Garrigan and Feehan. He was afterwards transferred to Notre Dame, Pittsfield, to St. Roch's, Oxford, and to St. Patrick's Cathedral, Whitinsville. In September, 1902, he was called to fill the chair of Scholastic Philosophy at St. John's Seminary, Brighton, where he remained till 1904, when he was appointed pastor of St. Peter's, Northbridge, and here he received on January 8, 1910, the appointment to the Bishopric of Burlington. Both the consecrating prelate and the newly consecrated bishop are graduates of Holy Cross College, while the two assistant consecrators were also Holy Cross College students.

His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, the Rt. Rev. Mgr. Thomas J. Shahan, Rector of the Catholic University, and a notable gathering of college presidents, educators and scholars attended the public disputations in theology and philosophy at Woodstock College, Woodstock, Md., on April 13.

Rev. John M. Salter, S.J., a student of the college, defended the entire Catholic doctrine on the sacraments. Mr. Francis P. Le Buffe, S.J., defended the entire field of Catholic philosophy. The disputations were carried on in the Latin language and according to the usual scholastic method. Each of the auditors was furnished with a neat booklet containing the theses to be defended, and was free to enter controversy with the defendant. To ensure an adequate number of antagonists, eminent scholars were invited to enter the lists.

Those who attacked the Theological theses were: Rev. J. McHugh, O.P., S.T.L., Professor of Dogmatic Theology at the Dominican College of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, D. C.; Rev. Joseph Bruneau, S.S., D.D., Professor of Dogmatic Theology at St. Mary's Theological Seminary, Baltimore; Rev. Florentine Bechtel, S.J., Professor of Sacred Scripture and Hebrew at St. Louis University, St. Louis, Mo., and Rev. William Power, S.J., of Selma, Alabama. Against the theses in Philosophy there were: Rev. P. L. Duffy, LL.D., Litt. D., Rector of St. Joseph's Church, Charleston, S. C.; Rev. Charles A. Dubray, S.M., of the Marist Seminary, Brookland, D. C.; Rev. Francis P. Siegfried, Professor of Philosophy, St. Charles' Seminary, Overbrook, Philadelphia; Rev. G. Sauvage, C.S.C., D.D., Professor of Dogmatic Theology at the Holy Cross College, Washington, D. C.

Advices from Australasia state that at a meeting of the priests of the diocese of Auckland, on March 11, for the purpose of nominating a successor to the late Bishop Lenihan, the Rev. Dr. H. W. Cleary, editor of the New Zealand Tablet, was named as dignissimus. Dr. Cleary was in New York recently en route to Rome. He came here by way of South America, visiting there the principal cities to further the details of a scheme in which the Australian Catholic Truth Society is interested. This is to establish a chain of Catholic correspondents linking all the great cities together. When information is desired to correct misstatements, or to give original details, these centres of information are to be at all times available for the use of the Catholic Truth Society. Dr. Cleary visited several of the cities here and will make a tour of Great Britain, Ireland and the Continent during his stay abroad, which he expects will last about a year. Dr. Cleary has contributed several articles to "The Catholic Encyclopedia," and for a number of years has successfully edited The Tablet. He is also the author of a history of the Orangemen—the fanatical Protestant Society that has played so prominent a part in modern Irish history.

Impressive ceremonies marked the formal installation on April 5, in St. Mary's Church, Newark, of the Rt. Rev. Ernest Helmstetter, O.S.B., who was recently elected Abbot of St. Mary's Abbey by his brother monks of the Benedictine Order. The Rt. Rev. John J. O'Connor, D.D., Bishop of Newark, pontificated; present in the sanctuary were the Rt. Rev. James A. McFaul, of Trenton, and the Rt. Rev. John S. Monaghan, of Wilmington; the Rt. Rev. Arch Abbot Leander Schnerr, O.S.B., of St. Vincent's Arch Abbey, Latrobe, Pa., and many monsignors and dignitaries of the Benedictine order.

The Rev. Dr. H. G. Ganss, who has been in charge of St. Patrick's Church, Carlisle, Pa., for nineteen years, has been appointed immovable rector of St. Mary's, Lancaster, and successor to the late Rev. Dr. P. J. McCullagh. Dr. Ganss is a native Lancastrian, and he returns as pastor to the church of his boyhood. He was educated at St. Vincent's College, Beatty, Pa., where he received the degree of Doctor of Music in 1876, and was ordained two years later. Several brochures from his pen have appeared on Luther, the Reformation and kindred topics, and his frequent contributions to Catholic periodicals evince an accurate knowledge and keen insight on a variety of topics and interests. An article on "The Real Luther" was written by Dr. Ganss for the first volume of AMERICA.

The investiture as Domestic Prelate of the Rt. Rev. A. Bronsgeest, V.G., took place on April 3, the Rt. Rev. Bishop O'Reilly presiding. Mgr. Bronsgeest has been rector of St. Peter's Church, The Dalles, Ore., for the past thirty years. The missionary field in which he labored alone for so many years is now divided into seven parishes with resident priests.

Under the will of the late Rev. Dr. P. J. McCullagh, of Lancaster, Pa., the Little Sisters of the Poor of Philadelphia receive the munificent sum of $85,000.

By signing the general appropriation bill Governor Crothers approved the item of $5,000 for two years for St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum, near Towson, Md. Governor Crothers visited the new institution last summer, and personally complimented the Sisters in charge on their good management of the asylum.

At a recent meeting of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, held in Washington, D. C., the Rev. William Hughes, of San Jacinto, Cal., was appointed to assist the Rev. William H. Ketcham in the work of the Bureau. Father Hughes's experience with Indian Mission work will be a valuable acquisition to the Indian Bureau. He is an alumnus of the Catholic University.

The Field Afar, should it need any introduction to our readers, is the organ of the Boston archdiocesan Society for the Propagation of the Faith. Now in its fourth year, it is strong, earnest, enthusiastic. The April-May issue has an account of an East African mission centre and its new church, the pride of the district, with a glimpse of the trials of missionary and neophytes, and a description of life and manners in distant Borneo. The many illustrations all have their attractiveness, but the most taking picture is that of a little Chinese altar boy who is looking forward to the day when he may be a priest. An accompanying letter tells all about the prospective missionary. A note on priestly and religious vocations in Holland increases our admiration for our Dutch brethren in the Faith.

The Catholic population of Holland is 1,670,000 and there is one priest for every 740 Catholics.

Last year, there were 1,051 parishes and 2,404 priests.

There are 3,900 men in various religious orders as against 3,200 twelve years ago. These represent no fewer than twelve orders or societies.

The Foreign Missions are represented by the Society of the Most Sacred Heart (Tilburg), the Missioners of Steyl, of Zundert and Rosendaal, a branch of Mill Hill. There are Dutch Sisters of all kinds, reckoned at more than 20,000, and quite a little army of these is at work on the missions. Besides these Holland's missioners are now toiling, the Jesuits, in Dutch Indies; Capuchins, in Borneo; Carmelites, in Brazil; Dominicans, in Curaçoa and Porto Rico; Franciscans, in China (So. Shensi and No. Shantung) Brazil; Lazarists, in East Tcheley; Redemptorists, in Dutch West Indies, Brazil; Sacred Heart of Jesus, in New Guinea, Philippines; other missioners, in Oceania, Australia and the United States.

Mgr. J. de Becker, rector of the American College at Louvain, on a visit to Rome during the Easter holidays, presented to the Holy Father a memorial volume, edition de luxe, of the recent Jubilee festivities at the Catholic University of Louvain.

President Taft has designated the Rev. Dr. Charles Warren Carrier of the Catholic Bureau of Indian Missions to represent the United States and the Smithsonian Institution at the congress of Americanists, at Buenos Aires next month. He will also represent the Catholic University. Rev. Dr. Carrier spent some time in Spain and Cuba, and is well versed in the language and affairs of the Spanish-American republics.

PERSONAL

The Catholic Club of New York City held its annual banquet on the sixteenth inst. About one hundred and fifty members attended. The President, Frank S. Gannon, Esq., was toastmaster, having at his right the guest of honor, Archbishop Farley, of New York. His Grace made a feeling address speaking of his affection for the Club and alluding in touching words to his undying attachment to the memory of its founder, Father P. F. Dealy, S.J. He then spoke of the great work incumbent upon the Club by reason of the increase of our Catholic population, of showing to the country what we are in intelligence and moral worth, and assured the members that they had in this fulfilled his anticipations as he had expressed them at the opening of their home. Edward J. McGuire, Esq., took for his theme the obligation resting on Catholics of taking a more active part in the work of social improvement, alluding to the week-end retreats at Keyser Island as the source of his inspiration. Hon. John F. O'Connell, of Boston, spoke for the non-resident members of the Club. Calling attention to the number of Catholics in the United States, he said that the time is past for apologising for our existence and for accepting the patronage of high officials who go about the world claiming praise for their broad liberality because they have appointed one Catholic to this office, another to that. He hoped never again to see a Catholic appointed or elected to anything because he is a Catholic. But, on the other hand, he protested against any man being excluded from any office because he is a Catholic. Let the best man be chosen, and he did not doubt but that our religion would make our men the best. Frank Keenan, Esq., gave a very useful address on the relation of the Stage to the Church from the actor's point of view. He did not believe in an alliance between the two. An alliance is between equals. The Church is absolutely superior to the Stage. It is the means given us by God to save our souls, and actors like everybody else must save their souls by submitting to its teaching and laws. The actor must refuse to take part in evil plays for his own sake; but the obligation of purifying the stage does not rest on them alone. History and human nature prove that the stage will be what the public wants it to be. "I belong," he said, "to an association of actors bound to refuse their cooperation in the production of an evil play: how many Catholic men and women bind themselves to refuse to cooperate by witnessing such productions. When I see them going to such things I attribute it to a momentary lapse, but their obligation is as clear as mine."

The following supplementary editorial on the President Roosevelt incident appeared in the New York World, April 7:—

John Callan O'Loughlin, who served as a voluntary ambassador between Mr. Roosevelt and the Vatican during the late unpleasantness cables to the valued Times that "Mr. Roosevelt has always possessed a peculiar affection for the Methodists."

Of course he has, and not merely for the Methodists of the North but for the Methodists of the South: for the Free Methodists as well as for the African Methodists, for the African Union Methodists, for the Primitive Methodists, for the Wesleyan Methodists, for the Zion Union Apostolic Methodists, for the Congregational Methodists, for the Union American Methodists.

Likewise he has always possessed a peculiar affection for the Baptists—not alone the regular Baptists, but Freewill Baptists, Seventh-Day Baptists, Six-Principle Baptists, and even for the Old Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit Predestinarian Baptists.

He has always possessed a peculiar affection for the Catholics and for the Jews and for the Episcopalians and the Unitarians; for the Congregationalists and for the Christian Scientists and for the Universalists and the German Lutherans; for the Salvation Army and for the Presbyterians and for the Dutch Reformed Church and for the Hicksite Quakers; for the Seventh-Day Adventists and the Mennonites, the Moravians and the Spiritualists.

There may be individuals whom Mr. Roosevelt detests. There may be liars and malefactors and mollicoddles and weaklings and cowards and cravens and undesirable citizens whom this just man armed loathes and abominates. But there is no organized body of American citizens, exerting voting strength or political influence, for whom Mr. Roosevelt has not "always possessed a peculiar affection."

The final lecture of the course given by the Long Island Chapter, Knights of Columbus, in the new Montauk Theatre, Brooklyn, will be delivered on Sunday evening, April 24, by the Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J. The lecture will be on "Some Ideal Knights of Early Times." Father Campbell will also lecture, on April 25, at the Catholic Club, Manhattan, for the United States Catholic Historical Society, on "Pierre Esprit Radisson" Founder of the Hudson Bay Company.

The German Kaiser has signified his intention to honor the centenary of Mexican independence by presenting to the republic a life-size statue of the great explorer and scientist, Alexander von Humboldt.

OBITUARY

The Rev. Raphael Gélinas, S.J., died at the Jesuit novitiate, St. Andrew-on-Hudson on April 14. For forty years he was chaplain at Blackwell's, Randall's and Ward's islands, his appointment dating from his ordination in 1867. His work in the city institutions on the Islands was interrupted by a year's service at St. Mary's College, Montreal, in 1878, and one year, in 1872, at Frederick, Md. Father Gélinas was born November 9, 1829, at Yamachiche, near Three Rivers, Quebec. He entered the Jesuit novitiate in Canada at the age of twenty-five, and made his theological course at Fordham, N. Y., and at Georgetown University. He was a man of remarkable singleness of purpose, zeal and devotion to duty. Even when the infirmities of old age made outside work impossible, he longed for active employment in quest of souls to be saved and he consoled himself for the forced inactivity of a still cloudless mind by prayer for the living and the dead.

Very Rev. Michael Rua, Superior General of the Salesians, died in Turin, on April 6, aged 73 years. He joined the Congregation in his fifteenth year, and was secretary to the great Don Bosco, who designated him as his successor at his death in 1888. His administration during twenty-two years was most successful. The Salesians now have 4,000 priests in their society, and 500 institutions, colleges, asylums and schools under their charge.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

MODEL VENEZUELAN PRIESTS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The allusion of Father Creamer to two good Venezuelan priests working in the Archdiocese of Port of Spain, Trinidad, B. W. I., brough back to my mind many things of the past in dear, beautiful Trinidad. Father Creamer refers to dear old Fathers Alvarez and Perdomo. I knew them well long, long ago. I was then in Minor Orders and teaching for the Local Cambridge Examinations in St. Mary's College, Port of Spain. Many a time have I been honored as a guest, in the house of Father Alvarez at Maraval, one of the most beautiful spots near the above mentioned city. We spoke French and Spanish together. He is a model to priests. I looked up to him as to a martyr. He had been driven from Venezuela by the tyrant Guzman Blanco. The venerable Archbishop Guevara and Father Rodriguez (afterwards bishop of a diocese in Venezuela), shared his exile. Never would he return to be a slave to an infidel ruler. For the good of the Church in Trinidad he remained there, and never have I known a more faithful priest. Father Perdomo often came to the college, and I often had the honor of entertaining him. He was most devoted to his parish of Tumpuna and missions, and brought the Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny to several of his schools. Here are three South American priests that I have known and admired. I look back upon their lives as models of the life of the good pastor of souls. Shame upon Speer and his allies that calumniate the priests of those far distant climes! I have known hundreds of Venezuelan boys in the College, some of them petulant enough; but I never heard one of them say that the priests of Venezuela were bad. In my opinion, the South Americans of Spanish and Indian descent would give very short notice to quit to the priest that would act in the manner described by Speer. As Fathers Alvarez and Perdomo (Bishop Rodriguez died some years ago at Marseilles on his first visit to Rome) may read AMERICA in the island I loved so well, I would ask you to publish this letter therein, to remind them of the young cleric to whom they were so kind and to whom they were a model, and to show them after so many years he does not forget them.

A COMMONPLACE WONDER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Last night I was present at the ending of the three days' retreat of a Young Men's Sodality. A very commonplace occasion. But it was the circular of a great non-Catholic proselytizing society, read just before, that cast a mystical and tender glory about the ending of that retreat.

The circular had been sadly eloquent of what "they" are doing, and we, it seems, find it so hard to do. There were tales of great gymnasia, and reading rooms in crowded cities, and halls in lonely villages; of railroad libraries and sailors' rests, in home and foreign ports. There were lists of lecture courses, and Bible classes; and figures which dealt with brick and stone and money and games and books. And to be sure the question rose in our mind, as it has in many minds before:—why cannot we, with our Faith, with our clear vision of the need, with our sorrow for perverse proselytizing, and zeal for conversions to the one true faith—why cannot we make such boasts as these?

Some hours later I stood in the rear of a Sodality Hall, and listened to the closing words of the retreat. There, crowded together on the not luxurious benches, listened a throng of men various in nearly every respect, but they all were Catholics and earnest souls. No social pleasure nor fine equipment nor sports nor books helped at all to gather them together for these three days of thought and prayer; but they had been coming in just such throngs from office and store, and workshop and factory, to listen to the soberest truths of Faith, Death, Judgment, Hell and Heaven. And they listened humbly, piously, with honest and reverent eyes.

After this last instruction there was to be an admission of candidates, and a crowd of young men, bright-eyed, vigorous fellows, knelt at the railing and recited a simple Act of Consecration, and were given the medal of the Sodality. What did that mean? That these young men, with the flush of their hot youth in them, and the spell of the world all about them, were joining a society which aims first and almost exclusively at unearthly things. They were pledging themselves to monthly Communion, with all that means of a steady will and strong pursuit of heavenly-mindedness. They were promising to try and keep their hearts as clean and their lives as innocent as becomes the sworn sons of a stainless Mother, who is crowned in the Heavens.

Then my reverie grew, and I saw in that self-same city other such sodalities, each with the same bright, unearthly aim, the same more than natural promises, and the same various membership of energetic, hot-blooded men, exposed every day and hour to the full blast and flame of this world's wickedness. Then I saw sodalities in other cities, other countries, other continents! The strangeness, the superhuman strangeness and beauty of it all dawned slowly upon me, from the commonplace forms and work-a-day surroundings. These men move in a world which sneers at unworldliness, smiles at simple faith and yearns for the sensible and the delightful, for what it can touch and grasp and see. Yet they are not moved to their hard and pure allegiance to the Queen of Heaven by much present gain or genial fellowship, or bright assembly rooms, or social gatherings. They like all these things and have them, in some measure, and it is very desirable no doubt that they should have them more and more. But the beauty and glory of their fellowship lies just in this: that it is independent of all temporal gain, an unpurchased fealty, a supernatural service—surely a high and holy and a strange phenomenon in this sadducean world.

I lifted my head. The bricks and stones and books and games—good and worthy helps though they are—did not shine quite so brightly now, beside the glory of those many forms bowed at the shrine of Mary. A touch of true unworldliness—this after all is rare and wonderful on the earth!

CHRONICLE

A New Justice.—Governor Hughes, of New York, has been nominated by the President Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. The nomination is received with general satisfaction by public men, regardless of party affiliations.

Killing Frosts in West and South.—A situation, which Superintendent Cox of the Weather Bureau in Chicago designated as one of the most serious in his experience, ruled in the West and South early in the week. Snow and freezing weather throughout the district destroyed the remnant of the fruit and berry crops which had survived the heavy frost of the week before. The loss to the fruit crop is estimated at $20,000,000; Michigan, Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Missouri, Minnesota and Nebraska are the chief sufferers. As the area of remarkably low temperature extended as far south as the Carolinas, Mr. Cox declared that the only chances for a supply of fruit that he could see were in the Colorado districts and those west of Colorado. In the Northwest grain crops were badly damaged, but reports affirmed the soil to be in fine condition and it is happily not too late for reseeding. Snow covered Georgia on Monday, and this together with severe weather in other Southern States has wrought great damage to cotton, diminishing the already slight prospects of an increased supply.

Steel Workmen Insured.—The United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries have announced an increase of pay, estimated at $9,000,000 annually, for their employees, and have published the details of a plan for the relief of those injured at work and the families of men killed. The plan will be put in operation May 1 for a year's test and its continuance will depend on its success. The cost will be several millions a year and employees will not contribute. For permanent injuries payment will be based upon the nature of the injury and the yearly wages of the victim. When an employee is killed, his family will receive a sum equal to his wages for a year and a half with an additional allowance for each child under sixteen. Announcement is also made that a plan for pensioning disabled and superannuated employees will soon be put into effect.

Sugar Trust in Far West.—Investigation of the Sugar Trust and its methods has been instituted in San Francisco by the United States Grand Jury. Underweighing of imports and a combine of sugar interests in restraint of trade are the two subjects of inquiry. The trust does business on the Pacific Coast and in the West generally under the name of the Western Sugar Refinery of San Francisco, the Missouri River being the dividing line of the selling country for the western adjunct of the trust property. The Federal officials reason that if the American Sugar Refinery people have evaded duties on sugar imports at the port of New York, there is certainly good reason to look into the conduct of its branch in California. Captain William Watson, the steamship magnate, who handles thousands of tons of sugar at the port of San Francisco, has been subpoenaed by the authorities.

Canadian Reciprocity.—Circumstances have greatly changed since March 17, 1866, when the United States declined to renew the reciprocity treaty with Canada, which had then been in operation for twelve years. Now the first proposals for a renewal come from Washington. Representatives Fish and Parsons are intensely interested in a resolution before the Ways and Means Committee which affirms that "it is the sense and judgment of this House that negotiations with Canada should be instituted at this time with a view to establishing closer commercial ties and freer trade relations with that country." The resolution orders that a copy thereof be transmitted to the President. Thus far the Ways and Means Committee has seemed little inclined to report the resolution, but Mr. Fish has secured about fifty Republican signatures to it and expects that he will have no difficulty in showing within the next week to the committee a list which will contain more than a majority of the Republicans. It is understood that the President favors the establishment of closer trade relations with Canada and is quite ready to use the Tariff Board as a means of framing reciprocity treaties and making concessions. The only serious difficulty in the way of such an agreement is the apparent unwillingness of Canada to make any material concessions to the United States.

Newfoundland.—Sir Edward Morris, Premier of Newfoundland, was in New York last Saturday on his way to The Hague. He spoke at the St. George Society's dinner that evening. Sir Edward's errand at The Hague is concerned with the arbitration next June by the Peace Tribunal of the fisheries dispute between the United States and Newfoundland. The chief point is the question whether Americans are entitled by the provisions of the treaty of 1818 to take fish in Newfoundland waters with the help of crews not made up entirely, and sometimes not made up at all, of Americans. Another important point is whether "the right to take fish on the coast" signifies only the outer coast, or includes bays, harbors and creeks. One of the minor difficulties is the refusal of Americans in Newfoundland waters to report to the customs or to pay the coast light duties levied on shipping. Sir Edward is very anxious to see reciprocity established between the United States and Newfoundland. "We have made," he said to a Sun reporter, "two reciprocity treaties with your country in twenty years. The Blaine treaty never reached the Senate and the Hague treaty reached the Senate only to be guillotined again. We still hope that good sense will effect some suitable commercial arrangement. Millions of people in the United States need our fresh cod, the finest in the world, and it can be landed in New York at three cents a pound. It is only the opposition of the Massachusetts fishermen that makes us unable to supply the people of the United States with this cheap article of food." Sir Edward added that the revenues of Newfoundland had doubled in the last two years, and that numerous companies, such as the Harmsworths' Pulp Mill Company, were developing the wealth of the island.

Great Britain.—The Veto resolutions passed the House of Commons by majorities varying from 98 to 114 and the final vote was the occasion of extraordinary excitement. The Budget passed through the Lower House by good majorities owing to the support of the Irish Party, but its continuance is still precarious. There is a suspicion that Mr. Asquith's statement about guarantees and dissolution lends itself to an interpretation that Mr. Redmond will not find satisfactory. The Veto resolutions are now before the Upper House but the Lords have decided not to act upon them until after Whitsuntide recess. Meanwhile, and before that date, the Budget will have passed the Commons. If, as seems likely from Ministers' reticence, it is then sent to the Lords, it will be at once passed, and Mr. Redmond's condition, "no Veto, no Budget," would be disregarded. A Scotch Temperance Bill, based on local option, has passed the House. Mr. Asquith announced that the House would adjourn towards the end of April for a recess of three weeks. The vote on Account was taken for six weeks only, so that on the reopening of Parliament this important item of the financial question will be again up for settlement.—A deputation of workmen who were sent to Germany and Belgium by the Tariff Reform League to examine the conditions of the workers in those countries, reported that workmen were better housed, dressed and fed than in England; that there was less indication of poverty and none of extreme want. The Government Commissioner appointed to report on the religious riots in Liverpool has completely exonerated the Catholics, declared their processions legal and placed the blame on the Orange leaders and preachers.

Ireland in Parliament.—In reference to Sir Robert Anderson's revelation that he had written the "Parnellism and Crime" articles for the London Times while he was a prominent official in the Government Secret Service, Mr. Asquith said, replying to Mr. Redmond, that Anderson had supplied Government documents to Le Caron, the Times witness, but without the knowledge of the Home Secretary; that an inquiry would now serve no useful purpose, but the question of discontinuing Anderson's pensions could be taken up on the Vote on Account. "I cannot," he continued, "express too strongly my condemnation of the admitted breach of official duty of which Sir Robert Anderson was guilty. . . . It was contrary to the rules and traditions of the Secret Service and so far as I know without precedent." The fact that the then Unionist Government connived at Anderson's partizan activities and promoted him immediately thereafter to the head of the criminal service, is considered damaging to that party's good faith.—Mr. Asquith's announcement that he would demand guarantees from the Crown for the passage of his Veto Bill by the Upper House, and not dissolve unless he had secured them for the next Parliament, is satisfactory to the Irish Party, which has therefore, supported the Government on the Budget. While Mr. O'Brien denounces Mr. Redmond as the tool of the Government, the Opposition proclaim him its master and dictator. Replying to an amendment of an Orange member excepting Home Rule legislation from the Lords' disabilities, Mr. Churchill said that one of the main objects of the Veto resolutions was to secure a national settlement of the Irish question. The South African measure was not submitted to the Lords; it was a success because they were not permitted to mar it; giving a Parliament to Ireland is not so radical or far-reaching a policy, but one which would be even more beneficial to the strength, unity and prosperity of the Empire than the grant of a Constitution to South Africa. All the Nationalist members voted for the Veto resolutions. Mr. O'Brien and his friends opposed the Budget.

Australian Government Defeated.—The Hon. Alfred Deakin, Prime Minister of the Commonwealth of Australia, resigned on April 19. In the general elections, which took place a week before that date, there was a great labor upheaval which defeated the Deakin Government. Mr. Deakin himself had a narrow escape from defeat at the hands of the Laborite candidate who opposed him in Ballarat. The Deakin Government was a coalition of Free Traders, Protectionists and Anti-Socialists, which overthrew the Labor Ministry about a year ago. Thus ends Mr. Deakin's third term as Prime Minister of the Australian Commonwealth, the first covering parts of the two years 1903 and 1904, the second extending from 1905 to 1908, and the third having lasted about twelve months. The present crisis was foreshadowed as early as August 7, last year, by AMERICA (No. 17, p. 451), which then said that the Labor party, supported by a sweeping majority of the electors, would inevitably bring about the downfall of the Cabinet in the following spring, owing to the tactical mistake that Mr. Deakin made in offering a Dreadnought or its equivalent to the Imperial Government.

Discontent in Cuba.—Murmurs which may be the prelude to armed violence are heard from Cubans of negro blood, who assert that though they form almost one-third of the population, their numerical strength is not properly recognized by white politicians. It is feared that the Negro party, which claims an enrolment of 93,000 and is actively engaged in adding to the number, may precipitate a race war and thus call for renewed intervention and occupation on the part of the United States.

Death of Mexican Statesman.—Ignacio Mariscal, Secretary of Foreign Relations throughout Diaz's presidency and to whose skill and tact Mexico's excellent standing abroad is due, died in Mexico on the 16th inst. of pneumonia. He was in his eighty-first year and had been continuously in public office for over half a century. He was a native of Oaxaca, a lawyer by profession, and of marked literary ability. He represented his state in the constitutional convention of 1857, was first attorney general under Juarez when he directed the sale of the confiscated church property, then secretary of justice and public instruction and later connected with the Mexican legation at Washington. He also represented his country at the court of St. James. The authorized announcement that after a long estrangement from the Church, Señor Mariscal repented for the past and received the Viaticum and the Holy Oils before his death, has been made in the Catholic press.

Assassin of Nun Dead.—Nadal Rius, a Spaniard who, a few weeks since, shot and instantly killed Sister Bernabé Indavé, superioress of the Spanish Refuge in the city of Mexico, died in prison on the 11th inst. while awaiting trial. He was an able civil engineer and had held contracts with several South American countries, but his mind became affected of late years so that he was employed at light desk work out of mere charity. At the time of the death of the nun, he was falsely proclaimed an anarchist bent on deeds of blood. His act is now known to have been that of a person long mentally deranged but considered harmless. Had death not relieved him before his trial he would have ended his days in an insane asylum.

Opening of the Belgian Exposition.—On Saturday last, with much stately ceremony, the great Belgian Exposition was opened in Brussels by King Albert. Queen Elizabeth, the Countess of Flanders, Princess Clementine and a splendid gathering of Belgium's notabilities assisted at the inaugural exercises. The Exposition group of buildings, called the White City, is situated near the end of the Avenue Louise, which, on the west side of Brussels, leads out to the beautiful Bois de la Cambre.

French Elections.—The general elections in France last Sunday brought out three thousand candidates for 597 seats. The results, as known so far, cover 531 election districts. Of these, second ballots will be necessary in 207 cases. In the districts where definite results were reached the Republicans gained eight members and lost one; the Radicals and Radical Socialists gained nine but lost fifteen; the Independent Socialists gained six and lost two; the Conservatives and Liberals gained three and lost four; the Progressists gained three and lost four. All the members of the Cabinet except M. Millerand, who will need a second ballot, have been re-elected. Among others who will have to stand for election a second time are M. Brisson, President of the Chamber of Deputies; Jean Jaurès, the Socialist leader; Boni de Castellane, and M. Delcassé, the former Minister of Foreign Affairs. The declaration of the results at Chambon-Feugerolles, in the Department of Loire, was followed by a riot. The commissary of police was stabbed, the City Hall was burned and the local archives destroyed. Order was restored by a battalion of dragoons. The general result of the election so far is that the Government majority is slightly increased, but the relative position of the parties is not materially modified.

Special Colonial Tax Proposed.—An amendment introduced by a member of the Centre during the discussion of the Budget now before the German Reichstag has caused excitement in and out of parliamentary circles. The amendment provides that corporations and individuals in German Southwest Africa controlling a capital of more than 300,000 marks shall pay a special tax to the home government. The amendment was introduced during the consideration of the budget provision for a loan to cover the expense incurred by the Empire in putting down the recent serious uprisings in German Southwest Africa, and the motive, no doubt, is to force the colonists to share the burden of an expense undertaken largely for their well-being. The interested colonists, who have invested in the growing industries of the land mainly because of government urging, cry out against what they term a confiscation. They affirm that acceptance of the amendment will occasion a disastrous check to colonial enterprise everywhere, as the principle once admitted other nations will unquestionably follow Germany's example. Capitalists will be slow to put up with the injustice of a special tax to secure needed protection in their development of interests which, after all, say they, are for the common good. Herr Dernburg, Imperial Secretary of State for the Colonies, in an impassioned address which aroused a stormy scene in the Reichstag, strongly opposed the amendment, and the outcome of the Centre's proposal in this week's debate is awaited with interest.

New Obstacle to Prussia's Electoral Reform.—It had been expected that little opposition to the Government's act would be encountered in the consideration of the reform measure by the Upper House of the Prussian Landtag. But the special committee, to which the bill was referred, has attached to it a clause according to which all future changes in the Constitution must have a two-thirds majority before becoming effective. The Government majority in the Lower House is insistent in its demand that this amendment be withdrawn, and Premier von Bethmann-Hollweg, speaking for his party before the committee, declared in decisive terms that the clause could not be accepted by the Government. The Upper House for the present refuses to recede and the second reading of the bill in the Upper House is looked forward to with apprehension. The existent bitterness between the representatives and the Government, due to the debate on the reform act, will be magnified if a third element of friction arises in the stubbornness of the Upper House. The opposition to the amendment among the members of the House of Representatives is based on the claim that under existent suffrage conditions a two-thirds majority for constitutional reforms is not attainable, and rather than see this condition coupled with the present electoral reform bill its defenders are willing to let the bill go by the board.

The Week in Austria.—The plan to erect a splendid memorial in Vienna, commemorative of the loyal friendship of Germany, which proved so helpful an aid in the troublous days immediately preceding the annexation by Austria of Bosnia and Herzegovina last spring, has fallen through. Since the death of Bürgermeister Dr. Lueger, who strongly favored the project, the committee in charge has practically disbanded.—The question of national partizanship continues to make trouble in the Reichsrath and there is little prospect that the Germans and Czechs will come together. Just lately an incident occurred to show how bitter the language question is become. The Common Council of Prague, dominated by the Czechs, has forbidden the publication of statements from the municipal statistician's office in German. A contract has been let to a French printing firm and the municipal records will appear in Bohemian and French.—Unofficial announcement is made that Emperor Francis Joseph will in June next make an extended tour through the newly-annexed provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina.—The famous military band of the Fourth Infantry Regiment of Lower Austria has been invited to visit the coming exposition in Buenos Aires to give a series of military concerts in Argentina's capital city.

Theodore Roosevelt in Vienna.—Mr. Roosevelt was received with distinction by the Emperor of Austria and later met Monsignor Granito di Belmonte Pignatelli, the Papal Nuncio at Vienna, during a call the Nuncio was making on Ambassador Kerens. This incident was assumed by press agents throughout the world as indicating a change of heart on the part of His Holiness, Pius X, but the following statement was promptly issued by the Vatican: "The Papal Nuncio at Vienna did not ask for any instructions concerning his visit to Mr. Roosevelt, nor were any instructions sent to him from the Vatican. Therefore, as the supposition that the Nuncio was charged with a communication to Mr. Roosevelt is deprived of any foundation, so it is certain that his visit cannot have any significance."—The ex-President's welcome by the Magyars was an enthusiastic one. In Budapest and in his trip through the Kingdom the warmth and cordiality of the people's greeting were remarkable. The traveler was hailed as an apostle of freedom and the guardian spirit of the Hungarians in America.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Don Rua and the Salesians

The announcement of the death of Don Rua, General of the Salesians, which was recorded in our last issue, has been received with expressions of universal regret. His career was noteworthy as it embraced the story of the more recent development and spread of a remarkable body of apostolic men whose lives are especially consecrated to the care of homeless or neglected boys.

Few Catholics are aware of the extent and character of the institutional work founded by Giovanni Bosco, who died in 1888, and who was declared Venerable as late as 1907 by Pius X. At the time of his death there were 250 houses of the Salesian Society in all parts of the world, instructing and sheltering 130,000 children and turning out every year an average of 18,000 apprentices. It was in 1845 that Don Bosco began in a humble way his night schools. With a solitary pupil in 1841, he had gathered around him twenty in February 1842, thirty in March of the same year, and in March a few years later, four hundred. In course of time there was established in the city of Turin, the first Salesian Home, which now houses more than a thousand boys. The municipal authorities at last came to realize the importance of the work and a fund was started for the erection of technical schools and workshops. The first church was built in 1868, and the society under the name of the Salesian Fathers and the patronage of St. Francis de Sales, was approved by Pius IX, provisionally in 1868, and formally in 1874. With the approbation of the Vicar of Christ, the work that in its inception had a thousand obstacles to meet, and a thousand anxieties to harass its founder, began to thrive prodigiously. After all, "neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase." At the death of Don Bosco, thirteen years after Rome had set her seal on the Congregation, the Salesians could point to more than 6,000 priests, who had gone forth from their institutions, twelve hundred of whom had volunteered to devote their lives to the industrial and religious training of the poor and neglected among the boys and youths of many lands.

Turin the other day witnessed the funeral of Don Rua, the successor and disciple of Don Bosco. All Italy was stirred by the event and the solemn services were attended by 100,000 persons. Even the bitterest enemies of Christianity honored the illustrious dead, so universal was the tribute of admiration paid to his memory.

Don Rua was a native of Turin, where he was born in 1837. At the age of fifteen he entered the Salesian Oratory where he soon attracted the attention of Don Bosco and became one of his most assiduous pupils. The Salesian schools are so graded as to begin with the child's first studies, and then lead, for those whose vocation is sufficiently marked, to seminaries for the priesthood. Freedom of choice on the part of the pupil in taking this step is absolutely respected. Don Rua after his preparatory studies entered the seminary and in due time, on July 29, 1860, was ordained a priest. Then followed a year or two at the Oratory where he taught Italian and the ancient classics. His success in the class room and his enthusiasm for the work, combined with an exceptional gift for government and spiritual guidance, were obvious recommendations for the directorship of the new Oratory at Mirabello, to which the young priest was shortly assigned by Don Bosco. This position he continued to hold after he became Prefect General of the Salesian Society, and until his election as Superior General at the death of the founder. Don Rua was re-elected in 1898 and continued in office, working for the good of the Society, and for humanity at large, until his death on April 6, within a few months of the Golden Jubilee of his priesthood.

How the work prospered under his guidance can be only mentioned here in summary. The houses of the Salesians during the twenty-two years of his Generalate developed from 250 to 500; the individual membership from 800 to more than 4,000. The Salesian Bulletin, the organ of the Society, at the death of Don Bosco, was printed in only three languages; at present it is printed in nine with a monthly circulation of 300,000 copies. The Congregation had then but few houses beyond the limits of Italy; now they are found in almost every country of the globe—in Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, England, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria, Palestine and Algiers; in North America and Mexico. Nowhere perhaps, are they doing better work than in the much maligned and little understood countries of South America, from Central America in the north to the extreme limits in the south—in Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador, Chile, Peru, Uruguay, Bolivia, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, Paraguay, Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego. In fact there is not a single Republic in South America which does not possess several Salesian institutions. It was during Don Rua's life that the Church of the Sacred Heart was opened at great expense in London, and it was he who sent the Salesians to the United States; to them has been handed over by Archbishop Farley, the Church of the Transfiguration in New York City. The Provincial for this country has his residence in San Francisco.

It is well for Catholics to have in mind the work of these Apostolic men, Don Bosco and Don Rua, and of their numerous disciples when they read of similar work done by Protestant institutions, notably the Young Men's Christian Association, and wonder why Catholics are not equally active. Here is a Catholic organization which had its inception before the Y. M. C. A. was thought of and which is doing in many parts of the world an apostolic work for which little credit is given. The credit is withheld because the work is so little known. Blatant advertising is not a part of the program of the Salesians, nor indeed of any benevolent or religious association that combines humility with activity. It is high time that the work of these men should be fittingly encouraged at home in our own land. Nowhere is the need more pressing. Before the flood tide of immigration had set in, an apostle whose name may be worthily linked with Don Bosco and Don Rua, and a kindred spirit, the zealous Father John Drumgoole, saw the loss to the Church and the menace to society resulting from the neglect of the waifs and strays, the newsboys and the street gamins of the metropolis. The Mission of the Immaculate Virgin which he opened in 1881, was the inauguration of an apostolic work which drew the attention as it drew the support of Catholics far beyond the confines of New York City.

In every great city of the land there is need of similar organized endeavor to help the boys; now more than ever, since everywhere are found little aliens, or children of aliens, who are brought up in congested districts amid degrading environment, and are made the prey of designing religionists who under the guise of charity and social betterment lead the lambs astray and despoil them of their only treasure the Christian, that is the Catholic Faith. Father Drumgoole has gone. His spirit and his work, thank God, remain. Don Rua, too, has received his imperishable crown. His last illness was short and his death tranquil and most edifying. He has passed to his reward, leaving his work as a heritage to the Church and to the Catholics of all lands. We are aware that devoted men are carrying on similar work in several cities of the Union, in Chicago, St. Louis, New Orleans and elsewhere. May not something more be done here in the United States, in the larger centres of population especially, to welcome the sons of the Venerable Don Bosco and his late worthy successor, Don Rua, and enable them to carry on their glorious work for the children of the poor, for the boys who roam our streets, who are, many of them, children of the same faith as ourselves, and have all of them been redeemed by the blood of Christ?

Missionary Heroism*

De Quincey has a classic description of the terror that grips the ordinary civilized person in the midst of an uncivilized race. "I know not," he says in a famous passage of the "Opium-Eater," "whether others share in my feelings on this point: but I have often thought that, if I were compelled to forego England and to live in China, and among Chinese manners and modes of life and scenery, I should go mad." And, after an interesting attempt to analyze the horror, he concludes, "I am terrified with the modes of life, by the manners, and the barrier of utter abhorrence and want of sympathy, placed between us by feelings deeper than I can analyze. I could sooner live with lunatics or brute animals." If anyone suspects that this is the exaggerated fear of a timid and super-sensitive recluse, let him turn to "From Sea to Sea," by that hardy cosmopolitan who scouts everything unmasculine, Rudyard Kipling. "The mere mob," he writes while in Canton, "was terrifying . . . hear the tramp of the feet on the granite blocks of the road and the breaking wave of human speech, that is not human! Watch the yellow faces that glare at you . . . and you will be afraid, as I was afraid." He fled in a panic to Hong-Kong from "a big, blue sink of a city full of tunnels, all dark and inhabited by yellow devils, a city that Doré ought to have seen." One may catch a hint of the feeling for himself by penetrating the Chinese quarters of New York or San Francisco.

It was the end of the nineteenth century when Kipling's imagination shattered his self-control under the stress of a great and nameless fear. More than two hundred years ago Catholic missionaries put out in old tubs that would not be considered safe to-day on our rivers, much less on our inland lakes, and after months of tossing on strange and tropical seas, living under conditions that do not exist now in the worst of steerages, thrust themselves into those swarming Asiatic warrens, meeting death sometimes, sometimes living for years, alone of all the white race, among the teeming alien populations. In those days there were no tiffins and "At Homes," with globe-trotting guests. There are few of them even to-day for the Catholic missionaries. There were no wives and families and smart native servants, no dozing under a punkah, within hailing distance of the consul and with the warship of a civilized nation at anchor in the harbor. The men who stood up to the horrible fear clutching at their hearts, who wrestled with it and overcame it, were not rude, unimaginative sailors or soldiers; they were not reckless adventurers, nor beach-combers flung like scum from over the edge of civilization. They were students and scholars, university-bred and gentle in all their ways. They left fathers and mothers, sisters and brothers, behind them. They had nerves and were sensitive, the finest products of a highly advanced culture, with the instincts and preferences of gentlemen, even as De Quincey and Mr. Kipling. How they had the vast intrepidity to do and suffer the things they did in those far-off days is a mystery of heroism whose full impact the world has not yet received.

It is this trial of fear and loneliness amid hostile hordes and repulsive strangenesses that is apt to be most impressive to the reader of Father Campbell's "Pioneer Priests of North America." If anything the horror of helpless panic was accentuated in the case of the early Indian missionaries. Perhaps no race of savages ever combined in the same degree the qualities of brutality, cruel resourcefulness and ingenious cunning possessed by the American Indians. Their hatred was easily aroused, undying in its vigilance and quest, and most elaborate and revolting in the glutting.

*Pioneer Priests of North America. By T. J. Campbell, S.J. New York: The America Press.

The mind did not reel before any countless immensity of numbers as in the case of the Chinese; but it may well be that the mystery, which they threw over their fields and forests by their silent lurkings and ambushes and sudden forays, were a greater stain on the self-control of the European than the frank, unconcealed presence of Asiatic mobs. Gentle rearing, a long course of study in belles-lettres, philosophy and theology, a professor or executive in a college, and sometimes, as in the instance of Enemond Massé, attached to the royal court of France; afterwards a perilous trip full of squalid hardship across the Atlantic, a short sojourn in Quebec and then a surrender of himself up to hunger and cold, suffering and insult and torture, and probably death, in the heart of an unknown continent hundreds of leagues away from any white man's dwelling—this is the general formula, allowing for accidental variations, of the early Canadian missionary's career. No Church, except the Catholic Church, has ever inspired such a glowing page of heroic deeds; and one wonders whether in the history of the Catholic Church herself, in which even to-day surpassing heroisms are being practised, there can be found more startling instances of unflinching courage and cheerful hardihood.

The second volume of "Pioneer Priests," which has just been published, is devoted, outside of a preliminary account of the early Acadian mission, to a history of the Jesuit missionaries among the Hurons. The period covered is brief, sixteen years. The Hurons were not a good fighting race, and fell a prey, even to extinction, to the superior powers of their savage neighbors. But crowded into the short time at the disposal of the missionaries for the conversion of this tribe there are more tragedy, thrilling adventures, and frightful suffering than in any other of the early Canadian missions. The tribe lacked most of those qualities of character which were needed for self-preservation under the conditions in which they lived; they were exposed, and their missionaries with them, to enemies that kept circling around them restlessly in ever narrowing circles. Why the Jesuits thus allied themselves to a helpless nation and a hopeless cause is a problem we fling in passing to firm believers in the "jesuitical" tradition, kept alive by our dictionaries.

Father Campbell has not confined himself to picking out of the voluminous records of the "Relations" the pertinent facts for a consecutive biography of each of the missionaries—in itself no light labor; he has consulted nearly every known authority, living and dead, for scraps of evidence and he has pieced them together into a closely woven texture of skilful narration. Especially valuable is his identification of the ancient sites in the story he is telling with modern geographical localities. The author's style is felicitously suited to his subject. He has caught something of the nonchalant air of his heroes. They possessed to a remarkable degree the Gallic adaptability to strange environment; but in an equally remarkable degree they seemed to lack the theatrical self-consciousness which, at least in the nineteenth century, we are wont to attribute to the French. Father Campbell has something of this impersonal quality in his narrative. He tells us the most startling things in a matter-of-fact fashion, catching us unawares here and there with a bit of dry humor in some crisp comment, and resisting always what must have been an urgent temptation to indulge in excited and enthusiastic dithyramb.

For, if ever a narrator could be forgiven for being carried away by his subject into perfervid reflections, it would be in such a story as this of the Huron mission. We cannot give here an idea of the demands made upon human endurance by the vicissitudes of that undertaking. The present volume is little more than an enumeration of reckless risks, hair-breadth escapes, captures, and incredible sufferings, each following another in quick succession and sometimes ending at the stake to the demoniac accompaniment of savageries too gross and excruciating even to be described. De Brébeuf is the central figure in the group, a giant in stature with a sharp mind and a dauntless spirit. Here is one of his adventures. He arrived for the first time in Quebec in June, 1625. In the following October he joined a band of Algonquins who were going to disappear into the western wilderness for their winter hunting. He had to take his share in the paddling and at the portages; he slept in the snow and in the over-crowded tents; he knew on starting out little or nothing of their language. He was not seen or heard of in Quebec till the following March when he turned up with an Algonquin dictionary and grammar of his own composition!

On another winter trip later on he did some rough travel for three days, crawling up icy hills on hands and knees and sliding down the opposite declivities—and this with a broken collar-bone! He was hated and feared by the Iroquois and his life was in constant peril. But he moves on through the story with a fine indifference for danger and a big forcefulness that awed even the savages. His end was what he prayed for all his life—burning at the stake and exhausting the inventiveness of his experienced torturers to devise new cruelties and engines of pain. His writings lead us to suspect that even in his death-throes he felt some disappointment at not having had more to suffer for the sake of his Divine Saviour. At his side the fragile and delicate Gabriel Lalemant suffered the most exquisite tortures, repulsive and shocking in their details, for fifteen hours before death came to release him. Lalemant's mother was still living far away in France. She became a nun at the news and devoted the rest of her life entirely to God as became the mother of a martyr. They were brave sons in those days, and they had need of brave mothers.

And so the tale of the Huron mission runs. It tries our powers of understanding, but nevertheless it is a fact, that these self-sacrificing men often met their greatest opposition and suffering at the hands of their own countrymen. In Canada they were harassed by the Huguenots who had acquired control of the commercial enterprises of the colony; at home in France they were the objects of atrocious libels. It may be observed in passing that the Society of Jesus, never quite free from accusations of worldly policy and self-seeking machinations, kept pouring with strange prodigality its best blood into the Canadian missions for a century and a half.

It is worthy of remark that these men cannot be described as fanatics. To a non-Catholic fanaticism is the universal solvent for all sorts of religious heroism. But fanaticism is obviously the wrong word to use in reference to De Brébeuf and his companions. They were a singularly light-hearted and good-natured company, quick to seize and get what joy there was from the comical incidents of the day. The savages used to make the hut of the fathers a common place of sojourn, prying into their belongings, helping themselves to the provisions and shouting uproariously even while the priests celebrated Mass or said their prayers. "Why does the clock strike?" asked the wondering guests. "Ah!" explained one of the ready-witted missionaries, "when it strikes twelve it says that you must go out; also when it strikes four." And as the superstitious savages scrambled forth, we can see the merry twinkle in the eyes that watched them. The savages were not without a humor of their own which did not escape their religious teachers. A father strove to convey in gentle language to an obstreperous savage that he yelled too loudly during a certain religious ceremony. Just at that moment a cock crew outside the door. "Why, don't you make him stop," answered the Indian in his injured innocence, "he is talking louder than I am." One can hear the chuckle of the missionary as he writes the story down.

No reader of the "Relations" or of "Pioneer Priests" can fail to see in the writings of the missionaries those mental characteristics usually resulting from scientific habits of mind and those literary graces of genial humor and of keen observation, which no mere fanatic could simulate, much less claim as natural gifts. This is the test of doctrinal truth as well as of true sanctity that religious enthusiasm does not destroy the common sense and natural equipoise of the enthusiast. Enthusiasts without the human qualities of sanity and kindness have been common enough, principally outside of the Catholic Church. The Church never recognizes such sanctity by canonization. The human qualities, of course, are common enough also, divorced from anything like religious enthusiasm. The genius of the saint is exercised in the fusing of the two, and the genius of the saint has powers beyond the capacity of mere human nature to supply. It is a kind of genius peculiarly and, we venture to add, exclusively associated with the Catholic Faith.

High Prices—Is Gold to Blame?

II

Statistics indicate that the supply of the necessities of life does not increase equally with the demand. The Department of Agriculture tells us that within a few years the proportion of food animals to population has fallen over twenty per cent. The trade returns show the number received at the shipping centres to be declining. England, whom we used to supply, is trying the experiment of importing pork from China. Our meat packers have their eyes already on the herds of Argentina and the export of wheat and flour is declining.

But there is no excess of gold to raise prices. Indeed the great banks find it far from easy to maintain their reserves. Gold is called for constantly, and the reasons of the demand are worth our serious attention. There are in general three. Gold is demanded for armaments, for civic improvements and for increasing the means of transport by land and sea. The first is an element of serious economic disturbance involving a vast quantity of unproductive work and an immense number, therefore, of absolute consumers, and, what is worse, the secret withdrawal from circulation of undiscoverable sums to fill the military chest against future wars. Civic improvements are the necessary consequences of the growth of cities. Smaller buildings must be torn down to be replaced with sky scrapers. Tubes, tunnels, water, light, sewers, public offices must be provided for, for the cities have been watered with Danae showers of gold and have fructified accordingly.

All these, too, mean the multiplication of consumers; so the third demand is the necessary consequence of the first and second. Railways must be built and ships must be launched that the world may be fed. Two new roads are being rushed across Canada to open new fields to the plough, new pastures to the herds. The Andes have been tunnelled, the Isthmus of Panama is being pierced to shorten sea routes. So far is it from lying idle by reason of its excess, that gold may be looked upon as the Hercules of the modern economic world burdened with labors that it alone can accomplish; and so far is the supply of it from being responsible for the rise of prices that were the supply seriously diminished prices would probably soar to an unheard-of height.

We have seen that the increased production of gold lessened the cost of production and distribution by engaging in the work a large capital demanding only a moderate percentage of profit and making possible the application on a large scale of scientific discoveries. At first, no doubt, the capitalist reaped huge rewards, but of these the workman has long been claiming his share. Wages have increased steadily and the hours of labor have decreased. The lessened cost of production and distribution have made these possible hitherto; but here also there must be a limit beyond which employers can not go, at which their profits must vanish. As it is approached any diminution of labor or increase of wages must mean a rise in prices. The public must pay what the employer can no longer afford to give; and it seems that this is the actual condition of things. We hold, therefore, that the increase of consumption in the face of a relative limiting of supply, and the growing cost of production which the enormous stock of gold could palliate for a time but can no longer do so, are to be reckoned the chief causes of the universal rise in prices. We are far from saying the only causes. Extravagance of many kinds has something to do with it. There are those in this country that blame the tariff, and their view confirms ours, that the United States is approaching the time when all its food will barely suffice its own people, for the tariff can only raise prices of food by keeping foreign food out of the country. In face of the Congressional investigation into the matter we could not deny if we would that producers may be taking advantage of the public and that cold-storage warehouses may be bursting with food held for higher prices. But such causes as these are temporary and local: the fundamental causes beginning to make their effects felt all over the world, are, we believe, what we have indicated.

What is to be done? We hear of workmen asking an increase of wages. Certainly they should not be the only ones to feel the pinch. Employers should relieve it even though it cost them some privation for the moment; moreover, if there really be a food corner in this country, the raising of wages and salaries would help to open it. But the raising of wages cannot be a cure for high prices, but must rather aggravate the evil. The establishment of a multiple standard has been recommended, namely, the making of the rise or fall of wages with regard to a certain standard wage, proportional to the rise or fall of the prices of a given number of staple commodities with regard to a corresponding standard for each. But this is open to the same objection. If the rise of wages is one of the causes of the rise of prices, it cannot be a corrective of this rise.

The evil tends to cure itself. If production becomes more and more profitable, capital will be withdrawn from other employments and invested in it; and, as labor is drawn by capital an outflow of population back to the land will begin, increasing the number of producers and lessening that of consumers. But nature should be helped judiciously; and in the first place the cultivated lands in the neighborhood of towns should be made as productive as possible, and unproducing lands should be reclaimed. Then the movement back to the land, whether of individuals to lands near by, or of colonies to more distant ones, should be encouraged in every possible way, e. g., by loans, remission of taxes for a time, and even grants for houses, food and implements, if necessary. In newer countries immigrants should be directed to the unsettled lands and colonize there, instead of being allowed to remain in the already over-grown cities. This is the policy of the Government of Canada with regard to the flood of immigration setting towards that country. It proclaims that it wants only agricultural immigrants, not such as will increase the congestion in towns: it wants hands to produce, not mouths to be fed.

Some will object, this will check the growth of cities. The assertion is true; but whether it be an objection and not rather an argument in favor of such a policy, is another question. The growth of cities may be healthy or unhealthy: it is decidedly the latter when it is accompanied by the heaping together of colossal fortunes on the one hand, and the reduction of the many to a mere proletariat on the other; when it implies the tyranny of capital and the insurrection of labor; when it means enormous house rent and congested tenements. To check this growth naturally by the natural, gradual transferring of the surplus population to the land would, therefore, be most beneficial. It would cost something.

Everything worth having must be paid for. The poor would have to pay in the sacrifice of the attractions of the city to which they have grown accustomed, and in the fortitude necessary to bear the temporary difficulties of their new life. But the money cost would fall on those best able to bear it, the capitalists. Land values, house rents, railway profits, even trade itself might fall off, at least for a time. But in economics little is really lost. The values disappearing from the cities would reappear in the fields and the homes: they who before had nothing of their own would come to possess, and thus would begin that redistribution of wealth many are seeking to bring about by unlawful means. This is what we have had in view when expressing the opinion that from the rise of prices may come the solution of many a pressing social problem.

And this redistribution may be accelerated by thrift. Whether on the land or in the town, every working-man and working-woman should produce as far as possible the things necessary for the family. Money now wasted on things unnecessary and still more on useless pleasures would remain in their possession instead of passing away to swell the accumulations of a few, and thus the cost of living with other industrial difficulties would be reduced to a minimum, and the remedies of all would be in the hands of those who have the greatest interest in their application.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Protection of Emigrant Girls

Some time ago an article appeared in these columns dealing with the important question of the protection of the immigrant girl, the girl that is obliged by adverse circumstances to leave the paternal roof to seek a livelihood in distant cities or lands. The attention of the readers of AMERICA was called to the Catholic International Girls' Protection Society and its praiseworthy efforts in the combat against the white slave trade. I had the good fortune to attend the annual meeting of the Western German branch of this society held in Cologne, on February 16, last. Hundreds of active workers, armed with the tabulated results of a year's conscientious work, had responded to the call of their energetic president, Madame Karl Trimborn, wife of the well-known Centrist leader of that name. Mgr. Mueller, Auxiliary Bishop of Cologne, honored the meeting with his presence and took an active part in the discussion. A judge of the superior court was on hand to solve any legal questions that might turn up. All phases of the girls' protective question were thoroughly discussed with the aid of reliable statistics and still more reliable personal experience. The notes I took on the occasion are embodied in this paper.

The waters of iniquity are rushing in upon society from every side and threaten to engulf us. We must build strong dikes against them as the ingenious Hollanders do against the sea. This is precisely what the Girls' Protection Society has been endeavoring to do for the last fifteen years. Preventive protection is its watchword. Thousands of devoted women are daily sacrificing their time, their pleasures, their money, their health even, to prevent the servant girl, the governess, the nursery-maid, the shop-girl, the bar-maid, the factory-girl from falling into the clutches of the libertine and the professional white slave trader. The recruiting agents of this iniquitous traffic operate most successfully on board the transatlantic steamships, on the trains, in the stations. They go to work with the greatest cunning. Honeyed words, clever flattery, conceal their nefarious designs.

One plays the earnest lover, another is manager of a theatre or music-teacher and is enchanted with the beautiful voice of his intended victim, which only requires six months' training to be worth a fortune. A third is a "virtuous" paterfamilias on the look-out for a good governess or servant-girl. A fourth, a student of character, will boldly reveal his purpose, and describe life in the haunts of shame or the chambers of the libertine in such glowing colors that the weak, discontented, lazy, half-spoiled girl will rush with open eyes to her ruin. That "respectable" lady, who makes it a point to sit down beside the nursery-maids in the park or the promenade, and seeks to gain their confidence by sympathetic talk, is in all likelihood an agent of vice. The same human vulture hovers about the music-hall, the low theatre, the cheap restaurant.

In all the civilized countries of the world the "base traffic in human wares" is interdicted under heavy penalties, but it thrives none the less in secret. Exact statistics are, of course, hard to obtain. The investigations of the International Society for the Prevention of the White Slave Trade show that the "export" is greatest from Austria-Hungary and Russia, the "import," into Egypt, the Balkan States, Holland, Belgium and South America. Nearly all of the 6,000 prostitutes under police control in Buenos Aires from 1891-1901 were victims of the white slave trade. Of these 1,561 were from Argentina itself, 1,211 from Russia, 857 from Italy, 688 from Austria, 609 from France, 350 from Germany, 96 from Switzerland; in 1896, 117 of these unfortunates arrived in one month. In Vienna 180 agents are said to be continually at work. In 1905, 25,000 Hungarian girls were traded to the Balkan States alone.

At least $50,000,000 are spent annually by the white slave traders in the various countries of the civilized world. During the last five years 250 of these shameless traffickers were brought to justice in Europe alone. Statistics show furthermore that from 60 to 70 per cent. of the inmates of houses of ill-repute are recruited from the ranks of the servant girls who flock in tens of thousands to the great cities every year with the bloom of health on their cheeks, and sunshine in their hearts. A city of half a million inhabitants like Cologne receives an average annual influx of 10,000 girls from the country districts. In the case of cities like Paris, Vienna and Berlin, it runs up to forty or sixty thousand. As the number of prostitutes in these cities ranges from forty to a hundred thousand, we can judge how vast is the number of those who

"Deplore that luckless hour

When idly first, ambitious of the town,

They left their wheels, and robes of country brown."

Ten thousand arms were stretched out to drag these poor girls down to their ruin. How many were stretched out to save them? At home, under the eyes of their parents, surrounded by the influences of religion, and the companions of their childhood, knowing everyone and known to everyone, they would in all probability have remained on the path of duty. Where should charity meet them, in order to help them, warn them, guide their steps in safety? In the labyrinth of the metropolis, in the dance-hall, the nickel theatre, the dens of shame, the dimly-lighted midnight side-street? No, the work of charity must begin in the homes of the girls, long before they set their faces towards the great city. There is a depth of wisdom in the trite old maxims: "Forewarned, forearmed;" "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." An unarmed soldier on the field of battle is a sorry spectacle, but the girl engaged defenceless in the deadly struggle for existence in the city, wrestling unaided "against the rulers of the world of this darkness," is a sorrier spectacle still by far.

It is notorious that the employment bureaus send their agents into the country districts to secure girls for the city even before they have left school. Necessity or cupidity causes parents in but too many cases to fall an easy prey to these speculators. The columns of the city press, with their thousands of want ads, are eagerly scanned by such parents, and situations are accepted by them for their daughters, without much thought as to their suitability and without any thought at all as to the dangers of the city. Other parents, more heartless than these, send their daughters to the city, in the hope that a season there will take the country edges off them, polish them, and thus increase their matrimonial prospects.

This being the case, the eyes of parents and children must be opened to the dangers of the city. Priest and teacher, church and school, must work hand in hand to this end. From the pulpit, in the schoolroom, in season and out of season, the zealous pastor will enlighten his flock in regard to this most important subject. Priest and teacher will inculcate self-denial, mortification and love of work on the children committed to their charge, combat their vanity, their idle ambitions, their hankering after pleasure. When the girl leaves the school her training must be continued. Sodalities, conferences, lectures, manual training courses, are all excellent means to prepare her for the battle of life.

Of course no amount of preaching and teaching and warning can stem the tide of emigration from the country to the city. Social and economic conditions to-day are such as to make it not only necessary but even to a certain extent desirable. Here the work of the Girls' Protection Society must set in. It must send its agents into the remotest towns and villages; it must enlist the cooperation of parents, pastors, teachers, zealous women; branch-organizations must be founded everywhere. The aims and advantages of the Society must be made known in order to gain the confidence of the people. This can be best done by occasional lectures, by the distribution of pamphlets, by articles in the local papers, by posting the yellow and white placards of the Society in public places, e. g., on the church bulletin boards. Do not insurance companies cover the face of the earth with their agents and advertisements, and do they not reap a plentiful harvest? But isn't the honor of the family, the soul of a maiden, worth more than a barn or a hay-rick?

Every parish priest, Cardinal Kopp, Prince-Bishop of Breslau said in a recent pastoral, should be a member of the Girls' Protection Society. And he set the example by joining it himself. Those who do not care to venture so far should at least have the printed matter—the guide, the year-book, the circulars, the introduction cards—of the Society on hand and make use of them when occasion requires. Such propaganda in the country districts has been productive of untold good in the vast Diocese of Cologne. Last year more than a thousand circulars were sent to all the parish priests, requesting them to enter on the enclosed cards the names of women well-qualified and ready to act as confidential agents in their parishes. Six hundred women promptly offered their services for no other recompense than that promised by our Lord to those who give a cup of water in His name. The literature of the Society was mailed to each of them, also the following list of questions: How many girls of your parish are employed away from home? With or without the consent of their parents or guardians? How old are they? What are their present addresses? Are they in danger in regard to faith or morals? The names and addresses of 702 were thus obtained and 75 of the girls were exposed to great moral danger, a number of others were in doubtful situations, 22 were minors. The Society went about the work of rescue with great circumspection and secrecy, and its efforts were crowned with success in nearly every case.

But this work of rescue is usually attended with great difficulties; in many cases, for obvious reasons, it is hopeless. Hence the Society strives by every means in its power to lessen the number of such cases by taking the working girl under its protection from the moment she makes up her mind to seek her fortune abroad. It endeavors to meet the many dangers lying in wait for the traveling girl by as many precautions. A clear and precise itinerary is sent to her, containing directions as to trains, stop-overs, houses of refuge, homes, etc. She is provided with introduction cards and a guide, which she carries in her hand as a means of recognition.

If she is obliged to pass a considerable time in a strange city on her journey, board and lodging is provided for her in advance in a home, convent, or private family. Placards are posted in the trains and stations, warning her against the advances of unknown persons, and containing a list of homes, employment bureaus, etc., affiliated with the Society. At all the important stations a regular protective and vigilance service has been organized, called the Œuvre de Gares, Bahnhofsmision, or Station Mission, a certain number of devoted women—twenty, thirty or forty, according to the importance of the station—relieve each other, singly or in groups, in meeting the various trains, in order to welcome girls bound for the city, conduct them to their places of work; to assist the sick, the blind, the aged; to be on the look-out for suspicious persons, and if need be, call the guardians of the law to their aid.

The Station Mission has proved to be one of the most effective weapons, offensive and defensive, against the white slave trade. At the central station in Cologne, during the last three years, assistance was given in 8,978 cases; 1,961 night's lodgings, generally in some convent, were procured; more than twenty girls were rescued from the agents of vice, several of whom were brought to justice. The annual reports of the Station Mission in other parts of Germany, in France, Belgium, Holland, Italy, England (Dover, London), Ireland (Cork), etc., show that its generous efforts are everywhere blessed with success.

When the girl has been brought safely to her destination another phase of the Society's protective work begins. Environment, as everyone knows, acts powerfully on the moral character. It gives a different turn to our temper and our affections, to our views and desires. The girl from the country who goes to the city to earn a livelihood is, as it were, transported into a new world. A stranger at the hearth which gives her hospitality, a constant witness of family joys in which she has no part, she seeks distraction, sympathy, friendship, companionship, elsewhere, only too often to her ruin. It was the contemplation of this sad and fatal isolation that made the poet exclaim:

"Oh! it was pitiful!
Near a whole city full,
Home she had none!"

"Home she had none!" In these words the duty of Christian charity is clearly pointed out: it must create a home-atmosphere for her in the strange city. The Girls' Protection Society does this by encouraging everywhere the founding of homes, guilds, etc., for working girls or making the already existing ones better known and patronized. Here, under the maternal direction of devoted protectresses, young girls of the same age and condition meet on Sundays, or as often as possible, to enjoy in common the great blessing of wholesome, useful and pleasant recreation. Here, too, they are prepared by careful and intelligent, practical training for their future role of mothers of families.

What a grand campaign has been in progress for years—with truly astonishing results, too—against all manner of infectious diseases! No labor, no money is spared to discover their sources, to prevent their spread, to stamp them out altogether. Is not the soul more than the body? Soul-hygiene infinitely more important than body-hygiene? Should Christian charity be content to heal those stricken with the plague of vice, when, by stretching out a timely hand, it could perhaps have prevented them from being thus stricken? Blessed and precious are the tears of soul felt repentance, but more blessed and beautiful are the tears of joy welling up from a heart grateful for innocence preserved!

GEORGE METLAKE.

IN MISSION FIELDS

ICELAND

Now almost exclusively Lutheran, this island has a romantic Catholic past which devoted missionaries are endeavoring to recall to life. Its area of nearly 40,000 square miles, nearly the size of Virginia, is largely an unproductive and uninhabited desert, but on the southwestern shore the genial warmth of the Gulf Stream gives life and vigor to shrubs and grass and makes life possible for the 80,000 sturdy natives. Fish from the ocean and ponies and sheep on the land are the Icelanders' sources of modest wealth at home, and his means of supplying his household with those comforts which his bleak native land does not provide.

Discovered in the ninth century by those venturesome sea rovers, the pagan Norsemen, it was named Snowland, for there the line of perpetual snow was only 2,700 feet above the sea. About the beginning of the tenth century, the tyranny of the Norse king, Haraldur, drove some of his subjects to seek refuge in Snowland, where a handful of colonists had already established themselves. Besides the Norsemen, who formed the immense majority of the settlers, there were also a few Irishmen. There were some Catholics in the company and all these banded together, the island chronicles tell us, and established the village of Kirkjubæ in the eastern part, where the pagans did not attempt to settle.

The first native Iclander to be converted, as far as the records show, was a certain Thorvaldur, who, in his wanderings, reached Saxony, where he was instructed and baptized. His representations induced Bishop Frederick to accompany him back to Iceland where they arrived in 981. But their missionary efforts were brought to a sudden close five years later, for the pagans rose against them and expelled them from the island. Two other attempts were almost equally barren of results, but in the year 1000 the Faith was generally accepted. By the authority of Pope Victor II two bishoprics were established, one at Skálhot in 1055, and a second at Hólar, whose series of bishops begins with Jon Soemundsson in 1112. The last Bishop of Skálhot, Ogmundur Pálsson, after a noble struggle for the Faith, was imprisoned by the Lutherans and died in exile in 1542. Jon Arason, whose name brings the list of the Bishops of Hólar to a glorious close, was beheaded for the Faith on November 7, 1550. In Catholic times, both the Benedictines and the Augustinians had religious houses on the island, the former beginning in 1120 and the latter in 1168.

Iceland became an appanage of the Danish crown in 1397. The introduction of the new religion in the sixteenth century was so effectually accomplished by the home government that for the five succeeding centuries the only outward signs of Catholicity in the island were to be found in the museum of the capital, Reykjavik.

The first missionary of modern times to brave the edicts which proscribed the Catholic faith was a French priest of the Diocese of Rheims, who went to the island in 1856, and remained there, persecuted and despised, for eighteen weary years. Freedom of worship was proclaimed in 1874, when the valiant pioneer was so enfeebled by age and privation that he was forced to return to his native France and prepare for death.

A few years later, the Vicar Apostolic of Denmark sent two priests to take up the thankless task, but real missionary work began in 1903, when the Society of Mary sent priests into the field. At the same time their hands were strengthened by the welcome arrival of a band of those heroic nuns whose zeal is world-wide, the Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny. Their hospital and school do much to arouse the Catholic spirit which, after a lethargic sleep of five centuries, shows itself only in certain popular phrases, the Catholic meaning of which is utterly lost upon the people of to-day. May the devotion to Our Lady, for which the Icelanders were famed in the Ages of Faith, recall them from the barren wastes of Lutheranism to the "place of pasture" whence they were driven by Danish arms.

CORRESPONDENCE

Some Social Works in Paris

APRIL 10, 1910.

It has become a commonplace saying that the free-masons and atheists having taken the lead of what is called the social movement in France, Catholics are bound to strain every nerve to keep abreast of this movement. They have not the Government at their back, like their adversaries, neither have they the disposal of the large sums of money that the men in power bestow so freely when they wish to benefit the free-thinking institutions; hence their task is more difficult; they have to struggle against the persistent, if hidden, opposition of the Government, and, in many cases, against sordid difficulties that arise from want of money. But, although they are somewhat handicapped, the Catholics bring into the struggle a devotedness and earnestness that can exist only when a supernatural motive inspires human endeavors.

God's messengers to men are sometimes clothed in strange disguise; thus it is a recognized fact that the recent floods brought to many souls blessings more precious than the worldly possessions they swept away. The temporary refuges and asylums, organized and directed by Parisian Catholics for homeless refugees, proved what they were intended to be, homes of rest and refreshment, where the guests were received with a loving considerateness that was totally wanting in the refuges organized by the "Assistance publique."

To many of these men and women it came as a sudden revelation that the curés and the clericals were not what they are painted by the atheistic and socialistic papers. All the Catholic laymen, who are engaged in charitable works in the Paris suburbs, the Little Sisters of the Assumption, who work in the homes of the poor, the parish priests of the outlying parishes, where the inundations wrought untold havoc, all these are unanimous in their opinion that many baptisms and First Communion of adults that have taken place since January can be traced back to those dreary days of trial when priests and lay Catholics had a unique opportunity of coming into contact with a class of people who know nothing of them except from the calumnies that are circulated by the newspapers. The rushing waters of the Seine broke down the barriers of misunderstanding and ignorance, and, in many cases, with results that appear likely to last. We know of one refuge, organized by a priest, where seven baptisms took place among the homeless refugees; of another, where without being spoken to on the subject, a poor workman decided to send his children to the free schools, only because he had experienced the charity of Catholics. Examples like these might be multiplied. In an indirect manner, therefore, the inundations did their part as the messengers of God, and it is a fact that the social and religious works having for their object the moral training of the working classes, have received a fresh impetus in Paris since the month of January.

Thus, the retreat preached in the church of St. Eugène for the young dress-makers, milliners and typists of the quarter was an unexampled success. The instructions were necessarily short, the girls having at most an hour and a half during which to go to and from their shops or offices, hear a sermon and take their midday meal. On the last day more than a thousand were present. The preacher was a vicaire from the Madeleine. The Archbishop was present and spoke to the young girls with his accustomed kindness. As their association is under the patronage of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc, he reminded them that, like their patroness, they were called upon to fight the good fight in a different and more humble sphere, it is true, but one where much courage is demanded from them if they wish to steer their way safely among the thousand temptations of the Paris streets.

In this same parish of St. Eugène, some charitable ladies were moved to pity when they saw that some of the young women and girls had no place but the streets for their midday recreation. They therefore placed a large garden and a big room at their disposal.

The Œuvre du jardin began in June, 1907; it is now flourishing; over one thousand young girls are regular visitors; their hostesses lend them books, provide them with games and occasionally amuse them with music during their free time. In the same neighborhood the Sisters of Charity have established a restaurant, where for fifty centimes (a dime), the girls can have a good meal; in another house, in the same quarter, is "l'Œuvre du réchaud," where the "midinettes," who prefer bringing their lunch from home, are given a table, a knife and a fork, water and the use of a gas stove for the sum of ten centimes.

Another work, recently founded, is the Secrétariat social, approved by the Archbishop in February, 1910. It was organized by a group of young Catholics, and its object is the welfare of the working classes. Its offices are open every day from nine in the morning till seven at night. It is divided into five sections, each having some particular feature of social work: lectures, syndicates, co-operative associations, libraries, "patronages," savings banks, etc., etc. It is in the hands of laymen who are in touch with the needs and aspirations of the laboring classes. The secrétariat social promises to be a powerful factor in the service of the good cause. Its aim is to teach the working classes to help themselves, and, its spirit being Catholic, it will, at the same time, steer clear of the revolutionary doctrines that pervade the social works founded by the anti-Clerical party.

The abolition of the Concordat has strengthened the independent attitude of the French Bishops. Bishop Dadolle, of Dijon, lately gave proof of this by refusing to permit the coffin of a senator, M. Ricard, to enter the church. This action of the Bishop created a sensation; the dead man's family and friends had counted upon the Church's tolerance in this respect. Though perfectly aware of M. Ricard's hostility to the Church they wished to have a religious funeral because it was more respectable. Mgr. Dadolle thus explained his conduct:

"You know," he said to one of the editors of the Matin, "with what joy the Church receives those who return to her" (and he gave two examples of men prominent in political life who, before dying, had repented and retracted) . . . "From M. Ricard we had nothing of the kind; he knew that he was excommunicated for having voted the separation, and he never gave any sign of regret. . . . My duty is to do all I can to persuade those who have left the Church to return, but if they refuse, why should I bury them with ceremonies they have ridiculed? . . . During their life-time, they are free to enter our churches if they please, but if at their last moment they give no sign of regret for the acts they committed against the Church, they must be buried without us."

Accounts from the provinces tell of the splendid religious fêtes of Le Puy, where a Jubilee takes place whenever the feast of Our Lady's Annunciation falls, as it did this year, on Good Friday. The quaint old city was brilliantly decorated with flags, banners and lights; hundreds of pilgrims came from all parts of France to be present on the first day of the Jubilee, March 24, and among them were many peasants from the mountains of Auvergne who performed the journey on foot. Although there is a decided falling off of religious practices in the French provinces, manifestations such as those that have taken place at Le Puy appeal to patriotism no less than to slumbering convictions, and are a protest against the growing indifference which, even more than open hostility, is the danger that most threatens the Church in provincial France.

ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

The Workingman for the Workingman

In the obscure and dusty cellar of a house situated in the rue de Six-Jetons at Brussels, was founded in 1854 a society that to-day is spread all over Belgium. It was the mustard seed that in a short time became a great tree. To-day the Association de St. François Xavier numbers 366 societies with more than 80,000 members, all workingmen. It is an association for the Apostolate among the workingmen by the workingmen.

The association owes its origin to Louis van Caloen, S.J. He had been disagreeably impressed by the religious indifference among the working class and the difficulty felt by the priest in gaining their confidence. He thereupon conceived the design of forming a society of fervent apostles—laymen—who by prayer, example, word and action would help the priests in bringing back the strayed sheep. By a curious coincidence, while Father van Caloen was thinking over his project and recommending it to God in prayer, a locksmith of Brussels conceived the same design. He exposed his plan to the priest, who saw in this singular coincidence the will of God clearly defined for him. An association of laymen, all workingmen, was resolved upon. The first meeting took place in January, 1854, in a cellar. The number of men present was twelve, and like the twelve apostles of old they were united by one thought—the conversion of their fellow workingmen. Eight days afterwards the headquarters were the chapel of the Christian Brothers, rue des Alexiens. In March the men met in St. Anne's chapel, rue de la Montagne, and when numbers had made another change necessary, in the Church of the Jesuit College, until Father Caloen installed his growing association in a fixed home of its own in the rue du Miroir, where it has a beautiful church in Roman style, a hall, garden and café.

As has been said, the end of the Association de St. François Xavier is the apostolate among the workingmen by the workingmen themselves. This end is attained by the formation of a select few in each centre who are especially instructed and made zealous apostles. But in connection with the religious end there is a social and economic end. In the fusion of these several purposes, one subject to another, Father van Caloen was a pioneer in Belgium, to-day the country par excellence of social activity. The Association of St. François Xavier was the first society of workingmen to commence economical works. Before 1860 Father van Caloen had already founded in Brussels a savings bank, a mutual aid society, an evening school, a soldiers' circle and a public library.

From the outset the association received the approval of Cardinal Sterckx and was favored with many indulgences by Pius IX. Its spread in Belgium was rapid. In 1857, after three years of existence, it numbered 77 societies with 2,300 members, and 150 societies and almost 40,000 members in 1866. The magnificent jubilee celebration held at Brussels in August, 1903, gave evidence of its strong vitality. Although its principal development has been on Belgian soil, in the Flemish provinces most of all, the association has spread to Holland, France, Spain and even America. Thousands of women are affiliated to the work and participate in the indulgences granted to the men. Their rôle is one of prayer for the conversion of sinners.

The associations in the different provinces of Belgium are modeled on that of Brussels, but they enjoy the greatest latitude in the choice of the social works which they may wish to embrace. In many villages the weekly meetings are purely religious; in others the members meet for recreation and distraction after the recitation of the office and are thus preserved from evil influences elsewhere. In different places works of an economical nature are taken up with zest; syndicates or the Boerenbonden, savings banks, medical service, etc., etc. The last census showed fifty per cent. of the associations engaged in this work. The most important have also their own hall, library, band, singing society, etc.

Fifty-six years have passed since the first twelve members met in the cellar at Brussels under the presidency of Father van Caloen. The same Father van Caloen, to-day over ninety-three years old, is still at the head of the work he founded. God only knows the good accomplished and to be accomplished among Belgian workingmen by the Associations de St. François Xavier.

China's Past Year in Brief

SHANGHAI, MARCH 15, 1910.

Great changes have occurred in China during the past year. The dismissal of Yuan Shi-kai at the very outset has deprived the country of one of its best leaders. The Regent and the Manchu party feared his growing authority, and he was suddenly hurled from power. Manchu ascendancy could not be established while he was in Peking. Yuan was a man of judgment and administrative energy; he was also quite familiar with foreign questions, and had a sound grasp of the Constitutional System which is being now established. Since his fall, constant internal discussions have developed at Court and between the various Boards in Peking, a vacillating policy has been displayed in dealing with all important questions, provincial independence has grown bolder and bolder, and the reform movement has received a decided set-back. At various times, the Regent has changed high officials who neglected to carry out Constitutional reforms, but as those appointed in their stead were brought up in obsolete ideas, they did no better than their predecessors. What is wanted is new blood, ability, honesty and earnest co-operation for the public welfare.

Towards the close of the year Kuan Fang, Viceroy of Chihli, was suddenly dismissed. A clash came between him and the Empress-Dowager, and the Regent had no choice but to bow to the nod of the power behind the Throne. The removal of these two prominent statesmen, and this for the most trivial motives, has left the Government without any commanding leader. The deaths of Chang Chi-tung and Grand Secretary Sen Kia-nai have but added to the misfortunes of the situation. At the close of the year, it would seem there was a lack of confidence on the part of the foreign powers and even of the Chinese themselves in the stability of the present Government.

The inauguration of the Provincial Assemblies in November and December indicates a step forward in Constitutional Government, and deserves to be followed with close attention in the future. So far, these assemblies enjoy neither legislative nor executive power; they are merely deliberative, and can only make suggestions which may or may not be carried out by the Viceroy. In such conditions it was natural to expect that they would vindicate more independence, and this was the general temper displayed, a fact that will sooner or later bring this New Body into collision with the Higher Authorities.

The School Question in Belgium

LOUVAIN, APRIL 10, 1910.

A struggle has just been waging in this country that throws a strange light on conditions of which Americans with no knowledge of the continent little dream. In an unlucky hour two Socialists got together and interpellated the Minister of Sciences and Arts on the school policy of the Government. The country is on the eve of important legislative elections and they hoped to draw great stock from the fatal admissions of the Minister, and matter for many a fine tirade against the "clericals." They could hardly have taken a more fatal step, for if there is any one issue on which the Catholics are united as well as right, it is that very school question.

The Socialist Masson began by attacking the recent utterances of certain Catholics calling for equality of treatment, such as that of M. Kurth at Mechlin, and seeking to show the contradiction between the minister's adhesion to that speech, and what he, the orator, conceived to be the minister's duty. Now it may seem strange to us that while Catholics have been in power for twenty-six years, they are not better situated in the matter of schools. The same situation exists in Belgium as in the United States; the Catholic pays taxes for the public schools, and then has to support the Catholic "free" school to which he sends his children.

There is this difference. If the Catholics are the majority in the district, then the public school-teachers are Catholic; but if not, the teachers, and the teaching, are notoriously anti-religious and often anti-dynastic. Hence a very unequal state of education. In all the larger cities where the Catholics are outnumbered, the schools are bad, as in the country and the smaller towns they are good. Thus in Brussels, in their so-called "neutral" public schools, the text-book of "morals" is that of Jules Payot, which the French bishops have condemned—as chronicled at length in AMERICA—and whose author is by his office charged with enforcing neutrality in the schools of Paris.

The reason for this state of affairs is twofold: the cautious and tolerant attitude of the Catholics, and the very inherent difficulty of the question. Every solution thus far offered has failed. To subsidize all schools alike is to establish that principle of subjection to the State, dear to the Liberals. Other solutions offend that liberty which the party in power has always respected. Hence many insist that after all the present situation is best, even if unjust.

The Liberals' policy is clear. Their sole political dogma in Belgium is the omnipotence of the State, and the subservience of the Church to it. Their aim is the expulsion of religion from the schools, just as in France. Hence a double line of conduct. The first step is the passing of obligatory education. This is to establish the principle; to give the State a hand in the school. It is enough. From that the step is easy to the famous "neutral" school,—neutral only in name. At present the law calls for an hour's catechism a week in all public schools. From the "neutral" school, there is hardly a step at all to the openly irreligious.

With all this in mind, the Minister, M. Descamps, replied; and then that keen old statesman, M. Woeste, rose to defend the policy he has always stood for. In one of the most brilliant speeches of a very brilliant career, he set forth the rights of the Catholics in the matter, and proved beyond a doubt the Government's tolerance. He then turned on his enemies, and that was what his enemies wished least of all.

They shrink from the semblance of a war of intolerance—before the elections, of course; and on this he hammered strongly. There was only one logical outcome of their present policy, he said, and the proof he triumphantly held out, couched in the very words they supplied him with in their angry interruptions; it was this very war of intolerance. Once more he had saved the situation, and from the crushing defeat the "bloc" had planned, it became a great victory for the Right, when one after another their best orators thrust the lesson home. The country was roused; M. Woeste had only had to hold aloft the banner of union for all to rally to it. And indeed the Catholics are only too willing to fight out the elections on that issue, for on it they stand united to a man and are sure to win thousands of votes they would otherwise certainly lose.

The "bloc" saw this and changed tactics. They tried to calm the storm they had conjured up. It was too late. Seeing the favorable state of public opinion, and that never before since 1879, the last "Education War," had the country been so much with them, the Catholics struck while the iron was hot, and, on the ground of common justice, introduced a bill giving a quarter of a million dollars to the "free"—that is, Catholic,—school-teachers. It was a masterly stroke. Those Catholics who were angered by the Government's late military policy were instantly appeased, while never perhaps had there been a more favorable moment for doing justice to the Catholic teachers. The bill was debated in the midst of an indescribable tumult, raised by the angry and baffled "bloc." M. Woeste again figured brilliantly, and the bill passed the first reading by a vote of 85-6, the whole Left having quit the house. It later passed the second reading.

Hence the arrogant intolerance of the anti-Clericals cost them dear. The Catholic party is more united than ever; the primaries have taken place and there is now almost a certainty of retaining all their present seats. The Flemish question is one that strikes across the whole of Belgium, regardless of religion and politics, dividing into two camps Catholics, Liberals and Socialists, and rousing the deepest and most uncontrollable feeling. The new bill, presented by two Antwerp deputies, MM. Franck and Segers, Liberal and Catholic respectively, tends to give more time to the use of the Flemish tongue in the classrooms of the colleges. The Catholics seem to have completely healed their differences, but the dissension on the Left is grave. The bill will probably pass by a mixed majority.

* Garbling Public Opinion

Having taken ample time to sift the mass of journalistic comment, the Literary Digest of April 16 gives a belated comment of the Roosevelt incident at Rome in such fashion that public opinion is made to hold the Vatican at fault. To do so demanded considerable skill, and something more; but the inspired scissors possess all the requirements. The vast majority of our leading journals from every part of the country have condemned Mr. Roosevelt's action, yet the Digest has found "the serious comment of the lay press" commending the wisdom and even the tactfulness of our ex-President, and crediting the whole trouble to the blundering tactlessness of Cardinal Merry del Val. Brushing aside one set of journals as "anti-Roosevelt" and most of the remainder as not "serious" because humor adds spice to their censure, it proceeds for three pages to glean and garble, insinuate and discriminate, citing persons and paragraphs to its purposes with a deftness that turns condemnation into seeming commendation. As a finishing stroke, it wrests from its context a phrase of Archbishop Ireland's and stalks off with an air of lofty impartiality.

The use of Archbishop Ireland's name is characteristic of its methods. The statement of his Grace of St. Paul was convincing of the Vatican's propriety and the ex-President's blunder. Of this the Digest supplies not a hint; but the single phrase—that had the Vatican been discourteous American Catholics would resent it—which though perfectly proper in the context, is open to misinterpretation when wrenched from it, is selected for the grand finale.

Mr. Roosevelt's magazine is cited in full; so is his secretary's grandiloquent and inflated explanation in the Times; so is his own lengthy cablegram and even the mutilated version of the Vatican's reply to his requests for audience; yet the true version which puts the matter in quite a different light is altogether suppressed. The Papal Secretary's account of the occurrence is also withheld, but the fabrication that the Cardinal's father rejoiced that his son had humiliated an American is cleverly exploited.

We are not interested in the religion or politics of the Digest: were it frankly partizan we should ignore it; that it plays the rôle of a Roosevelt press-agent is no concern of ours. Our objection is, not that it is biased or anti-Catholic, but that it is so while posing as an impartial exponent of public opinion. In that character it unearthed and published the Speer calumnies; while the press of all creeds of all the world were glorifying the Blessed Maid of Orleans, it represented her as an impostor; and after a silence of many months, it devotes a page of the present number to an elucidation of the theory that Blessed Jeanne d'Arc was a spiritualistic medium!

Catholics as well as all other fairminded people should not permit themselves to be hoodwinked by the disingenuous methods of this plausible gleaner. We understand that partizanship has not stimulated its circulation or advertizing. Bile and bias do not promote even literary digestion.

Socialism in Practice

Milwaukee being the first city to elect a mayor and a common council or board of aldermen of the Socialistic persuasion, that charming city by the lake will attract a great deal of close attention from the whole country, for the new administration is bound by ante-election platform pledges to attempt the execution of tremendous social and economic changes in the city government. Frankly, we cannot see a happy outcome to the proposed measures. As long as there is such an inexorable yet elusive thing as the law of supply and demand, as long as the table of United States money calls for ten dimes to make a dollar, human ingenuity will be baffled in trying to override one and ignore the other.

The new administration has already announced that it will not attempt to introduce at once all that its pre-election manifesto proclaimed, but that where questions of policy are involved Socialists will be placed in charge. Enough, however, of their platform remains to be put into practice to give some of their theories a working test and to arouse misgivings in the breast of the staid, matter-of-fact citizen who was too busy to vote on election day.

The city is to have cheaper fuel, light and bread, and car fares. Capital, but whence the funds to start or buy outright the necessary plants? If the city government is to use its funds for such purposes, it must have a larger income, and that income arises from taxes of one kind or another. The higher the taxes on tenements or lodging houses, for instance, the higher the rent will soar. And who pays the rent? If the grocer must pay for a license to conduct his business, which at best yields a moderate return on the capital invested, the cost of the license must be added to his flour and potatoes.

If certain industries are to be taxed out of existence, the result may be realized, but even with that end accomplished income will still be needed. Theorists are not necessarily good managers. On the contrary, many a brilliant theorist has not practical sense enough to run a lawnmower economically. But when theories so opposed to the established order are to be reduced offhand to practice, we see, without prophetic vision, a confusion of end and means and a financial havoc which must afflict the city. We shall follow with keen interest the unfolding and application of the political cure-all in Milwaukee.

Legislation on the Scapulars

In one of our preceding numbers (see Vol. II, page 535) we quoted from an article of Father Ferreres in Razón y Fe on the new concession of the Holy Father concerning the use of medals instead of scapulars. Since that article of Father Ferreres appeared, Father Vermeersch, in Supplementa et Monumenta Periodica, for March, 1910, has published documents that show how easy henceforth it will be for the faithful to avail themselves of this new concession. These documents contain the authorized formulas to be used by those who wish to obtain the faculty of blessing medals for the purpose referred to above. According to these formulas, any bishop, superior of a religious order or congregation, or priest may get this faculty by applying to the Sacred Congregation of Rites. Upon due application the Sacred Congregation grants "the power to bless with the mere sign of the cross medals of the Blessed Virgin Mary that will replace the scapulars according to the terms of the petition." After five years the faculty has to be renewed. From the reading of the petition and of the corresponding grant it is clear that a medal blessed in virtue of this faculty may replace only the five scapulars that used to be joined together, that is, the scapulars, of the Most Holy Trinity, of the Passion of our Lord, of the Immaculate Conception, of the Seven Dolors, and of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. Moreover a medal thus blessed must bear the image of the Blessed Virgin and replaces the scapulars only after one has been duly invested with the scapulars themselves. As to the manner of wearing the medal, nothing is expressly prescribed, and it is not necessary to wear it suspended from the neck or close to the body, as it has already been explained in a previous official declaration.

These changes introduced by the Holy See with regard to scapulars prove once more that external devotions derive their value from the sanction and approval of ecclesiastical authority and not from the mere use of any definite material sign. As Father Vermeersch remarks, this act of the Holy Father inculcates true, genuine piety and emphasizes the divinely given authority of the Vicar of Christ.

The Passing of Mark Twain

Samuel Langhorne Clemens, "Mark Twain," died at his home in Redding, Conn., on April 21, in his seventy-fifth year. The celebrated humorist was born in Missouri and, after an eventful experience as steamboat pilot on the Mississippi and as a journalist, rose to fame by the publication in 1869 of "The Innocents Abroad," a volume of extravagantly humorous travels, not devoid of coarseness, offensive both to literary taste and to religious feeling. His chief fame rests on books, like "Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn," of the picaresque variety. Whether they will have the permanence in popular esteem which is accorded to classics may well be doubted. As an author, however, Mr. Clemens was perhaps, the most popular and successful of his time. His "Joan of Arc" written in serious vein is generally admitted to be one of the noblest tributes to that heroic figure in our literature, winning for him universal admiration and respect, and throwing into the background the flippant disrespect, sometimes amounting to blasphemy, of some of his more popular works.

Mr. Clemens, it has been declared, will exert a better influence for good in the future by the courageous example of his life than by his literary achievements taken as a whole. In the opinion of many he deserves to be remembered with Walter Scott, if not for the magic of his pen, at least for the same manly qualities of fortitude in adversity and resolute honesty of private life. Like Scott he engaged in the expensive business of publishing; like him, he failed and found himself burdened with debt at a time when most men are looking to rest from their labors; but, unlike Scott, he had the satisfaction of living to triumph where others would have succumbed.

The Pardoning Power

The action of the Governor of Tennessee in promptly pardoning his friend and political adviser, whose twenty-year sentence for the murder of Senator Carmack had been just affirmed by the State Supreme Court, should not be held characteristic of his State or section. The jury and the courts of Tennessee did their duty, and the Southern press is practically unanimous in upholding the law and condemning the governor. Their condemnation extends beyond the present case to his general abuse of the pardoning power—an abuse which unfortunately is not confined to Tennessee or sectional lines. According to the Nashville correspondent of a metropolitan paper, Governor Paterson has granted 956 pardons in three years, and in murder cases alone has nullified the work of 152 judges, 228 lawyers and 1,824 jurymen. That in such a number of cases there were mitigating circumstances which jurymen under their oath were not permitted to consider, is inconceivable, nor is it likely that such a wanton abuse of power will be sanctioned by the electors of Tennessee.

In the neighboring State of Georgia, a governor who freely exercised the pardoning power was displaced after one term by the present governor, whose persistent refusal to reverse the action of the courts has but served to enhance his popularity. His view of the ethics of the question, cited in AMERICA (Vol. I, No. 22), has met with general acceptance:

"While the pardoning power conferred upon the executive is practically unlimited, yet it must be held in mind that it was the manifest intent of those framing the Constitution that it should be exercised in such manner as would not impair the confidence in the purity of the fountains of justice, the courts, or weaken the foundations on which society is built."

And again, in a later pronouncement, Governor Brown insists that while the example of frequent executive clemency generates disregard for legal restraints and conduces to criminality, on the contrary "respect for the law and a consequent desire to uphold and obey it, is inculcated by the certainty of its enforcement; and even mercy must be so discerningly extended as to suggest the constant presence of justice."

No such suggestion is discernible in the pardon granted by the chief executive of Tennessee. His example, if generally followed, would mean the usurpation of judicial functions by the political dictator of the moment; and it is much to be hoped that no political section will permit itself to be swayed by partizan considerations into upholding a course of action which threatens the peace and safety of all the people of the State.

One View of the Roman Incident

A New York weekly, edited by a non-Catholic, says editorially: "It seems rather strange that the Methodist Church should find it necessary to erect a building in Rome, at a cost of a quarter of a million of dollars, for its church and college work there in proselyting Catholics, when it had already in this city one of the greatest fields in the world. When the Catholics were few in New York the Methodists were a powerful body with churches all over the lower part of the city. The old John Street Church, which is a revered shrine to this day, was the cradle of the sect and was only erected through the tolerant spirit of the people, as it was an unlawful church. The Methodists of that early day were humble persons and met in an obscure place, but their religious zeal was admitted, and prominent Episcopalians and others joined in the movement to give them a permanent building. A fireplace was put in so that it could be classed as a dwelling. The minister helped to build it. When the great influx of immigrants took place, Catholics came into these neighborhoods in such numbers that powerful Catholic churches soon appeared. Here was a better opportunity of proselyting than will ever occur in Rome. But the Methodists did not take advantage of it. Congregation after congregation moved away to more select Protestant localities uptown. The Catholic Church has grown to immense proportions without protest and without resistance on the part of the Methodists, once in almost complete possession of the field, and we find them established at great cost in Rome, which, however limited it may be in furnishing converts, gives a basis for religious clamor and bigotry."

The departure of the Rev. Dr. Ganss from Carlisle, Pa., to a new field of labor in Lancaster, is regretted by the people of the township where he labored for nearly twenty years. The Carlisle Evening Sentinel, expressing the feeling of the people he is leaving, says:

"It is always to be lamented when any strong and influential man leaves a community, and so it is much regretted that Carlisle is to lose Father Ganss, the rector of St. Patrick's church for a generation. He has been a most efficient churchman and to those of us who remember St. Patrick's before he took charge of it and see the work he has done in rebuilding the church and rectory and in building and establishing St. Katharine's School and the enlarged work among the Indians, his work is remarkable.

"Besides he has added much to the musical interests of the town in developing local talent and in bringing here some of the best talent of the country. Altogether, while wishing him well in his new field, we will all regret his leaving old Carlisle."

Interest in the acceptance of another post by Dr. Ganss, however, is not purely local. His excellent work in behalf of the inmates of the Indian School at Carlisle has enlarged the circle of those who follow his movements. For many years he has been looking after the spiritual welfare of the Catholic Indian youths at Carlisle and through his efforts has resulted substantial improvement in their religious condition. Not content with this, Dr. Ganss has given himself to the study of the larger questions involved in the Indian problem; he has mastered the history of government legislation for the Indians and the government policy since the days of the Grant administration, so far as the fluctuating conduct of the Federal Indian officials affected the civilization or Christianization of those wards of the nation. A series of papers, remarkable for keen analysis and scholarly treatment of the politico-religious history of the Indians, were written by him for the Messenger in 1907. It is hoped that the new rector of St. Mary's, Lancaster, will not be thwarted or embarrassed by his new duties from continuing his good work for the Indian Schools.

MAY-DAY AT OXFORD

In the old country across the sea, where Father Thames wanders through the low-lying fields, and hides himself away between the pollard oaks that crown his banks, there is a city made all of spires and turret tops and gabled roofs, with perhaps, some fair sprinkling of red brick villas; an ivy-covered, sunlit town, which the geography calls Oxford, and which a certain section of British youth knows as just "The 'Varsity." Of but moderate size, laid away among the low hills, it sends its towers into a blue heaven and is forever wrapped in a soft, warm air, that would seem to be its right by reason of the peerless gems of architecture which make the centre of its being. The history of a thousand years hangs over it, rich with the glamor that must always cling around the great triumphs of the human mind. For here, the master-intellects of the world have been fostered, cherished and reared to their giant perfection.

A library could not hold all the story that Oxford has to tell, a romance of domes and pinnacles, of shadowy rivers and stately schools. A man may step from the road into some echoing gateway, and lo, Time goes back three hundred years; grey walls are everywhere, dim cloisters and still courtyards, paved with the greenest, smoothest turf that grows. Or, at a dozen different points he may drop into a skiff and drift away through quiet aisles of tree and water, where the sunlight can but filter through their canopy, and only Nature seems to inhabit the earth.

On a time, I, the stranger of a day within the town, had spent an afternoon strolling through hall and chapel, cloister and shady walk. My thoughts had roamed into the past, over the time when England had held her Faith and gloried in it, and I had yielded to a fruitless sense of longing to see this home of high knowledge bend the knee once more to the Church and God. I thought of the men who had come out from these walls into the forefront of her battle line—Southwell, Campion, Acton, and—even since Unbelief had made its cradle and nursery here—of Newman, that matchless fighter for the truth and the highest things of life.

Then it was that some subtle spirit of the place seemed gradually to dominate all other thoughts, and held me captive just where a crumbling porch opened into a still quadrangle. Such a picture of calm beauty it would be hard to equal. The stone of three hundred years ago looked down on every side, its summits battlemented, its faces enriched with the noble Gothic ornament, its mullioned windows, diamond-paned, catching the sun's rays and flashing them back, bathing the grey walls in a flood of mellow light. Tall limes and taller poplars shadowed the walk that passed around the court, the whole a most perfect harmony of color, of sunlight and dark stone and oaken doorways and the fresh, young green of new-born foliage.

I fell to wondering how this thing could be, this rich atmosphere of other days, having but the space of an old grey wall between it and the twentieth century's noise. And the answer seemed to come straightway, quietly and forcefully, bearing down all doubt, from above the coping of an archway close by, where, eaten with age, stood a figure of the Madonna, kneeling before an angel—him who brought her heaven's news of her motherhood. Somehow, in this silent court, it was not strange that Mary should still be here, keeping her vigil of prayer through the long night of infidelity, though her name had been dragged in mockery across the centuries.

She seemed to fill her place now, as queen of all wisdom and culture, every whit as surely as when the sixth Henry proclaimed her title to his people. And the old stone image, cracked and broken as it was, made forthwith, a swift kaleidoscope of the years, wherein I seemed to see how the queen had held her sway, moving to the melody of her own songs, ringed round with her children, opening to them the full stores of learning that lead to her and God; then, alas, in the afterwards, standing again above the arch, praying always, and—alone.

All she may do in this latter time, is to fill her forgotten shrine with something of the peace of heaven, and shut out the rushing sound of the world as it races by, keeping this unruffled, perfect calm as a mantle about her, to remind them who may choose to remember, that through the darkest night of unbelief, she still is a queen enthroned, awaiting the King's good time for her people's return to their fealty and love.

When I reached my inn it was almost night. My landlord, setting a meal before me, enquired if I had admired the city. I answered him with a look, and he went on to suggest that I be present at the singing of the May Song next day. Full of the afternoon's dreaming, I started at the words. May Song? Had Mary come back to her kingdom? And was some new Era of Faith about to fulfil itself?

He explained it was only the keeping of an ancient custom. The story told that an eccentric benefactor, wishing to endow Magdalen College, had laid down as the condition of his gift that, on each May-Day at dawn, the choir should sing a hymn to the Virgin Mother from the top of the chapel tower. The Latin song had long since been exchanged for an Episcopalian hymn, but the old English melody was still in use, and many folks collected on the first of May at the bridge below the college, whence the ceremony might be easily followed.

Of course, I would be present, and as the sun rose behind the great oaks down on the river bank, I was leaning against the stone balustrade of Magdalen Bridge, revelling in the freshness of an English spring, and wondering at the intellect that had sent into the sky that square-cut chapel tower, lifted it in perfect grace of outline high above the mass of the surrounding buildings. Men surely prayed with their hands in those other days, worshiping their God in the very stones with which they housed Him.

The coming ceremony must have been popular, for the bridge was filled with men and women and children. A hum of talk went round, light and rippling, with bursts of laughter, talk that was keyed up to the bright promise of the day. It was a morning when, to be just alive, with health and strength, seemed the most blessed gift out of heaven.

And now, there came a hush, and every eye turned upward toward the tower. White surplices were fluttering there. People whispered, "The choir is coming." A minute more, and out over the stillness of the young day, while the sun laid its first kiss on water and trees and age-worn stone, a song floated, and rose, and fell; a song of minor harmonies that clung about the tower, and dropped down to the listeners below, in a long sob of melody. It came again, and all the infinite pity of England's blindness seemed gathered in the echo. Three times the old chant was quavered out, then the surplices disappeared, and the tower was silent once more.

And the crowd, laughing and chatting, melted away; but I stayed on, leaning over the bridge, the spell of yesterday back with all its force, seeing my pageant as before, but more vivid now, more gracious, more beautiful. Here was a Queen Mother honored, beloved, leading her people to the wells of knowledge; a tender, all-loving sovereign, she and they, happy subjects, singing her praises at their work and their play, calling her name at every need, running to her feet at each trifling sorrow, seeking there, and finding all the mother's wisdom and comfort and loving care.

And I thought, in the days when England was Mary's and her Son's, it must surely have been good to live here. Her shrines everywhere, her image above each doorway, the schools and the halls of this hoar university, ancient even then, boasting everyone their allegiance to the gracious Queen of Wisdom. Glad mother of a happy land must she have been.

And now—now, they have forgotten her, and all the gaunt spectres of atheism gibber through the world, marking it for their own. A man might be forgiven for a sense of bitter helplessness—I had almost said, of hopelessness—at thought of his country's loss. The very song, whose echoes were not yet silent, was laden with the same lament.

Then, because it is good to get away sometimes from the stern realities, cloaked as they are with the grim pettiness of daily existence, because it is good to take wings of fancy, and bring heaven down to earth, making of earth a place where men love and do not hate, are clean and do not sin, serve their God and loathe the wrong, and count their most cherished privilege that of being the children of His mother, because it is good to forget for a little that we live in this sorry place called the world—I must needs, looking up at the stately tower, draw a picture for my soul, of this university as she might be in some halcyon time to be, Mary's home, her shrine where men offered her their purest worship, lived but to do her honor, fought with tongue and pen for her dear name, and laid their laurels at her feet. So might this queen become a rich head-spring of holy influence to the sons of men, flowing out over the earth, drawing humanity into its embrace, bearing them on to the highest and noblest in human life.

An idle dream, no more, born of the sight of a broken statue, the sound of a simple hymn, and the sense of the glad spring sunshine. Yet one came back again from the flight with some far-off breath of that imagined heaven still scenting the air, caressing the soul, and making the daily strife seem just a little easier, the trials just a little lighter, the goal just a little nearer.

And, too, somewhere at the back of the soul, there may have been a faint inkling, the mirage of a million miles, that showed forth a shadowy outline of that day, when these things should really be, when the Queen Mother and her beautiful Son should be all in all to all men, and the heart-ache of this nether world drop into eternity and be lost in a perfect joy.

LITERATURE

The Religion of the Chinese. By J. J. M. DE GROOT, Ph.D. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1910. $1.25 net.

The Religions of Eastern Asia. By HORACE GRANT UNDERWOOD, D.D. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1910. $1.50 net.

To portray the religious beliefs and practices of China and her neighbors before the inevitable change of the old order in those interesting lands of venerable lore and traditions, was the commendable purpose of two courses of lectures just presented to the public by the Macmillans, in two neat attractive volumes. Dr. De Groot is a well-known authority on phases of religious life in China, but he has dealt more with curious and rather superficial aspects of the subject than with the deeper questions of religious beliefs. This was true of his voluminous work, "The Religious System of China." In the present volume the first three of the seven lectures are mostly taken up with what might be called religious folk-lore and popular superstitions. He conveys the impression (p. 9) that Confucius shared in, and sanctioned, the extravagant belief in spectres, whereas it is well known that the sage studiously avoided the subject of spirits and preternatural manifestations. Dr. De Groot accepts the evolutionary theory of religion in general, ignoring the fact of supernatural revelation. In this, of course, we do not agree with him. As to China in particular, most of the best Sinologists admit traces of the primitive revelation in the ancient classics.

Dr. Underwood's course of six lectures is a more serious study, and gives a more satisfactory presentation of the subject. To begin with, the plural in his title is more accurate than the singular, for China, as well as Japan and Corea, has several religions differing in origin, beliefs and forms of worship. In the first paragraphs on "Taoism," there seems to be some confusion between the common meaning of the word Tao, way or doctrine, and its use as the proper name of a particular religion or philosophy.

In the treatment of Confucianism it is surprising that neither of the lecturers has noticed the positively materialistic turn given to the teaching by later philosophers, such as the famous

Chu-H'si of the twelfth century. Chu-H'si's tablet occupies the last place in orthodox Confucian temples. He is reckoned the last of the authoritative interpreters of classic antiquity, much as St. Bernard is held as the last of the Fathers in Catholic tradition.

Readers in quest of information about the Far East will find in these two little volumes much instructive and generally reliable matter, presented in a readable and attractive form. Dr. De Groot's English, though highly creditable for a foreigner, is not above exception. Fault might be found with Dr. Underwood's use of the foreign-looking word "Sinologue." If Sinologue, why not Assyriologue or Geologue?

WILLIAM L. HORNSBY, S.J.

Social Relationship in the Light of Christianity. By W. E. CHADWICK, D.D., B. Sc. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1910.

A New Heaven and a New Earth. By CHARLES BRODIE PATTERSON. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.

East London Visions. By O'DERMID W. LAWLER. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1910.

These are three painful books. The author of the first tells us that it is a development of the Hulsean Lectures, 1909-1910, and we think the Hulsean foundation might have been better employed. We are all agreed that social relationships are in an unsatisfactory state; and with regard to them he gathers together a mass of obvious assertions only to pick at them in a half-hearted sort of way. He does not give the remedies otherwise than vaguely, anxious apparently to avoid hurting the feelings of the members of the various anti-Christian schools. The main fault of the book is that the author is not equipped for his task. He is a Doctor of Divinity who does not know what a theological virtue is, and expresses himself in this bewildered and bewildering way: "These moral virtues" (the foundation of national stability), "are also regarded as theological, that is, they issue from the Divine Will and therefore are part of the nature or character of God." As the Doctor of Divinity writes in this style, it is not surprising that the Bachelor of Science undertakes to discuss social problems apparently without the aid of fundamental ethics. His acceptance of the broad conclusions of Biblical criticism does not help him to show social relationships in the light of Christianity.

The second is a still more distressing book, because it is arrogant in its ineptitude. Mr. Patterson thinks he has discovered that he is not "a worm of the earth" and "a miserable sinner," and would persuade others that they are like him. Life is short. Let us hope that he and they will discover their error before it is too late, otherwise, they will find the first subtitle of this book unverified, and that it is the way not to eternal life, but to eternal death. The second subtitle: "Thought Studies of the Fourth Dimension" is simply an imposition. The first chapter consists of definitions which do not define. Thus: "The mind is that part of us which pictures or images all things, and afterwards thinks, reasons and forms judgments of what it has pictured. Man's sense nature is that part of his being which corresponds to his five senses through which he comes into closer contact with nature." Yet, as all can see the "picturing faculty" belongs rather to the "sense nature" than to the intellect or "mind." In an advertising slip, R. Heber Newton lavishes encomiums on Mr. Patterson, and Mr. Patterson will no doubt do the same for Mr. Newton when occasion arises. Nevertheless, Mr. Patterson's new thought is only a very shallow exposition of old Pantheism and Gnosticism; and the Pattersonian. Rules for meditation are those of the Gymnosophists, with a slight change: for contemplation of the navel the profound and original thinker has substituted contemplation of the solar plexus.

The third book is mysterious. The author clearly attaches a moral to it. But what this is, as Lord Dundreary used to tell us half a century ago, "is one of those things no fellow can find out." The preface says the book is "a statement and criticism of Life on an unusual plan;" "a portrayal of the conflict between a new soul" (if new, why does he write pourtrayal?) "and an old world, and the efforts that soul makes to construct some spiritual, floating ark, or even only seaworthy life-belt, against the deluge of scepticism that threatens to submerge the highest landmarks of the world." "The significance of the story and its views," it tells us, "will be best understood when it is considered as an Essay of Values," though what this means is not quite clear. The book is an unwholesome one. There is, nevertheless, some satisfaction for the reader. Having branded journalism as a profession of lies and without having changed his opinion, the hero joins the Pall Mall Gazette under Frederick Greenwood; as far as one can make out, marries the Star Lady, the daughter of a respectable mechanic, and, his hunger and humiliations ended, settles down to live at least comfortably and perhaps happily ever after. But whether in this he has the approval of the author, we are utterly unable to make out.

Idols of Education. By CHARLES MILLS GAYLEY. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. Price 50 cents.

Professor Gayley, from California, unites his voice with the professors of the East in the condemnation of present educational methods. The weaknesses of kindergarten, primary, high school and college are set forth fearlessly and trenchantly. The indictment of the undergraduate is scathing and as true as it is sad. Electivism has enlisted one more high-executioner. Soon there will be none so poor as to do the god of the last educational decade any reverence. Unless something is done to stop the slaughter, there will not be a solitary mourner at the funeral of electivism. Latin and Greek with some science and history and everything prescribed up to Junior, at least, is in general terms the course outlined by Professor Gayley. In the lower schools he would have for part of the pupils industrial education, after the fashion of the medieval guilds. Mark that, ye adorers of modern idols! For others he would have a general training. In the colleges he does not seem to be an out-and-out adherent of prescribed studies, but would have courses for different professions. He proposes to gain time by improved methods, and to give a college degree at twenty-one and a professional degree at twenty-four. In this idea he is more modern than medieval. The book is eminently readable. The style is fresh and sparkling, and lends itself to apt quotation. The power to write so attractive a book is the best argument Professor Gayley could offer for his views. F. J. D.

Mother Erin, her People and her Places, Described Anew for Children. By ALICE DEASE. With sixteen full-page plates. St. Louis: B. Herder.

Few lands are better loved than Ireland, and in the simple and affectionate way in which the writer of this pleasing little book tells of the history and legends, the charms and glories of Mother Erin will not appeal to her childish readers alone. Some of her grown-up sons and daughters who are here abroad, will doubtless feel a tug at their heart-strings, when they read of the beauties of Erin's scenery, the story of her cities, of her Saints and heroes, and her famous sons of later days.

The style is bright, familiar and entertaining, and the numerous illustrations from photographs of the people and the places, add interest and comprehension to the text. The chapter on the Saints of Ireland is a rhyming alphabet,—very naive in places, as where we are told of St. Aedh, the builder, that:

"He raised a hundred churches, in the country round
Monasterevan,

Which have now gone to ruin, and their builder's gone to heaven!"

The description of a day in the life of a Connemara boy, which comes at the last of the book, is likewise very entertaining. And Malachi's day and the volume end happily together, when all the family kneel in the dusk, on the floor of their humble cabin, to murmur the soft Gaelic accents of their evening prayers.

The Islands of Titicaca and Kaoti. By ADOLPH F. BANDELIER. New York: The Hispanic Society of America. Price $5.00.

This is the latest work from one who has devoted his life to research into the customs of American aborigines and exploration of prehistoric ruins. After years of investigation among the town Indians of the Southwestern United States, he conducts us in the present volume to the shores of Lake Titicaca on the Bolivian plateau and there displays in detail the ruins of former days, acquaints us with the intimate life of the half-savage denizens of the district and relates their myths, legends and superstitions.

Somebody has defined "preface" as "the part of a book which is not read," and appended notes as "a way to shift blame." Here, at least, the preface is to be read and as for the notes plentifully supplied for each chapter, whoever misses them fails to get the benefit of the book. A modern map of the lake district and eighty-five full-page illustrations picture more fully to the eye what is so graphically described in the text.

The ruins, the flora, the fauna, the topography, all receive ample treatment. The description of the present state of the natives, their pretended poverty, their cannibalistic tendencies still but imperfectly controlled, their esoteric organization and rites, their incongruous combinations of religion and sorcery in their monotonous lives, unite to make a volume of surpassing interest to the archeologist, to the ethnologist, to the physiographer. How faint has been the impression made on the Indians by the centuries of Caucasian predominance is one of the most striking lessons of this monumental work.

A Red-Handed Saint. By OLIVE KATHARINE PARR. New York: Benziger Brothers.

A more expressive title would be "Slums, Cells and Society." The reader is piloted in quick succession through jails, drawing-rooms, workhouses, convents, monasteries and London slums by an interesting and well-informed guide, who has the knack of imparting credibility to a very marvelous narrative. To a strong and healthy faith and a decided preference for black or wandering sheep the writer unites the literary gift. The heroine is gradually educated from a murderer to a saint without straining probabilities. There is a great variety of good and bad thieves and other criminals, evidently drawn from life; Periwinkle Poll might have stepped from the pages of Dickens, had Dickens possessed our author's spiritual insight. From the lowest strata of society we pass at once to the highest, and here the writer is not so convincing. Sceptics, Modernists and Higher Critics are promptly and effectively silenced, but only convinced by the example of the converted criminals. Several enter religious life, and here we particularly commend the author's racy refutation of prejudices and false notions which are too common even among Catholics. In some 300 pages she touches on a large variety of live topics and generally adorns them. We cannot think with her that a favorite cat "deserved Christian burial in consecrated ground far more richly than some of those humans who lie there." However, save in a few points like this, she is always correct in tone and text. The moral is contained in a series of questions on page 1: "Why do we spend hours a day reading all the rubbish that is turned out by the ton from countless presses, and squeeze spiritual reading into a grudging, yawning ten minutes at bedtime? Why do we sit up till the small hours playing bridge and not make a point of never missing daily Mass? Why do we send subscriptions to Rescue and Prisoners' Aid Societies, and then dine blandly with people who are much more really criminal than half those in prison?" The binding, printing and cover design do credit to the publishers.

The Wonders of the Universe, What Science Says of God. By JAS. L. MEAGHER, D.D., Member of the Association for the Advancement of Science, President of the Christian Press Association. New York: Christian Press Association.

The book is divided into five parts: the wonders of the heavens, of the solar system, the earth, life and human life. It is an interesting epitome of the sciences of astronomy, geology, physics, chemistry, physiology and others. The tone throughout is deeply religious. The author continually calls attention to facts which might easily have been otherwise, but which show forth Infinite Intelligence and the designs of an over-ruling kind Providence. The Galileo case and the theory of evolution are especially well treated. For lectures, sermons and instructions the reader will find an abundance of most interesting material.

From a scientific standpoint we cannot subscribe to everything the writer says. Thus we cannot admit that the radiations of the stars keep the earth warm, nor that, "if suddenly these vast suns were blotted from the firmament, life would cease from earth." Nor do astronomers say that Arcturus is the central sun of the universe, nor that we shall "plunge down near his surface, and his heat will melt our world." The writer even gives December 22 in the year 55,905 as the date when we shall "be on the opposite side of Arcturus." He says that "plants and animals survived former Arcturus summers and will again," a prophecy which plainly contradicts the preceding statement.

THE PORTAL

I said, when Pleiades was up and all the starry choir
Sang to the countless hosts of space with tongues of living fire:
How wonderful, how wonderful this house of glittering things,
This marvel of Orion's belt, this blaze of Saturn's rings!
How vast the spaces of the home, where suns like fireflies shine;
Where wreaths of constellations hang and twine and intertwine;
Where mighty Sirius drifts along, a thistle zephyr-fann'd;
Where huge Canopus floats and gleams, a speck of glowing sand;
Where runs the endless Milky Way, a silver bridge of light;
Where stands the Pole Star at his post, the helmsman of the night;
Where Distance hath not term nor name and Time outstrips
the mind,
Where clouds on clouds of wheeling worlds blow down the cosmic wind—

Then spake a mystic inner voice, as soft as mid-May blooms—
"This is the portal of God's house wherein are many rooms!"

LIBRARY NEWS AND NOTES

Andrew Lang has reviewed, in the English Bookman for April, Dr. Hay Fleming's work, "The Reformation in Scotland." The Doctor is gently taken to task by Mr. Lang for the usual squinting views about the Catholic Church so common in our literature. We think our readers will enjoy the very sensible commentaries of the distinguished man of letters.

Dr. Fleming went to great pains in order to show the licentiousness and ignorance of the Scottish clergy before the Reformation. "Would it not have been more interesting," says Mr. Lang, "to ask how the clerics came to be so regardless of their vows? That is not the necessary consequence of priestly celibacy; in our own day we do not, I suppose, hear of more scandals among the celibate Catholic clergy than among those of other denominations, whose ministers may marry at will. The causes of the corruption and ignorance seem a topic better worth insisting on than the notorious facts. The Church, as a wealthy yet weak corporation, was the milch-cow of the nobles, the gentry, the Crown. Younger sons and illegitimate sons of secular tastes were thrust into offices which demanded men of learning and piety. The occupants hated learning and gave themselves up to diversion. The Renaissance, like the spring, came slowly up this way, and it has sometimes occurred to me that the great medieval Revivals of religion—the Franciscan for example—reached Scotland, if not tardily, still with a much weakened impact."

Mr. Lang meets the charge of the Doctor that the preaching of the medieval Church was apt to be "much more diverting than edifying" by declaring that "the Presbyterians made preaching the main thing, to the great affliction of many not ungodly men, and were diverting only occasionally and unconsciously." As to the learning among the pre-Reformation clergy he calls attention to Bishop Hooker's statement, that in 1551 he found twelve conspicuously learned men among the three hundred and eleven incumbents in the Diocese of Gloucester, and he asks very pertinently whether twelve conspicuously learned men can be found to-day among three hundred and eleven ministers taken at random in Scotland or England.

Mr. Lang very justly explains the ignorance of the churchmen of those days as being such "not because they were Catholics, but because they were listless hangers-on of a wealthy ecclesiastical corporation." He cannot see that the Catholic faith must keep its possessor ignorant. "To-day I do not think that our Protestant clergy are more learned than their brethren of the Catholic Faith on the Continent. They maintain no anthropological review like the Anthropos of Père Schmidt; they do much less for palæontology than several abbés in France; when I wanted a clear summary about Minoan religion, I found that the best was by Père Lagrange, in a French serial devoted to biblical studies. It is not this or that creed which fosters a learned clergy; other conditions are at work."

Dr. Hay Fleming's examples of the credulity and superstition attending clerical ignorance before the Reformation are not more striking in Mr. Lang's opinion than the credulity and superstition practiced by the Reformers. Attention is called to the liberty of conscience which meant "liberty to trample on the conscience of Catholics." And then Mr. Lang, one of the greatest authorities on the Reformation period, makes this unqualified and direct assertion: "The Reformation was un-Christian in its methods; that is the short and the long of it."

In referring to the church-despoilment and church-wrecking indulged in by the "Brethren," after pointing out how Knox denied such a thing in his History and asserted it in a private letter, Mr. Lang introduces a comparison that is startling even to ourselves. "Seventeen centuries of Christianity and of war," he writes, "have spared infinitely more of the 'monuments of idolatry' in Greece than have been left to Scotland in the shape of cathedrals, church plate, and other relics of medieval art."

A Protestant evangelist in Little Rock treated his innocent listeners recently to a song composed "to the best of my ability," and "the expression of a great heart experience which was mine a few days ago." He confessed, however, to having difficulty in giving it a title; whereupon Mr. James A. Gray, a prominent attorney of Little Rock, wrote a letter to the editor of the paper containing the above account, suggesting a solution of the Doctor's difficulty, namely to retain the title which Adelaide Ann Procter herself had given the song at the time when she composed it.

Reviews and Magazines

"We should know, even if we had no previous information on the subject, that no one but a Catholic could have written the poetry of Coventry Patmore; so, none save a Catholic could have given us the prose of Hilaire Belloc." This is the keynote of the current Catholic World's two opening numbers, both exquisite in literary form and spiritual insight. Virginia M. Crawford pictures the style, substance, trend and winning originality of Belloc's principal works: "The Eye-Witness," "The Heart of Penelope," "Barbara Rebell," "Marie Antoinette," "A Path to Rome," "Esto Perpetua," "The Old Road," "Danton," "Robespierre," "Marie Antoinette," "Caliban's Guide to Letters," "A Change in the Cabinet," his brochures on Socialism and on "Everything and Nothing." "History and biography, essays, travels and novels, political tracts and nursery rhymes, he has tried his hand at them all and failed in none." Her sketch has proved the writer's final verdict: "Mr. Belloc is an exhilarating writer with a keen imagination, strong sympathies, and a mind instinct with Catholic faith."

Katherine Brégy concludes her admirable critique of Coventry Patmore as a man and a poet, exhibiting him in a more lovable and intelligible light than, we think, has been shed on him before. His theme was Love, the nuptial relations of the soul to its God and the essential, passionate humanity indissolubly wedded to Catholic theology.

EDUCATION

The Presbytery of Dayton, Ohio, representing all Presbyterian churches in five counties in the southwestern part of that state, by decisive vote has decreed that the University of Wooster will not seek to be a beneficiary of the Carnegie pension fund for superannuated professors. The reason of the decision is the stipulation by Mr. Carnegie that to obtain the money the university must agree to be released from all denominational control. Most of the speakers discussing the question in the meeting of the Presbytery argued that to accept the money would be tantamount to forfeiting principle; that the university could not be severed from church control; and that the institution would even lose financially by accepting the proposition, since the action would alienate the support of their own people.

The shortened syllabus of studies announced for primary schools in New York State is to find imitators. Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, Superintendent of Schools in Chicago, has been revising the courses of study in the schools of that city, and has ready a list of changes to be presented to the board of education. While not quite so radical in her plans as the New York school officials, Mrs. Young advocates the elimination in primary grades of those branches which are merely preliminary to the secondary school work. Just as in New York, Mrs. Young finds that in Chicago a notably large percentage of primary grade pupils end their school training with the close of the primary grades. "There is no use," she claims, "in teaching children the elements of algebra unless they intend to go on with the study—and most of them do not." Thoroughness of drill in the three R's is beginning to appeal to educators as the one suitable course for primary schools; and in this return to old ways we have another proof that we are not as wise as we have been fancying ourselves to be. It is to be hoped that the view will prevail not alone in regard to those children who have no expectation to go on to high school work. There is no call for electivism in primary grades—plain drill in the elements is the sufficient and necessary course for all primary pupils. We are confident that the scheme of modified electivism, explained in this column in our issue of April 16, and soon to be tried in the schools of Cleveland, will be found to be an ill-advised experiment.

Right Reverend Bishop Aldering, of Fort Wayne, has succeeded in carrying into effect a plan some time contemplated. To provide High School accommodations for boys finishing the work of the Parochial Grammar Schools in Fort Wayne and its vicinity, he has opened a Central Catholic High School in his diocesan city. The new establishment is making a gratifying record in its first year, and Bishop Aldering is to be congratulated on the success attending the solution of a phase of the school question of grave importance in centres where no provision for Catholic advanced training has as yet been made. The New High School is in charge of the Holy Cross Brothers, and Fathers Miller and Moorman, of the Cathedral, are on its staff of Instructors.

Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, has decided to establish a school of economics as one of its departments, to be opened at the beginning of the next school year, October, 1910. The Marquette University Journal in its current issue makes formal announcement of the project, which will be a welcome evidence of the growth of this youngest of Catholic universities in the West. The necessity of a school of economics was discussed by the board of regents at its first meeting in the spring of 1909, and the resolution then taken has been since made feasible by the perfecting of plans looking to the financing of the school. The scope and aim of the school, as the Journal explains, "will afford Milwaukee and vicinity opportunity to secure an advanced and progressive education in commerce, accounts and finance, of collegiate grade." The course will be two years, and Prof. W. C. Webster, Ph.D., now of the department of political economy in the University of Chicago, has been chosen dean of the new school.

The Evening Post of New York makes fine use of an old thought in a recent editorial on the "Specialized University." The writer is discussing Lord Rosebery's suggestion that the university solve the increasingly difficult problem of the multiplicity of subjects by what he calls co-operation. In this co-operation system each university would "concentrate its efforts frankly on whatever group of subjects it feels itself most qualified to teach, while subjects not directly related to the particular function of the institution might still be pursued to a certain point; but they would be given a subordinate place without reference to their final utility." The writer finds in the suggestion a refinement of specialization, which will change the entire scope of university training. "That fine humility in the face of the vast field of intellectual endeavor which it is one of the great functions of a university to instil, could never," he argues, "be developed under such a system as this. Everyone would know, of course, when he stopped to think of it, that his intellectual vista was only the foreground of a great estate, but his normal habit of mind would be quite unaffected by this consideration. The men produced by the system would be among those of whom Newman wrote, 'They see the tapestry of human life, as it were, on the wrong side and it tells no story. . . . Nothing has drift or relation; nothing has a history or a promise. Everything stands by itself, and comes and goes in its turn, like the shifting scenes of a show, which leaves the spectator where he was.'

SOCIOLOGY

The National Conference of Catholic Charities, formed recently at the Catholic University, promises encouraging results. Early in the year, as announced in AMERICA at the time, Right Rev. Mgr. Shahan issued an invitation to a number of representative laymen and priests in the field of charity, for a conference at the Catholic University, February 19 and 20. Washington, Baltimore, New York, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, Newark and other populous centres were represented by active and experienced workers. The two days' deliberations showed that a National Conference of Catholic Charities was both desirable and feasible. The plan contemplates the holding of an annual gathering where all phases of Catholic charity may be discussed and where leaders from that field in different sections of the country may become personally acquainted.

No effort will be made to hamper the large freedom of action heretofore enjoyed, or to commit the association or individuals to any definite policy in charity work. It is felt, however, that a regular and frequent interchange of views will be helpful, and that a clearer view of the distinctively religious principles that animate Catholic charity will result from closer association among the active workers. The first National Conference will be held September 25 to 28, at the Catholic University, Washington, D. C. His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, has accepted the office of Honorary President and Monsignor Shahan, Rector of the University, is President of the Conference.

Many Archbishops and Bishops have already signified their warm approval of this work. As the organization of the Conference progresses further information will be given out in the hope of awakening widespread interest and cooperation. It will aid materially if all associations of Catholic men and women devoted to charity in any of its forms would send the name of the society and any officer, in order that all announcements concerning the Conference may be sent to such associations. All communications may be addressed to Rev. Dr. William J. Kerby, Secretary of the National Conference of Catholic Charities, Catholic University, Washington, D. C.

Our readers are familiar with the special works of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. There is the Fresh Air Farm at Spring Valley, where last year 2,200 children were entertained for two weeks, and there also is St. Elizabeth's Convalescent Home for Women, open all the year round, which helped 525 poor mothers and working girls back to health. It maintains, too, the Catholic Home Bureau, which has already taken 2,000 orphans from public institutions and placed them in Catholic families. In this work it has shown itself so conscientious, so watchful over the children thus placed out, as to have received from the State Board of Charities the highest commendation. Besides these it has clubs and settlements, prison and hospital visiting, parole, probation and other charities. Its members are comparatively poor; and though they give freely of their own means, they need assistance in carrying on these charities. Hence every year they provide a public entertainment for this purpose. This year the Rev. Matthew C. Gleeson, U.S.N., who was chaplain of the flagship of the fleet which made the tour of the world, will lecture on this most interesting subject on May 1, at Carnegie Hall.

There is a general tendency to treat young criminals as if they were victims of circumstances or of disease and nothing more. Reformatories are to be provided for them from which they will come out cured of every vice. The old way was to treat them simply as criminals. Here we have two extremes. The truth as usual lies between them. Young criminals are first of all criminals. With understanding and free will they have deliberately violated the law of God and man, and therefore must be punished. It must be presumed that they are not irreformable criminals, and therefore they must be reformed. Hence reformatories should be provided for them. But who is to undertake the work of reform? The histories of some of the reform schools of our Western states has not been altogether such as to encourage one to believe the ordinary political appointee to be successful as a moral reformer.

The emigration from Ireland during 1909 was 29,230, an increase of 5,278 over the previous year. There were 15,382 males, 13,848 females; 86 per cent were between the ages of 15 and 35 and over 60 per cent under 25. The greatest increase was from Ulster, and the lowest from Leinster. Seventy-five per cent of the emigrants came to the United States.

ECONOMICS

The official statement of the Canadian revenue for the past fiscal year shows that up to March 31st last the revenue was $98,662,974. This sum will be increased by at least two million dollars by collections during the next few weeks for revenues accruing during the fiscal year. Consequently, the revenue for 1909-10 will exceed a hundred million. Comparing the revenue of $98,662,974 as returned on March 31 with the total revenue of $83,100,525 for 1908-9, an increase is shown of $15,562,449. The net debt on March 31 last is given as $325,976,712. At the close of the previous fiscal year it was $307,212,322, so that although revenues are buoyant and expenditures somewhat smaller, the debt has been swollen by $18,764,390 during the fiscal year, and the figures are not yet all in.

Customs receipts for the twelve largest ports of the Dominion have been issued by the Customs Department, and show that in every port there has been since last fiscal year, an increase in collections, and that some ports show a phenomenal advance. Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, which are still by far the largest ports, show a great gain in receipts. Montreal is, as usual, first with $16,325,229.78; then comes Toronto with $12,325,465.05; then Winnipeg with $4,999,238.16; then Vancouver with $3,657,242.90. Hamilton, which comes next and has this year displaced Halifax as the fifth largest port, shows the greatest increase of all the twelve cities, nearly 43 per cent. Quebec drops from sixth to seventh place, and Victoria, B. C., from seventh to ninth, St. John, N. B., rising from ninth to eighth. Ottawa remains in the tenth place. London and Windsor, Ont., have changed places, London now being the lowest of the twelve ports, although its customs receipts have increased from $770,663.02 on March 31, 1909, to $928,314.60 on March 31, 1910, i. e., more than twenty per cent.

A well-known English company approached the British Postmaster-General lately offering a considerable sum to relieve the existing shortage of funds due to the suspension of the Budget. It asked in return that all postage stamps should be cancelled with a stamp bearing its name. The offer was of course refused; but as it was made public the newspapers are recording it, and the company is getting, as it no doubt foresaw, a quantity of free advertising.

The British Cotton Growing Association is looking for the means of restoring the failing Egyptian supply, and proposes to attempt cotton growing in Rhodesia on a large scale if a suitable place can be found.

It is said that some Rhodesian cotton has turned out better than Egyptian, and has fetched a higher price than any except Sea Island. The British South African Company is helping the enterprise.

The total amount of coal mined in India in 1878 was 1,015,210 tons: in 1908 it was 12,769,635 tons. During the last four years the export, including coal taken by steamers for their own consumption, was only 7.28 per cent of the whole.

According to present indications, immigration to the United States for the fiscal year 1910 promises to reach 1,000,000 persons, if the record for the first nine months is sustained. The arrivals for March were 136,745, and for the nine months of the fiscal year 667,949. The million mark was reached in 1907, when 1,285,349 aliens were admitted to the United States.

Assistant Attorney General Denison, sent to New Orleans to investigate the methods of the American Sugar Refining Co. of that city, has announced that there is absolutely no foundation for the charges of fraud against the company, and that the weighing at the Custom House was perfectly correct.

SCIENCE

At the International Electrical Congress at London, in 1908, a resolution was adopted appointing an international committee to further the purpose of the conference, which had convened mainly for the securing of uniformity in electrical units and standards throughout the world. The work has now been formally inaugurated at the United States Bureau of Standards in Washington. The experiments, which will be continued over many months, will consist of a series of tests to determine the most accurate numerical values for standard electrical cells, standard wire resistances and the electro-chemical equivalent of silver in voltmeters. Those engaged in the investigation are Professor W. Jaeger, of the Physikalisch Technische Reichsanstalt, Berlin; Professor F. Laporte, of the Laboratoire Central d'Electricite, Paris; Professor F. E. Smith, of the National Physical Laboratory London, and Professor E. B. Rosa and Dr. F. Wolff, of the United States Bureau of Standards. The three foreign delegates were appointed by the directors of the respective institutions, pledged to engage in these tests. The demand for uniformity is due to differences in volt values of the standard cells of different countries, as likewise to a slight difference in the value of the ohm, and in consequence a varying ampere value, which is the rating unit of the electrical current. Though these variations would not affect commercial interests, they are sorely in the way of delicate electrical research. The funds for carrying on the research were procured by Professor S. W. Stratton, Director of the United States Bureau of Standards and treasurer of the International Committee on Electrical Units and Standards. All of the scientific societies of this country have contributed liberally to the fund.

At the annual session of the National Academy of Science, held a few days ago in Washington, Dr. George E. Hale, director of the Mt. Wilson Solar Observatory, cast grave doubts on the accuracy of Professor Percival Lowell's observations of Mars. To substantiate his assertions Dr. Hale reproduced photographs of the planet Mars taken with a larger telescope than that used by Professor Lowell, and according to his claim, under far more favorable circumstances. Dr. Hale contended that these photos showed only a mass of blotches and markings in no wise geometrically distributed—as is the contention of Lowell. Photographs made by Professors Campbell and Barnard, of the Lick observatory, were also shown, and these indicated virtually the same condition on the planet.

The Gesellschaft für Erkunde describes and endorses the projected antarctic expedition of Lieut. Fritchner. The purpose of this expedition is not the quest for the South Pole, but to ascertain the relation of the great land masses of the East and West Antarctic. Lieut W. Fritchner is a Bavarian, and has already won distinction as an explorer in Tibet and Pamir.

From a series of painstaking experiments conducted by the noted seismologist, Professor Milne, at the Bidston Observatory, near Liverpool, the conclusion seems warranted that the earth is elastic and is pulled out of shape by tidal action. He finds that at high tide, the bed of the Irish Sea suffers a depression with the consequent effect of pulling the shores together. At Bidston this amounts to an inch in every sixteen miles.

Dr. William Shaw, director of the Great Britain Meteorological Bureau, who is just about completing a tour of all the principal meteorological stations of the world, with the view of securing accurate information with reference to climatological conditions in general, has issued the statement that the common belief of people of different localities that the climate of their districts is undergoing a change is entirely unwarranted. Though statistics show oscillations, they emphatically deny any permanent changes in the climate.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Readers of AMERICA will recall a paragraph reference in a former issue to a singular suit entered against the Pastor of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, in Tuckahoe, N. Y. The Pastor, Rev. John G. McCormick, in a lenten sermon early in the spring of this year, exhorting his congregation to practical penance, had specifically urged his people to avoid evil association and the dangerous occasions to be met in entering places of shady repute. A woman of Tuckahoe, nominally a Catholic and the keeper of a boarding-house, fancied herself injured by the utterance of the priest, although his warning had been couched in the general terms in which such moral exhortations are usually addressed by a pastor to his people. She brought suit against Father McCormick in the District Court, alleging slander and claiming heavy damages. Last week the case was heard and Judge Tompkins, the presiding magistrate and a non-Catholic, threw the charge out of court without the formality of listening to Father McCormick's witnesses. Addressing the plaintiff's attorney immediately upon the close of the testimony offered in proof of the alleged slander, Judge Tompkins said: "Your own evidence shows that there is no cause for action. On the contrary, Tuckahoe is to be congratulated in having so vigilant a pastor and Father McCormick is to be commended for his courage in the cause of morality—shown by the very testimony of those who presume to charge him with slander."

The Catholic Knights of America will hold their National Convention in the State Capital building, Nashville, Tenn., May 10 to 14. The convention will be opened with pontifical high Mass by Bishop Byrne, of Nashville, at the pro-cathedral, where the sermon will be delivered by Most Rev. Archbishop Glennon of St. Louis, Supreme Spiritual Director of the Catholic Knights of America. The delegates will be welcomed by the Governor of Tennessee and the Mayor of Nashville. The Knights of Columbus, the Ancient Order of Hibernians and the Benevolent Order of Hibernians have united to make the convention a great success. The Catholic Knights of America was founded in Nashville thirty-three years ago and received its name from its first Spiritual Director, the late Archbishop Feehan of Chicago, who at that time was Bishop of Nashville. Since its inception this organization has distributed over sixteen millions of dollars among the widows and orphans of deceased members. It has branches in nearly every State of the Union and its permanent headquarters are located in the city of St. Louis.

The consecration of the Catholic Church of the Ascension on Mount Zion, Jerusalem, April 10, was attended by Prince and Princess Eitel Friedrich of Germany, Princes George and Conrad of Bavaria, and more than a thousand German, Austrian and Swiss pilgrims. The Abbot Superior of Beurn delivered an address, after which High Mass was celebrated, the Patriarch of Jerusalem officiating. The ceremony was followed by a reception of the Knights of Malta by Prince Eitel Friedrich, who presented to the monastery the portrait of Kaiser Wilhelm, sent by the German Emperor for the occasion.

Two thousand Knights of Columbus received Holy Communion, April 17, at St. Paul's Church, Washington, where the local organizations were gathered under the auspices of Keane Council. The Mass was celebrated by Archbishop Diomedea Falconio, the Apostolic Delegate, the event marking the public recognition of the Order by the representative of the Holy See.

Mr. James A. Murray is about to restore the Carmel Mission, near Monterey, the first foundation of Fr. Junipero Serra in Northern California, to its original condition. The Martin family have given an acre of land to provide a suitable approach.

His Excellency, the Most Rev. John Cagliero, titular Archbishop of Sebaste and Delegate Apostolic to Central America, is the first member of Don Bosco's Congregation to be raised to the episcopate. Born in 1838, he joined Don Bosco in 1851, and ever remained in intimate relations with him. Father Cagliero was at the head of the first band of Salesian missionaries who set out in 1875 to evangelize Patagonia, of which country he was named Vicar Apostolic three days after the nomination of Father Joseph Sarto, now Pope Pius X, to the see of Mantua. After over thirty years of zealous missionary labor, the devoted Salesian finds himself at a post which will demand all the judgment and tact which made his long sojourn in Patagonia so helpful to religion.

On April 26, the Golden Jubilee in religious life of Rev. John O'Shanahan, S.J., was celebrated at the Church of the Immaculate Conception, New Orleans, with a solemn high Mass of thanksgiving. Born in County Kerry, Ireland, 1837, he was a professor at Ennis College when in 1860 he sought admission to the Society of Jesus. Having made his ecclesiastical studies in France, Italy and the United States, Father O'Shanahan labored in the province of New Orleans, doing scholastic, missionary and pastoral work in most of the Southern States. He was at various times superior of the Jesuit houses in Augusta, Selma and Mobile, rector of Galveston, and from 1887 to 1892 general superior of the province. He is still actively engaged in preaching and lecturing and is the spiritual director of several religious institutions. Assisting at this jubilee were his nephews, Rev. Thomas Stritch, S.J., of New Orleans, and Rev. John Stritch, S.J., of Tampa, Fla.

PERSONAL

Dr. Thomas O'Hagan, the well-known Canadian writer and lecturer, has been asked to fill the editorial chair of the New World, of Chicago, made vacant by the recent death of Charles O'Malley. It is understood that he will accept the invitation, and the many friends Dr. O'Hagan has made in his frequent visits to the States are cordial in their good wishes for his success in the new field which editorial direction of the New World will throw open to him. The Rosary Magazine in its current number contains an appreciative article on "The Development of a Canadian Writer," written by Dr. Fisher, an associate of Dr. O'Hagan in literary effort in Canada. His sketch of the new Editor's busy and successful career will be an admirable introduction of Dr. O'Hagan to the circle he now enters.

Madame Schumann-Heink did a gracious thing in accepting the invitation of the Alumnae Association, of the Academy of Mount St. Vincent-on-Hudson, New York City, to give a song recital at the Waldorf-Astoria, in behalf of St. Joseph's Home for the Aged. Because of the heavy expense entailed in the erection of new buildings, this deserving charity was obliged to appeal to the bounty of its friends. No doubt the managers of the Home and the members of the Alumnae Association are congratulating themselves on the generous returns which the kindness of Madame Schumann-Heink secured for them.

Addresses eulogizing the late General St. Clair A. Mulholland as a devout Catholic, a soldier, a patriot and a philanthropist, were delivered on April 17, at the meeting of the Catholic Alumni Sodality, in Philadelphia, by Rev. C. W. Lyons, S.J., S. Edwin Megargee, General H. H. Bingham, Colonel H. S. Huidekoper, and Henry A. N. Daily, President of the Sodality.

Advices from Australia, coincident with the departure from these shores of Lord Kitchener, indicate an impression there that he had an imperial commission to co-ordinate defence throughout the Empire, and to see what use could be made of Australasian troops in India.

OBITUARY

Rev. Thomas J. Fitzgerald, Pastor of St. Patrick's Church, New Orleans, died at his residence, April 21, in his thirty-fifth year. Born in County Waterford, Ireland, and educated at Mount Melleray, Waterford Seminary and Carlow College, where he was ordained to the priesthood in 1899, Father Fitzgerald entered the New Orleans diocese eleven years ago and at once became noted for exceptional efficiency and generous devotion to duty. Soon after his arrival in New Orleans, when a pursued murderer was firing from a barricaded building upon the surrounding crowd of citizens and officials, killing and wounding several, Father Fitzgerald went forward under a rain of bullets to administer the last Sacraments to the dying. A young man who accompanied him was shot dead by his side, but the priest did not desist till he had ministered to all the wounded within and without the building, and he then carried off the youth upon his shoulders. He became unwell a few days before his death while preparing the children of his parish for Confirmation and died of heart disease while Archbishop Blenk was performing the ceremony.

Former Supreme Court Justice Charles Donohue died in this city, on April 17, in his eighty-second year. He was a native of New York, attended Columbia College grammar school, and began his career as a lawyer as an office boy in 1837. He was elected to the Supreme Court bench in 1874, being the second Catholic in the history of the city to attain that dignity. Justice John R. Brady was the first.

Rev. Edward M. Faller, Rector of St. Mary's Church, New Albany, Ind., died on April 18, aged 86 years. He was born January 3, 1824, at Barr, Alsace, and emigrated to New York in 1840. Thence he went to Vincennes, where he was ordained. He had been in New Albany almost continually since 1857, and his death was considered so much of a public loss to that city that the Mayor directed the bells to be tolled for an hour when it was learned that he had passed away.

Sister Miriam (Parthenia M. Mulry) died on April 18, at the New York Foundling Hospital of the Sisters of Charity, where she had been stationed, in the twenty-seventh year of her age. She was the daughter of Thomas M. Mulry, so well known as the President of the St. Vincent de Paul Society of New York and for his activity in other charitable organizations. Three of her brothers and four uncles became Jesuits.

Mother Agnes Mary, Provincial of the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur in the United States and Superior of the Convent in West Rittenhouse Square, Philadelphia, died on April 17. According to the wish expressed during her last illness, the obituary notice given to the press omits personal details.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

This very interesting note is made by The Field Afar:

It has been remarked that wealthy Catholics are not easily interested in foreign missions. We have often asked ourselves "why?" An explanation might be found in the business instinct, which such people have inherited or acquired, that prompts them to make no investment without a visible return. Or again, as the poor best appreciate the material needs of others, so in the midst of comfort the well-to-do Catholic finds it hard to understand the meaning of a missionary's absolute need.

And sometimes, we have reason to believe, vanity plays its part. The benefactor likes to point out some monument to himself,—the church to which he has given generously, that statue or window which carries his name, or the institution on whose walls his portrait hangs.

To give and not to see the result of one's benefaction, demands a special degree of charity; and just such is the quality of that charity which is directed to remote missions. It is beautiful because it is disinterested. The left hand knows not what the right hand gives. The pure motive is present, almost invariably, in the offering destined to the missions.

In view of the comments made concerning the regrettable "Roosevelt Incident" in Rome, the following excerpts from Roman newspapers are illuminating:

"All who are acquainted with Protestant action in Rome know well that the Methodist establishment in Via XX Settembre is not only a place of religious services and instruction for that denomination, but is also a veritable centre of anti-Catholic and anti-papal warfare united with Masonic and anti-Clerical warfare, with a succession of odious attacks and highly offensive outrages upon the Pope and the Catholic Church, and is a perennial bid for apostasy among priests and people. A centre, not so much Protestant as anti-Catholic and anti-papal, such as that which works in Rome, is an offense so continual and personal to the Pope that it would be simply absurd to desire an audience of him and also to make an address and a parade in the Methodist hall, which would necessarily add to the standing of the enterprise."—Corrispondenza Romana, April 6, 1910.

Everybody knows that next door to the Methodist Hall there is an establishment for apostate Catholic priests, where there is great traffic in consciences; all who are acquainted with L'Evangelista, the little newspaper that is published there, know what insults it continually publishes against the Pope and the Catholic Church. No political condition was put, for Roosevelt is a private individual; nor was there any condition bearing on his religion, since he belongs not to the Methodist but to the Reformed Dutch Church. The only suggestion made was a request not to renew the Fairbanks incident, that is, that he should not lend himself to favoring anti-Clericalism in our city."—Corriere D'Italia, April 5, 1910.

Under the suggestive title, "Tippletude," the Independent of April 14th says:

"Since Dr. Burchard added a new word to politics we have hardly had a more notable case of inept and suicidal blundering than that which will for a long while give distinction to the name of the Rev. B. M. Tipple, D.D., Pastor of the Methodist American Church at Rome. . . . Somewhat similar to the original Burchardism is Mr. Tipple's senseless outbreak, although it has lighter consequences. So far as the public could know, the Methodist Mission in Rome had had a fine advertisement, and the veto put on Mr. Roosevelt by the Vatican had aroused criticism of the Pope rather than of the Methodist Mission, which could have nothing to complain of. It might presumably be all that was good, doing an excellent work, arousing animosity only because of its success. But just then burst in the voice of Tipple, and such a voice!

"A favorite Turkish story is of the man who was asked to lend his donkey, but who replied that while he would be glad to do so, he could not, as it was in the neighboring village. Just then, from the other side of the partition, came the bray of the ass, and the neighbor said: 'Why, there is the donkey in the stable.' 'You infidel,' replied the owner, 'to take the word of an ass against that of a follower of the Prophet.' No less untimely and disconcerting, following Mr. Roosevelt's warning against religious bitterness, was the intrusive raucity that instantly destroyed the satisfaction with which the friends of the mission were considering the situation."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

OFFICIAL PROSELYTIZING IN CONNECTICUT.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Swift's "Failure of Reformatories" is timely reading for your Connecticut subscribers, as we have appointed a commission to prepare plans for the establishment in this State of an institution for juvenile delinquents. It is a figure of speech when I write that "we have appointed a commission." Our last legislature empowered the Governor to appoint, but as political exigency required him to select very carefully, no Catholic was thought fit to serve in formulating plans for a reformatory, which in the ordinary course of events must be brought into constant contact with Catholic interests.

It was some such thought as this which I had in mind while reading Father Swift's article. When by suggestion he warns that unless supernatural helps are employed all reformatory efforts shall be barren, I am led to ask if our clergy are aware of the inroads that are being made upon the faith of inmates by those who are placed in charge of these institutions. As that is a large and somewhat vague question, let me narrow and define it by illustration.

The tendency of present-day reformers is to find homes for offending youngsters, preferably to keeping them in penal or reformatory institutions. Father Swift seems to be an advocate of this method when he writes: "A home, if in any fair way it answers to the name, is better than any institution for properly training the young." While most men will agree with that idea, when it is a question of the child's own home, those who have control of some institutions in New England take the words in an unqualified sense, and any home they find willing to take boys who have been committed by the courts they greedily accept as fit habitations for their charges. As a consequence Catholic children are placed out in surroundings that inevitably lead to weakening and often to entire loss of faith. But that, again, is an old story, upon which it is not my purpose to dwell. The point to which I desire to draw attention is that diabolical ingenuity is exerted to defeat any effort we make to obtain a share in the management of these public institutions, and a consequent control of the fate of our Catholic young.

In this State a measure was fought through the legislature, in the face of most virulent opposition, requiring that indigent and wayward wards of the State when placed should be assigned to families professing the faith of the children's parents. A joker, in the shape of the phrase, "when possible, or practicable," robs the legislation of the force Catholic lawmen intended it to possess; so much so that I do not think there has been the slightest improvement over old ways. At the request of the Knights of Columbus, I wrote for information to the various state and county institutions, and the answers given to the questions about the placement of Catholic charges would be laughable, were it not so serious. The Superintendent of the State Reform School did not know how many Catholics were in his care but risked a guess. To the question (1) How many children have been placed in Catholic homes, and (2) in non-Catholic homes during the past year? the answer to both was "No data." This case is quoted not to call attention to the "perfect system" of our much-vaunted state institutions, so much as to invite notice to the care with which the prescriptions of the law are enforced.

In our state I believe there is a law that the children cannot be placed beyond the jurisdiction of our courts. This forbids that they be spirited over into Massachusetts. But there is no law, I have been informed by those who ought to know, which prevents that state from burdening us. As a consequence the whole northern border of Connecticut is a land of refuge. In my little parish there are at times twelve and thirteen boys from reformatories in that state. I have used every method of relief that could be pressed into service to keep the village clear of them. The manner of their placement is shameful, regarded from a Catholic view-point. In most cases non-Catholic homes, many of them undesirable according to all standards, have been selected and seem to be preferred.

Perverts have been chosen, and any sort of Catholic serves. Episcopal and other ecclesiastical authorities have been helpless; the lawyers have been able to find me no relief; the town officials I have appealed to in vain. The last protest I made hurried certain of the reformatory officers to interview me, but after my talk with them I saw how absolutely impossible it was to bring these people to our point of view.

Now, dear Mr. Editor, do not think I am ventilating an insignificant parish difficulty which an abler pastor might have settled long ago. The solution is not so easy, believe me, where families are paid to care for these children, and where any interference with what they consider legitimate revenue would unleash denunciation against the priest, which, after all, is a minor consideration, and would increase the hardships of the Catholic people, who depend on these others or their kin for labor.

This single problem is hauled into attention merely to serve as an example of one evil that may follow on a too strenuous appeal for "home-correction of delinquents." Another thought that might suggest itself is that unless the diocesan authorities are on the alert to create some kind of central agency to have care of this matter, the enemy shall have proceeded so far ere long that there will be no overtaking of them.

EDWARD FLANNERY.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR112

CHRONICLE

Bureau of American Republics.—The new building of the American Republics in Washington was dedicated on April 26, addresses being made by President Taft, Secretary Knox, Senator Root, Andrew Carnegie and the Mexican Ambassador, Señor de la Barra. President Taft and Mr. Carnegie jointly planted a "peace tree" in the patio, or courtyard, and the President referred to the dedication as the most important international event that Washington had witnessed in many years. The assemblage included his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, the members of the Cabinet, Director Barrett, the foreign ambassadors and ministers with their staffs; Senators and Representatives, Bishop Harding, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Washington, army and navy officers and members of the Supreme Court. The new building, where future Congresses of the American Republics will assemble, represents an expenditure of $1,000,000, of which amount Andrew Carnegie contributed $750,000 and the twenty-one American Republics the remainder. The International Bureau of Republics is an official diplomatic institution, whose object is to promote the interests of peace, commerce and friendship among the nations of the Western Hemisphere, and is maintained by the annual contributions made in proportion to their population by the twenty-one American Republics, including the United States. It is controlled by a governing board consisting of the diplomatic representatives in Washington of these American nations, and its affairs are administered by the unanimous vote of the governing board. The director, therefore, is an international officer and has the rank of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary. The present director is the Hon. John Barrett, who has served some sixteen years in the diplomatic service of the United States.

Appointment of Gov. Hughes.—The President, by letter of April 22, tendered the appointment to the Supreme Court to Governor Charles E. Hughes, of New York. By letter of April 24 Governor Hughes accepted and the Senate promptly confirmed the nomination on May 2. In the President's letter to Governor Hughes he told him that as the Supreme Court would adjourn its hearings that week the person appointed would not be called upon to discharge any official functions until the opening of the October term on the second Monday in October and that, therefore, if Governor Hughes could accept he might continue to discharge his duties as Governor until his qualification on the day of the opening of the court in October next. This was a material factor in Governor Hughes' acceptance. Charles Evans Hughes, twice-elected Governor of New York, was born April 11, 1862, and will, therefore, become a member of the Supreme Court of the United States at the early age of forty-eight.

Indiana State Convention.—The Indiana State Convention adopted Governor Marshall's plan to indorse in the convention a candidate for the United States Senate to succeed Senator Beveridge. Thomas Taggart, ex-chairman of the Democratic national committee, fought to have the nomination made by a State party primary, hoping thereby to have himself nominated, but the convention indorsed John W. Kern, the Democratic candidate for Vice-President of the United States in 1908. The platform favors immediate enactment of a pension law by Congress giving at least a dollar a day to Union Veterans of the Civil War; opposes all government subsidies; approves the income tax amendment, and favors an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

New Court of Customs Appeals.—The important newly-created court that will be the supreme tariff tribunal has organized and begins its work in Washington. The members of the Court of Customs Appeals are: Robert H. Montgomery, of Michigan, presiding judge; James Francis Smith, former Governor-General of the Philippines; William H. Hunt, quondam Governor of Porto Rico, and later United States District Judge at Helena, Mont.; Orion M. Barber, once State Auditor of Vermont, and Marion De Vries, who served in the Fifty-seventh Congress from California and later as a member of the United States Board of General Appraisers in New York City.

Trade With Philippines.—A marked increase in trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands is recorded since the removal of tariff duties on domestic merchandise. The Bureau of Statistics gives the value of merchandise shipped from the United States to the Philippines during the eight months ending February 28, last, as $10,151,276, against $6,871,764 in the like period of the preceeding year. The value of the imports from the Philippines was $11,420,475 and $7,070,132, respectively. This is an increase of about 55 per cent. in the total trade.

Porto Rican Delegates Here.—A delegation of Porto Ricans have come to Washington to urge the elimination of certain restrictive features in the Olmstead bill, conferring citizenship on Porto Ricans. The bill is now pending in Congress. The Party includes José de Diego, Speaker of the Porto Rican House of Delegates; Dr. J. C. Barbosa, member of the Executive Council and leader of the Republican party; Eduardo Georgetti, representing the Unionists; R. H. Todd, Mayor of San Juan and a member of the Republican National Committee; José C. Barbos, another member of the Republican party, and Santiago Iglesias, head of the Labor Federation in Porto Rico. They advocate collective citizenship for Porto Ricans, universal suffrage, and an elective senate.

Canada's Navy.—The debate on the second reading of the Naval Bill took up all of the sittings of the Canadian Senate on April 28. Senator Legris, Repentigny, one of the Government supporters, opposed the bill, because Canada would thus assume a gigantic burden that would grow year by year and finally end by embroiling the country in war. Senator David defended Sir Wilfrid Laurier's bill because Canada was developing into a great country which must equip herself for defence. On April 29 another Government supporter, Senator Choquette, came out in opposition to the bill. He is the third Liberal in the Upper House to do so. He pleaded for a referendum on the subject, not now, but at the next general elections. He quoted from a number of French-Canadian Liberal organs in favor of the maintenance of the status quo. The defeat of the Naval Bill in the Senate, he said, did not involve the defeat of the Government. On April 30 Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in piloting through the House of Commons the estimates for the new Canadian Navy gave some highly interesting additional details of the Government's plans. The total expenditure authorized by the bill is $3,676,500. The Government will soon call for tenders for the construction of the six torpedo destroyers and four cruisers in Canada. If the price is too high they will be built abroad. It is intended to provide for 422 recruits made up of 225 of the seaman class, 170 of the engine room rating and twenty-seven others. The rates paid for commanders, lieutenants, midshipmen, engineers, surgeons, seamen and engine room workers will be superior to those paid in the British navy and will approximate those paid in the United States navy.

Glace Bay Strike Ended.—The ten months' strike at the collieries of Glace Bay, Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, was happily ended on April 29. The conditions upon which the men return to work are those offered by Messrs. Plummer and Butler some time ago. There will be no recognition of the United Mine Workers, nor will the company receive any committee representing that organization, nor collect dues for it. The men will be taken back to work as speedily as it will be convenient for the company to provide houses for them. President Plummer, General Manager Butler, and Assistant D. H. McDougall were all pleased at the turn of events. But the head officers of the United Mine Workers are not at all pleased at the expenditure of $750,000 since the strike was inaugurated, and it is expected that a thorough investigation of all the payments made will be ordered by President Lewis.

Great Britain.—The Prime Minister has given the country to understand that a general election must be looked for during the summer.—Mr. Balfour announces the decision of the Unionist Party to make the free admission of colonial wheat part of its plan of Tariff Reform. This is in accordance with Mr. Chamberlain's original scheme. It is welcomed by the Imperialists at home and in the colonies, but is not so acceptable to the English agricultural voters, who are the backbone of the party. Lord Rosebery urges Unionists to unite exclusively on the constitutional question at the coming election and to leave the whole Tariff matter untouched until it shall have been reported on by a Royal Commission. Mr. Harold Cox gives the same advice, but at present it does not seem probable that they will be listened to, since it is absolutely necessary to have a new fiscal policy to oppose the new fiscal policy of the present government.—The total number of applicants at the new Labor Exchanges during February was 216,813; the vacancies filled were 12,628, about 6 per cent. The new applications in March were 126,119, which brought the number of applications actually pending to about 325,000. The vacancies filled were 20,395, about the same rate per cent. as in February.—The emigration to Canada is assuming considerable proportions, and the Tariff Reformers are making no little political capital out of it.

Australia.—Hon. Joseph Cook, Minister of Defence, attributes the victory of the Labor Party in the late Federal elections to popular resentment on account of the extraordinary legislation and the summary trials and heavy sentences of the Labor leaders, which were used to break the New South Wales coal strike. The late Deakin administration was favorable to the rights of the states and to the minimizing of Federal control. The Government, under Mr. Fisher, is inclined to centralization and proposed to create a Federal Court and a Federal Bank and otherwise to strengthen the Federal Government at the expense of the states. Tariff discrimination in favor of companies paying standard wages and insurance against unemployment will be part of its programme.

Indian Discontent.—The Hindus in British Columbia have made an appeal to their countrymen and to all native members of Councils regarding their status in Canada as subjects of the Empire. They hope to persuade the Gaekwar of Baroda, who will soon pass through Canada on his way to Europe to take up the matter with the Canadian Government. The Gaekwar is one of the few Indian princes to cause anxiety to the Imperial Government.

Irish News.—In spite of many promises, prophecies and threats Mr. Lloyd-George's Finance Bill, introduced April 29, 1909, became law April 29, 1910, substantially the same as when it first left the House of Commons and without any material concessions to Irish demands. Declaratory amendments were inserted to make clear that increment tax did not apply to increases of value in purely agricultural land; nor land tax to judicial tenancies created by the Irish land bills; and that transfers of trust property without a consideration were not subject to stamp duties. Mr. Balfour and later Lord Lansdowne in the Upper House taunted the Government with being forced by Mr. Redmond into violating traditional policies, and the Unionist party are taking up the cry of: No Irish Domination. On the other hand Mr. Redmond is denounced for having swallowed his threat "Veto before the Budget or else—," sacrificed the financial interests of Ireland to shadowy promises and come under the domination of English Ministers. This will be Mr. O'Briens's election cry.—The bigots of Belfast University have not yet done with Scholastic Philosophy. Its principal opponent, Rt. Hon. Thos. Sinclair, having been elected Chairman of Convocation, proposed and carried a resolution against a separate lectureship or professorship in Scholastic Philosophy, or other recognition of denominationalism in the statutes of the University. The resolution does not bind the Senate, which has already sanctioned the Scholastic course.

French Elections.—The first ballot for the Chamber of Deputies on April 24 has resulted in the election of 357 out of 597 members. There will be a second ballot on May 8 in 231 districts, and the result of the nine elections in the French colonies is not yet known. The Conservatives have been badly treated in their former stronghold, the western departments. But the Radicals were not so fortunate in the vine-growing centre and south of France, where Socialism is seducing the peasants. In the Gard, a Mediterranean department in which M. de Ramel has hitherto been very popular, he was checkmated by a Socialist candidate and will have to face a second ballot. In Paris the general results are pretty much the same as in the previous elections of 1906. In the central districts of the city moderate candidates have won, while the outlying districts have elected Radicals and Socialists. Among the ministerial candidates defeated on the question of the parliamentary indemnity of fifteen thousand francs for each member are: MM. Dubief (Saône-et-Loire), Georges Gérald (Charente), Boutard (Haute-Vienne) and Vigouroux (Haute-Loire). At Carmaux in the Tarn, M. Jaurès, the Socialist leader, failed in the first ballot because his Catholic opponent, the Marquis de Solages, received more votes than was expected and some Socialist votes were cast for a third candidate. M. Millerand's defeat is attributed to his having acted as counsel for the notorious liquidator, Duez. At Roubaix, M. Jules Guesde, the revolutionary Socialist, is reelected. In the Rhône M. Francis de Pressensè, Socialist, is beaten. M. Delcassé, who was reported last week as having failed in the first ballot, has really been reelected Deputy for Foix by a small majority. Other well-known deputies reelected are: M. Piou, for Mende (Lorère); M. Aynard, for Rhône; the Count de Mun, for Finistère; M. Cochon, for Paris; M. Augagneur, Governor-General of Madagascar, for Lyons.

Passion Play at Oberammergau.—The dress rehearsal, which marks the opening of the Passion Play season in the Bavarian village, is announced for May 11. Thus will the wood-carvers, sculptors and day laborers of the picturesque Alpine hamlet follow the traditions of their ancestors, who have produced the Passion Play every ten years since 1680, and previous to that irregularly as far back as 1633. There will be thirty performances this spring and summer, the first on May 16 and the last on Sept. 25. Sixty-three of the villagers have speaking parts in the play, and more than three hundred others will appear in the chorus and tableaux. The attendance at the play the coming summer is expected to break all records. Accommodations are assured, however, for all who will make Oberammergau a stopping place in their vacation itinerary. The theatre seats 4,200; there are twelve hotels and every householder in the village is ready to receive guests.

Election "Party Cries."—Political activities already aroused are a clear forecast of the heat that will prevail in next year's campaign preceding the election of a new Reichstag in Germany. Three questions will be discussed by the multitude of speakers preparing to take the field. The finance bill of last year, the electoral reform bill of this year, and the new commercial agreements which the Government means to propose to further Germany's export trade. The Social Democrat leaders have made known their purpose to renew their bitter attacks on all these measures and on the Centre party, which has been especially prominent in securing the legislation already enacted. Not to be taken unawares the Centrists have prepared and scattered broadcast a brochure: "An Answer to the Social-Democrats' War-Cries." Terse, catchy presentments of the party's stand on these matters, and telling replies to the stock-in-trade argument of the Socialists, make up its contents.

Fate of the Reform Bill Still Doubtful.—Although the Electoral Reform Bill passed its second reading in the upper house, by the decisive vote of 140 to 94, its ultimate acceptance by the Landtag is by no means assured. The amendment proposed in the upper house by Graf von Oppersdorf of the Centre, in opposition to the government's plan to extend the limits of the three classes in districts numbering ten to twenty thousand inhabitants, was rejected. The matter will certainly come up anew in the final reading which the constitution provides must still be had in the house of representatives. And the opposition of the Centre to this feature of the act is so strong that they may unite with the other opponents of the measure and defeat the entire bill. This second reading in the upper house is practically final, custom making the third reading a mere formality. The bill now goes back to the lower house as reported from Committee and described in last week's chronicle.

May Day in Berlin.—Many of the demonstrations planned by Socialists of Berlin and its suburbs were abandoned, because an order originating, it was said, with Minister of the Interior von Moltke, forbade open air assemblies in certain quarters of the city. Vorwärts, the chief organ of the party, commenting on this adds: "Workingmen will no doubt draw the only conclusion possible. They must fight on the open street for their rights to assemble where and when they please." The day passed off very quietly in the capital city.

Punished for Libel.—Some weeks ago Simplicissimus, a comic paper of the stamp of the Roman Asino, published a grossly-insulting caricature of the Bishop of Rottenburg. The editor was arraigned before the Criminal Court of Stuttgart and sentenced to two months' imprisonment, without the usual alternative of a fine. The public prosecutor affirmed the insult to be the gravest that could be hurled at one commissioned to watch over the purity of morals; Protestants, he added, had been the first to report the matter to him and to demand prosecution.

Labor Trouble in Germany.—A serious conflict of the builders' unions and their employers which has been threatening began when many of the building firms stopped work on their contracts on April 15. The unions had a sum of fifteen million marks at their disposal and were thought to be able to keep up the contest at least for six weeks. From the start public opinion was not in favor of the employers, who seem to have fought more against unionism than against the demands of the unions. Late telegrams say that in Berlin and Hamburg an understanding has been reached which is considered a victory for the unions and unionism. In other places the lockout continues, but victory seems assured to the unions. No excesses were committed.

The Vienna Reichsrath.—The government has at last won a complete victory. Late last week the upper house passed the bill approving the loan asked for by the ministry. The lower house had voted in favor of the bill earlier in the week. As stated in the Chronicle, the loan is to be negotiated to meet the expenses incurred during the Balkan trouble last spring and the Bosnia-Herzegovina annexation. In the budget discussion the Premier, Freiherr von Bienerth, expressed himself in a manner which has been widely approved. He declared that Austria's finances are not at all in the desperate straits, the inexplicable pessimism of many would have one believe. He added that a satisfactory settlement of the deficit was entirely possible. The agricultural and industrial development of the kingdom was most assuring and gave excellent promise for the future. He concluded his address by a vigorous protest against the charge that he was anti-Slav in sentiment, assuring his hearers that his one object was to promote legislation looking to the common good of the kingdom.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

A Poet's May-Dream.

The most transparent man among our poets was Lord Byron. "In law an infant and in years a boy," he blundered blindly and passionately through a brief life, not unaware of the bitter truth that "if thou give to thy soul her desires, she will make thee the laughing-stock of thine enemies." His resentment against the derision and the scoldings reacted in defiance which strove to out-laugh the laughers and to out-scold the scolders. He succeeded, but his success did not make him happy.

In the distant and eager days during the consulship of Plancus, when "Childe Harold" was our favorite poem, we thought Byron was a poet. Since then Lionel Johnson, and the school of poets which he represents, have shrunk from the vulgar display of muscle and brawn and the artless improvisation of Byron, calling him a rhetorician and no poet. There is something in the criticism. But what rhetoric it is! And sometimes the mood cries for rhetoric as well as for poetry. "That which we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet." We are neither excusing Byron nor palliating his faults when we say that, like most transparently wicked men who endeavor to carry things off with a swaggering and ear-deafening violence, he had more honest worth than the writers whose respectability has been due to cold calculation and a cowardly desire to work injury without creating alarm. There is no need of posting warnings against Byron; he does that himself. He would pour vials of wrath on the Pecksniffian dramatists and novelists of to-day who pose ostentatiously as moral teachers in order to lull to rest the questionings of innocent and over-curious hearts and to offer sophistical defences for the prurient. The intellectual qualities of the headstrong young poet command respect. His common sense revolted against Shelley's atheism, and in the education of Jane Clairmont's daughter he showed sound judgment. The Catholic Church was the form of Christianity for which he had most respect. This, in itself, at a time when Englishmen were still dominated powerfully by Protestant views of Catholicism, indicates inherent mental vigor and energy. But perhaps this instinct for arriving at the truth is not so noticeable in anything he has written as in the few references which he makes to

"The Virgin Mother of the God-born Child."

Many of our non-Catholic poets have sung in praise of the Blessed Virgin, but none has conveyed the same impression of heart-felt sincerity in this respect as Byron. Wordsworth's tribute is beautiful, but one suspects him of merely trying an esthetic experiment. His famous sonnet may not prove subjective admiration for the Mother of God any more than his "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality" proves his belief in pre-existence.

In the Laocöonian and losing fight which he waged with the twin serpents of pride and animal passion Byron caught a few fleeting glimpses of a loveliness in the heavens and he bowed his head in reverence and holy awe. The attention is arrested by the phenomenon. For Byron is the last of our poets whom we might casually suspect of entertaining such a vision.

One of the tragedies of Byron's life—the earliest and the most calamitous—was the unworthiness of his mother. According to all accounts she was shallow, undisciplined and odious in all her relations as the mother of a sensitive and talented boy. Her attitude was one of extremes, one moment overburdening with passionate fondness unintelligible to a boy, and the next bitterly vindictive, cruel and unjust. It is a sad story and we need not go into details. If ever a boy needed the restraining hand of a wise mother it was Byron, and if ever a boy showed to the world the natural results of a training according to tantrums and fierce whims, it was Byron. Now and then he stops in his wild after-career to brood in a lonely room at night over his course and the terrible cost, and we catch regretful glances backward to those early days and hear sighs over "what might have been."

In those reveries and reconstructions we can see the poet drawing a picture of what, alas! his own mother was not, a picture of the mother who would have saved him shame and sorrow, kept his life unspoiled and fed the starved cravings of his young heart. What a picture of human excellence the poet would create for himself! The mother he would have should possess every beauty of mind and heart and soul and body that his poet's intuition could call forth. She should have that laeta serietas, the sweet seriousness, which Ausonius attributed to his mother, a union of qualities which drew unreserved affection while it inspired a tender and scrupulous fear. She should be wise to direct, swift to heal, gracious and fathomless in her love and delicately responsive to every changing hour and mood in the young life that owed itself to her. The poet's picture would be that of an ideal mother etched sharply in the acid of his own sore need. It is not cheap sentiment that leads us to see him thus remodeling the past. Which of us, that finds himself astray, does not have his day-dream in which he seeks to discover where the mistake began and how it might not have occurred?

We can see the poet rousing himself at length with the bitter thought that a man cannot choose his mother. But hold! One man, at least, has chosen his own mother. Even good Protestants, much more Christian than the poet, all, in fact, who hold that Christ is God and took human flesh from Mary to become man also, must be familiar with the thought that Christ chose His own mother. We can see the idea coming in all its force for the first time upon the musing poet. Christ chose His own mother! What a mother this must be! Not a human poet to fashion her forth, but God Himself; not the imperfect and broken gleams of earthly beauty, wherewith as from weak colors to form an ideal picture, but the vast and countless types of all possible excellence in the Mind of God from which to choose; not helpless longing after vain ideals, but Omnipotence nodding to the possible to step forth into existence; not choosing the mother of a man, but the Mother of a God-man. Here were all the resources at hand for perfect and ideal womanhood and motherhood, and these resources were called into action in the creation of the Blessed Virgin Mary. If Christianity means anything it means at least all this.

We suspect Byron saw this truth more clearly than most of his Protestant contemporaries. In the midst of his excesses he could be logical, and Protestantism glories in being illogical. The poet had at least an intellectual conviction that the Blessed Virgin Mary must be the greatest of all the creatures of God, and he respected the Church that knew and always maintained her lofty prerogatives. This insight into the truth led him very near to the Church despite his vicious life and his association with Laodicean Englishmen and the immoral and unreligious elements of Italian political life. The Blessed Virgin is called in Catholic liturgy "the destroyer of heresy." For, if the splendor of the Mother is not allowed, the notion of the Son is sure to be contracted and erroneous. If the honor and high station of the Mother are recognized in all their inconceivable amplitude, the Son will only then receive His due and Catholics will not be giped for superstitious practice and idolatrous devotions. Devotion to the Mother of God is the test of true Christianity; and, for all his waywardness, Byron came nearer the test than many more faultless poets. Whether his great sin was the rejection of light under the influence of unchecked passions, who can say?

Catholics and Socialists.

Stating that the Socialist Mayor of Milwaukee carried a ward where Polish Catholics predominate, though the Democratic candidate was a Catholic and the Catholic Church condemns Socialism, the Independent asks: "Are they good Catholics? Are they Catholics at all? Are they counted as Catholics? Are they counted as Catholics in the census which gives that Church fourteen million members?" We do not vouch for its facts, but if the Polish voters are not counted as Catholics why does the Independent call them so? A Catholic is under no obligation to vote for a Catholic or a Democrat—the game of politics is no part of Catholic dogma—but if the Independent has rightly stated the Socialist Mayor's program, there is nothing to prevent a Catholic from voting for him.

Home rule, municipal ownership of gas, electric and ice plants; street sprinkling by street railway companies and a seat for every passenger on a three-cent fare; an eight-hour workday at union wages; taxing corporations on an equal basis with individuals and standardizing the bread-loaf, are measures that may or may not be expedient, but they contain no menace to faith or morals. All this and much more in the same direction have been accomplished by Carl Lueger in Vienna, as shown in recent issues of AMERICA, and yet he was counted not only a "good Catholic" but the leader and inspirer of Catholic thought and action and the champion of Catholic interests throughout the Austrian empire. The Labor Party who recently won control of the Australian Federal Parliament included in their program state ownership of public utilities, but this did not prevent the Catholics from giving them united support.

The fact is that the word Socialism, with or without a capital S, is used in a bewildering variety of meanings, harmful, harmless and mixed. The essential creed of Marx and Lasalle, of Blanchford and Bebel—the core and vital principle of the Socialist movement—is unknown or unrealized by a large, probably the largest number of those who call themselves Socialists. These know or care nothing about collective ownership and control of the means of production or the materialistic evolution of man. They want an eight-hour day with higher wages and an old-age pension; or, when the charges of lighting, water and transit companies become too high and existing parties will not lower them, they want these utilities transferred to a management which promises to use them to better advantage for the public.

This is not Socialism. As was explained by Rev. M. P. Dowling, S. J., in the first number of AMERICA, municipal or national ownership of public utilities, income tax, inheritance tax and even single tax "are not really Socialistic nor even evidence of society drifting towards Socialism." These and kindred reforms were stated to be quite compatible with the existing social order; some of them exist under it, and "Socialism has no right to claim as its own whatever aims at the improvement of social conditions."

Its opponents too often play into its hands and give color to its claims. Socialism has a bad name which when correctly understood and rightly defined it richly deserves; but that is no reason for attaching it to schemes and policies, which its definition does not cover. This is a convenient and often successful political device, but it is not honest nor is it good politics in the long run. Increment or income tax, government ownership or control of public utilities, may or may not be advisable, or may be desirable in one set of circumstances and undesirable in another, but they are not Socialism. Should any one of them, after being denounced as Socialistic, work out satisfactorily genuine Socialism will know how to turn the denunciation to advantage. It can then say: Because this one measure which was branded with the red seal of Socialism, is good, therefore all the anathemas against Socialism are equally groundless and the whole socialistic program is also good and will make good,—ab uno disce omnes. Of course, the inference is unwarranted. The measures that Socialists hold up as samples of their wares are not their own, but were fatuously presented to them by short-sighted opponents who thus enable them to repair a battered reputation and build upon it a genuine Socialistic edifice. Catholics as well as others, whether in Vienna, Milwaukee or Melbourne, have a right and often a duty to oppose schemes of reform, as unwise or inexpedient, but they have no right to declare them intrinsically and eternally wrong because of the character of their promoters, the dangers of innovation, or other extrinsic circumstances.

But Socialism proper is intrinsically wrong and no Catholic may sanction it. It has been said that it has had so many varying, and in some respects, contradictory presentations, that it is difficult to know what is and what is not Socialism. There is no difficulty. The expositions may vary but the underlying principle is always the same, namely: that the means of production are morally the property of the State and not of individuals; that such property in the hands of individuals, no matter how widely distributed, exploits the labor of others, and such exploitation is wrong. That is, the State must of right own and control lands and hands and brain, and private property, private enterprise and all that comes with them and from them, must of right be ended. The schemes to effect this end may differ, the philosophy of it may be variously phrased, but the end Socialism has in view is always this and no other. This is the Socialism which the Catholic Church condemns. If Poles or other voters of Milwaukee believe in this doctrine, they are not Catholics; if they do not believe in it, they may or may not be good Catholics, but they are not Socialists.

It is unnecessary to lay stress on the fact that the founders, exponents, propagators and leading advocates of Socialism have been and are, almost to a man, opponents of revealed religion and the Christian scheme of morality; that most of them not only have been and are materialists but they lay down the exclusion of a personal God, the deification of man and his materialistic evolution as the philosophic basis of their scheme; that they are immoral in their lives and teach the right of humanity to gratify lustful impulses unhindered. This alone, as Bishop Von Ketteler pointed out, precludes Catholics from joining them.

"They found national societies not in the interest of a nation but of a party," he said, "the first object of which is to combat Catholicism. We Catholics can have no share in an association which despises and attacks our faith. Deeply as I am interested in the welfare of the working classes and sympathizing to the depths of my soul with their claim for justice, I cannot express the sadness with which I see so excellent a cause turned by anti-religious fanaticism against the Catholic Church. As long as this is the case, I can only do my best to put Catholic workmen on their guard against those friends who hold out a helping hand and have not Christ with them; for they must infallibly fail." Showing that on account of the passions of the human heart religion alone can save them and godless champions cannot help them, he warns Catholic workmen not to play with dangerous Socialistic eddies lest they be swept irresistibly into its atheistic current.

But were Socialism divested of immorality and infidelity—and this is logically impossible—it would still be condemned by the Catholic Church. She holds that society is normal when its constituent families own and control material things; that the right to hold and acquire property is not a civil accident, but is inherent in the individual prior to the State's existence, connected with the sense of right and wrong and involving definite moral obligations superior to ownership itself. The Church knows better than Marx, Lasalle or Bebel, the evils and loathsome abuses of modern society; she abominates them and combats them; but she also perceives things in their right proportion, and she will not sacrifice the fundamental to the accidental nor yield a permanent principle under the pressure of passing conditions. She sees that the evils of capitalism, as all other evils, are curable only by the right use of the human will, directed by reason and grace. She knows, while insisting on equality in spiritual things, that economic equality is impossible, that what man really needs is sufficiency and security, and that these are attainable only in a society of family organizations and divided ownership with their responsibilities, obligations, moral bonds and material advantages; and she also knows from her study of the human heart, that Collectivism, could Socialists establish it, would inevitably end in a worse form of private ownership in which the masterful would rule and the weak would be serfs.

The Catholic Church has labored for social reform since her birth; it has been the immediate object of all her activities; she has studied the ground in the light of reason, revelation and experience, and she has reached the conclusion that whatever assails the integrity of the Christian family, assails the laws of God and the rights and liberties of man. "The Christian family," says von Ketteler, "assures to the workman the best and most natural association, that which God has founded and without which none other avails. It preserves the workman from libertine excess in youth and age, while the love and thrift of a Christian wife enhance the value of his wage. Christian marriage, founded on the doctrine and grace of the Catholic Church, is of infinitely more importance in the solution of the labor question than all the projects of Socialistic societies."

If for no other reason the Catholic Church would condemn Socialism—the real Socialism of the master Socialists who formulate its creed, direct its propaganda, and are its sap and life—because the statocracy it aims at would dominate and destroy family life. Social reforms which aim at conserving the natural rights, whether to property or to freedom of action, of the family and the individual, she not only does not condemn as Socialistic, but approves as the most practical preventive of Socialism. This is the view of Leo XIII in his encyclical on Labor; it is in accord with the Church's organized, persistent action for the promotion of social reforms and the uplifting of the masses until a false Reformation, the seed of Socialism, temporarily arrested her activities. How the Protestant revolt stopped the progress of true reform and bred the evils both of Capitalism and Socialism may form the subject of another paper.

That Dreadful Tail

The predicted passage of the earth through the tail of Halley's comet on the night of May 18 seems still to fill many anxious minds with dread. Its absolute harmlessness cannot, therefore, be emphasized too often, especially as unscrupulous "yellow" journals are continually even now going to the opposite extreme and frightening the imaginations of their readers with descriptions and pictures of what they say may possibly happen. These writers know better, and it is no excuse for them to say that their fearful pictures and headlines are retracted lower down in small type and in an obscure paragraph.

To what lengths such conscienceless writers may go is evidenced by the work of the infidel, Flammarion, who is regarded by the public as one of the greatest of living astronomers. He predicted that Halley's comet would bring about the end of the world by asphyxiating and poisoning every form of life, and he did this in such lurid terms that in several parts of Europe many poor people took their whole deposit out of the banks and spent it lavishly, wishing to have the benefit of it while they might before the world would be destroyed. Things went to such lengths that the government had to interfere and try to calm the public imagination by issuing innumerable printed pamphlets which showed the utter falseness of the prediction.

In addition, therefore, to the reasons given before, on April 16, for dismissing all possible apprehensions, that the head of the comet will not come within ten million miles of the earth, that the tenuity of the gas exceeds that of the best vacuum we can produce, and that all the astronomers of the world are delighted and consider it a most exceptional privilege to pass through the tail of a comet at all, it may be of service to examine a few of the direful cataclysms predicted by some of our magazines and newspapers.

One of these says that the enormous speed, forty-three miles a second, with which the tail will strike the earth's atmosphere, will cause such friction that the mass of the comet will be set on fire, just as shooting stars and meteorites are, and that this intense heat will kill everything on earth. While it is true that the speed mentioned will generate heat enough by the friction to vaporize any known substance, it is no less true that there will be very little to burn and that the minute solid or gaseous particles, which constitute the tail of a comet, will certainly produce a less sum total of heat than the sparks that fly off an emery wheel when a tool is being ground. It is this reason that leads some astronomers to expect a brilliant display of celestial fireworks in the shape of shooting stars, while others again are not so confident that anything at all will be seen.

Another writer says that the outer layer of our atmosphere consists of hydrogen, because this is the lightest of all gases, and that this hydrogen will be set on fire and roast us to death. This prediction, however, rests on a false foundation, since on account of the law of the diffusion of gases and the never-resting winds no such layer can exist.

The poisonous cyanogen gas that is said to constitute the tail of Halley's comet can bear no proportion to the poisonous gases vomited forth continually into our atmosphere by our chemical industries all over the world, in spite of which careful scientific analysis has shown that the purity of our air is as great as it ever was.

Nor can the comet raise tides by drawing the water out of the oceans and flooding the continents. While the mass of a comet is not known accurately, we do know that it is less than one-millionth of the earth's. Our moon is one-eightieth as large as the earth, and as the tides it raises are beneficial rather than destructive, we see how harmless and how insignificant the cometary tides would be. Then, again, as the tide-raising force diminishes as the square of the distance, and as our least distance from the comet will be fifty times our distance from the moon, the diminutive cometary tides are again reduced 2,500 fold.

In fine, as at its last perihelion the comet's tail, though theoretically it ought to have been the longest, measured only about two million miles, it may not be long enough to reach the earth at all on the night of the dreaded passage, and all our fears, no less than our hopes, may be bootlessly shattered.

In accordance with the views expressed in the beginning of this paper, the government of the Philippine Islands, in order to quiet the probable fears of the natives, has given wide circulation to an article by Father George M. Zwack, S. J., Secretary of the Weather Bureau. It bears the title "The Return of Halley's Comet and Popular Apprehension." The writer shows very well that comets cannot be signs of God's wrath and presages of impending calamity, nor can they exert evil influences on the earth, nor can Halley's comet collide with the sun or the earth. Nature of April 14 praises the aforementioned pamphlet in these words:

"Reports from various countries emphasize the necessity for spreading sound knowledge concerning the comet. The suicide of a Hungarian farmer on account of Halley's comet is followed by a report from Odessa that in southern Russia there is a veritable popular terror, which is being exploited by unscrupulous persons for the purpose of obtaining money for special prayers, etc., from the ignorant natives. We welcome, therefore, a brochure received from the Manila Weather Bureau, in which Father Zwack carefully analyses the alleged sources of catastrophe, and shows how utterly puerile they are. Such brochures, if printed in the vernacular, would do a great deal towards allaying excitement, which otherwise may lead to serious trouble."

Successful Reformatory Work

If the country is to be saved from the raids of an army of professional criminals, more diligent and more intelligent work must be done to reclaim juvenile offenders. If the present haphazard manner of looking after and restoring them to their place in society can be dignified with name of "method," where so much is left to capricious experimentation, certain weaknesses in that method have been already pointed out; yet the greatest flaw, which threatens to vitiate or nullify the earnest endeavors of any conscientious penologist has yet to be named. We speak of the staff of the institution. As no chain is stronger than its weakest link, so no correctional system is stronger than the personnel appointed to apply it and to watch over the details of its administration.

When one mentions politics he touches a tender spot in our public life, for almost every voter is satisfied that those who agree with him in politics are in the right, while those who disagree with him are hopelessly in the wrong. If, therefore, he is victorious at the polls, those who share his political righteousness should also share his triumph and enjoy the good things of the earth. Civil service regulations, it is true, have to a certain limited extent, checked an abuse which had waxed strong with eighty years of vigorous growth, but the principle of rewarding services by political appointments is too strongly entrenched in the Federal Government to be driven out of State affairs. And as almost anybody is competent to carry a key, and lock or unlock a door at fixed times, it follows that one reward of merit might be appointment to just that office—in a reformatory. Or, perhaps, some blockhead who has so failed at everything else that he has successfully demonstrated his unfitness for any position of trust or responsibility, is presented with the keys on the plea that where so much is amiss he will not make matters worse. A fine prospect, indeed, under such auspices, for the amendment of the young offender!

Col. Masten, who has thrown no little light on the subject, enters a protest wrung, it seems, from his own experience, against the practice of selecting bridewell guards from the ranks of earnest young rustics whose experience in reformatory work has been confined chiefly to teaching colts to "lead" and calves to drink out of a bucket. Such men are no match for youngsters whose wits have been sharpened by the file of city life.

It does not follow from our remarks that to be successful in reformatory work one must be a genius, for a very clever man may fall far short of the ideal of a good teacher. He may be so dazzled by his own brilliancy that he may fail to discern the ill-success of all his attempts to teach, though his pupils, whether in a university or in a reformatory, may be painfully conscious that he is a failure.

In like manner, a pious and devoted man may be anything but a shining success in leading the young to the love and practice of what God commands. His good will may effect his personal sanctification, but it is no earnest that he can assist effectively in transforming a spiritual nondescript into a child of God. "Where there's a will there's a way" has no application when the "way" is concerned with the reclamation of unfortunates who are morally blighted, or with the wise guidance of those who are still free from vice or criminality.

In this world few are so placed that they need have no concern for the morrow or for the evening of life. A profession, therefore, in which the emoluments are so modest as to leave little after meeting everyday expenses does not appeal strongly to one whose energy and ability mark him out for success in reformatory work, for he must perforce seek a better market for his talents. The evil becomes more grievous if a turn of the political wheel of fortune suffices to interrupt or end his career in the midst of his usefulness. One or the other of these drawbacks has deprived the commonwealth of the services of many a promising worker in the cause of juvenile reform.

If great care is requisite in the selection of instructors and directors for average children, not less should be used in providing for the welfare of the less fortunate. Public funds and private alms for correctional work are in no little danger of being frittered away as truly as if they were tossed, coin after coin, into the depths of the sea. It would be an interesting occupation to figure out how much positive good has been accomplished during the past twenty years by funds which with generous prodigality have been devoted to the work of recalling wandering feet to the "strait way that leadeth to life." We are not disposed to consider money ill spent when it effects a moral uplift, but we think that much of it, with proper care, could be made productive of greater and more lasting results.

The Borstal Association, whose annual statement was recently noticed in AMERICA, seems to have weeded out many, if not all, of the objectionable features that mar or ruin reformatory work. This organization, whose success has won for it due recognition from the British Government, has to do with youths between sixteen and twenty-one years of age who have been convicted of an indictable offense. However, it makes a selection, for it aims to discipline those who hold out hope for reclamation. The "course of treatment," which is under constant governmental supervision, aims to instil into the youth in its care such habits of industry and thrift as will keep them, on their release, from any anxiety to be taken again into custody. "For the most part they enter Borstal in an unpromising condition of mind and body, lumpy, slack, sometimes defiant, generally out of condition, and as a whole below the average of physique and intelligence of their class. They come out healthy, well set up, improved in manner, and in the great majority of cases anxious to show that they can work honestly and hard."

The work of the day begins at six o'clock with a full hour of gymnasium drill. From 7:30 a.m. to 12 m. and from 1:30 p.m. to 5:30 p.m. the boys are employed at various forms of manual labor including carpentry and other trades, gardening and general farm work. There is a night school for the more backward boys. There is a short chapel exercise with a brief instruction every evening. Lights are out at 8:30 p.m. The equipment includes ample arrangements for baths. The new arrival is placed in the ordinary grade, from which he can be promoted after five months' trial to the special grade, where he enjoys certain privileges. Misconduct sends him back to the ordinary grade. After release on parole from the institution the Borstal Society looks after the boy and sees that he is not driven by poverty to fresh violations of the law, exerts itself through agents to secure him suitable employment, and follows him until he has earned his full liberty.

This system which is handicapped by the gravity of the cases that it handles, has nevertheless proven so eminently successful that the number of its institutions is to be increased. The secret of its success is not far to seek. First, it has a method, a program, which has stood the test of time; secondly, it exercises extreme care in selecting every official connected with its reformatories; lastly, it does not attempt the impossible feat of remodeling and remaking defectives and degenerates whose minds or bodies were originally or have become hopelessly affected by disease or vice. Its record is its strongest argument with the charitable public and with the Government, for the year's work shows that sixty per cent. of the cases are "doing well."

A Parallel and A Contrast

I

One hundred years ago good Queen Louisa of Prussia died. Her countrymen have lovingly enshrined her memory in their hearts. She well deserves their chivalrous homage. Wife of the brave but unsuccessful Frederick William III, seated on a throne undermined by civil dissensions and exposed to the attack of a conqueror before whom republics and monarchies had been swept away, queen of a broken and ruined people, exiled from palace and home, slandered and betrayed, she never for a moment lost heart in her country and her king.

Half a century before, Maria Theresa of Austria had roused the Magyars to unsheath their swords for their helpless queen and her child. Like the angel of a national resurrection Queen Louisa spoke words of encouragement and cheer to her despondent people. They heard and rallied round their sovereigns. The seed of national regeneration was sown. Louisa was not to see the ripened fruits of its golden harvest, and when she died, mourned by a whole people, the clouds had not entirely rolled away from the horizon, all the wounds of the fatherland had not been healed. But conquered Prussia was lifting up its head and dimly groping for the weakest link in its galling chain to snap it and rise.

"She slumbered: but it came—it came,

Her land's redeeming hour,

With the glad shout and signal flame

Sent on from tower to tower.

Fast through the realm a spirit moved—

'Twas hers, the lofty and the loved."

Defeated on the same day in the two great battles of Auerstädt and Jena (Oct. 14, 1806), Prussia lay prostrate at the feet of Napoleon. The conqueror entered Berlin in triumph. The work of Frederick the Great had vanished like a dream; the military supremacy of the German troops, so firmly established by Frederick at Rosbach and Torgau had disappeared. By the Treaty of Tilsit (July, 1807) Prussia cramped and blocked behind the Elbe was reduced to the rank of a second or even a third-rate power. A heavy war indemnity was imposed upon her. She had barely been able to preserve the Marches of Brandenburg, the cradle of her kings. Half her territory and population were gone. Saxony and Prussian Poland were ceded to the victor, and Napoleon seated his brother Jerome on the throne of the newly-created Kingdom of Westphalia.

But Louisa, Frederick William, and their people were to teach the world a noble lesson. A restoration almost unprecedented in history was to begin. The men were at hand to do the work. Every genuine son of the torn and bleeding fatherland shared in the glorious toil of rebuilding the fallen temple and strengthening its bulwarks. The great minister Stein reorganized the various branches of the Government, brought order out of chaos, began the work of popular and parliamentary government, broke down the wall of caste and privilege, abolished serfdom and thus bound the people more closely to the King. His work was ably continued by Chancellor Hardenberg. Gneisenau and Schnarnhorst reorganized the army disheartened by a long series of disasters, and prepared the troops who at Leipzig and Waterloo were to humble the victors of Jena and Auerstädt. The poet Arndt was ready to strike the stirring notes of his "Field Marshal's Song":

"Then sound, blaring trumpets! Hussars, charge
once more!

Ride, field marshal, ride, like the winds as they roar!

To the Rhine, over Rhine, in your triumph advance!
Brave sword of our country, right on into France!"

William von Humboldt had begun a thorough educational reform, and, almost under the very folds of the invader's flag, the University of Berlin was founded in 1809. A breath of enthusiasm everywhere fanned the fires of patriotism, and the "Tugendbund" or "League of Virtue" found adherents in every palace and hamlet in the land. Besides Moritz Arndt, poets like Max Schenkendorff and Theodore Körner animated their countrymen with war lyrics whose strains sound like the roll of drums or the hoof beats of charging squadrons. Körner, in the flower of youth, when the iron notes of his "Sword-Song" yet trembled on his lips, was to lay down his young life on the altar of his country at Gadebusch, leaving a

"voice in his trumpet lays
To turn the flight,
And a guiding spirit for after days
Like a watch-fire's light."

Prussia's resurrection from ruin and disgrace is one of the most stirring events in history. The people that accomplished it were eminently great.

II

Such national restorations are not often seen. Few peoples have the power necessary to throw off the virus and the germ of decay when once that canker has deeply affected them. In strong contrast to this is the wonderful vitality and recuperative power of the Catholic Church. For that resurrection and restoration of a whole people, which we so justly admire in Prussia, is met at rare intervals only. It is, on the contrary, the normal condition of the Catholic Church and has come to be considered an ordinary occurrence, so often and so regularly has it taken place. Divine in her Origin and Founder, holy in the form of her Government, in her Sacraments and her End, the Church has her human element liable to the blunders, the vices and the crimes of sinful humanity. The nations amongst which she rears her altars are not proof against the attacks of passion. They may sink low, but if they listen to her they will rise again.

Physician, teacher, guide, the Catholic Church has a remedy for every disease of the mind and heart, a balm for every wound; for the volcanic fires of every passion she has refreshing dews and healing snows. Like the Tower of David her walls are hung with many a buckler and sword of celestial temper, and she knows what weapon to use in the hour of danger and need. For every heresy she brings forth a doctor. Arius attacks the Divinity of Christ; an Athanasius and a Hilary meet him in the lists. Nestorius proclaims that Mary is not the Mother of God, a Cyril becomes her champion. Pelagius is refuted by Augustine, Abelard by the saintly Abbot of Clairvaux. In our own time, a heresy treacherously sapping the very foundations of the edifice is unmasked by Pius X and Modernism loses its power and its sting.

When priests, people and kings forget their duty, when vice is seated on the throne and license reigns even in the cloister and the sanctuary, a Gregory VII, with the burning words and zeal of an Apostle, terrifies the evil-doers into the forgotten paths of duty. If threats and prayers are of no avail, he has the dread power of anathema and excommunication, which few men, in that iron but believing age, dared resist. If Luther begins a so-called Reformation, the Church inaugurates a Counter-Reformation, incomparably nobler in its origin, its authors, its means and its end. The Popes are at its head; inspired, approved by them the decrees of the Council of Trent renew the life and spirit of the Catholic world.

The Reformation begets Luther, Calvin, Zwinglius, Knox, Henry VIII, Melancton, Elizabeth. The Catholic Revival has its Charles Borromeo, its Ignatius and its Xavier, its Francis Borgia and its Peter of Alcantara, its Philip Neri, its Teresa and its Francis de Sales, and the moral superiority of these great saints is beyond question. To compare them to the standard-bearers of the Reformation would argue gross ignorance and be an insult to their names. Like the householder of the Gospel the Church, out of her vast treasure-house, brings forth good things old and new. For the day of persecution she has martyr-legions to conquer her conquerors. When the Barbarians overrun Europe her cowed monks and veiled virgins win them to civilization and to Christ. If, under the blast of the hurricane, a few decayed branches are torn from her trunk, her vigor is not impaired and she puts forth other branches and the sap of immortality produces still richer fruits.

When one nation wanders away from her, another seeks admission into her fold; when one race throws off her yoke, another bows before her and calls her Mother and Queen. She watches the signs of the times. In the Thirteenth Century she has a Thomas Aquinas to systematize and codify her dogmas, architects to rear the spires and carve the portals of her cathedrals; in the Nineteenth she has a Pope to vindicate the Sacred Books against insidious attacks and to write the charter of rights of the laborer. She is of all lands and nations, at home in Republican America and in the Court of Kings. For nations, for individuals, she has the secret of a new, a nobler birth. There is healing and strength in the touch of her garments and like her Master she can bring the dead to life again. In her fold the sinner of yesterday, now repentant and purified, may like Augustine have his name entered on the roster of her saints. She can stand by the gallows of the hardened criminal, and with sacramental power cheat the very demons of their prey.

Ever girt around by relentless foes, she ever breaks through their serried ranks; constantly assaulted, she is ever victorious. Her victories are the bloodless victories of Virtue and Truth. She wins the proud to humility, makes the passionate and the sensual chaste, melts the violent and the cruel to pity and mercy. In her progress she wins from the opposing camps their noblest leaders, and Newman, Manning and Stolberg, Brunetière and Brownson consecrate to her service their talents and their loyalty. She has traditions to guide her, the voice of her Councils, her Episcopacy, her Supreme Pontiff to keep her from error. The cleansing and healing fires of the Great Sacrifice ever burn on her altars, and under the mystic veils of the Saving Host, Emmanuel, God with us, strengthens his people with the Bread of the Strong and the Wine that maketh Virgins. The venerable old man who rules her destinies is true to her purpose and end, when he proclaims to the world that he has but one thought, one ideal, "To restore all things in Christ." No purer ambition ever haunted the soul or fired the heart of statesman, priest or king, and none that is more certain of attainment. The Church has within her the undying principle of restoration. Nations may decay and governments fall, Prussia and the empire that crowned her glory may in time dissolve; for not to them was said: "Behold I am with you all days." That infallible assurance was given to the Church alone; hence in her direst straits we may say to her with confidence

"Thou art not conquered! Beauty's ensign yet
Is crimson on thy lips and on thy cheeks,
And Death's pale flag is not advanced there."

IN MISSION FIELDS

La Tarahumara Indian Tribe

This mission, embracing the mountainous western part of the State of Chihuahua, Mexico, was originally established by the Spanish Jesuits, in whose care it remained until their expulsion from the dominions of the crown of Spain by Carlos III in 1767. Their immediate successors were secular priests, as is seen from the entries in the mission records, but these soon gave place to the Franciscans from the famous custodia of Zacatecas, who remained in charge until July 12, 1859, when the "Reform Law" of Juarez, suppressing religious orders in Mexico, was decreed at Vera Cruz.

This action was fatal to the missions, for, although some villages in the valleys were supplied with pastors and a few aged friars remained in the remote and almost inaccessible mountain towns, the dearth of priests speedily became so great that the Indians saw a missionary only once a year at most and then only on a flying visit. Thus it followed as a necessary consequence that in some towns the churches and pastoral residences crumbled to pieces through lack of repairs and in others they came into the possession of those whose only claim was seizure and occupation. But the saddest part of the story is that the poor natives, hardly weaned from their former superstitions, were left without religious instruction and thus fell back into their original savagery with nothing but baptism to remind them of their faith.

This abandoned part of his vast diocese early claimed the pastoral care of the Right Rev. José de Jesús Ortiz, first Bishop of Chihuahua, who sent some priests of the Congregation of St. Joseph to rekindle the fire of faith among the Tarahumaras, until the Jesuits could be recalled to the scenes of their earlier labors. They were available in 1900. Thus, after an enforced absence of one hundred and thirty-three years, the Society of Jesus was back on the firing line. Three priests and a lay brother took up the work, devoting themselves at the outset to a careful inspection of the field. Perched here and there on cliffs or hidden away in gulches, they ferreted out upwards of sixty villages in the Sierra Madre. They are so scattered that it is commonly a day's journey on horseback to travel from one little town to its nearest neighbor. Each village averaged two hundred families, giving a total of about sixty thousand souls without counting the whites who, to a limited extent, are represented in many of the towns.

The majority of these Indians have received baptism, but in remote villages, which have been virtually discovered where they lie scattered along an immense gorge far up in the Cordillera, even baptism is unknown. The missionaries have fallen in with members of the tribe of Tepehuanas, in no less spiritual destitution than those whom they are now evangelizing, but they are unable to extend their work among them through lack of men and means.

Such was the state of the mission when the Jesuits established themselves in the village of Sisoguichic and settled down to work. The natives still retained vague traditions of the early Jesuits, who had been the first missionaries to penetrate those fastnesses, and were curious about the newcomers and somewhat suspicious as well, but their shyness quickly yielded to the friendly overtures of the Fathers, whose abnegation and apostolic zeal were not lost upon those children of nature. Now in the tenth year of its renewed existence, the mission counts eleven priests and as many brothers, who are still all too few to till successfully so vast a field. There are five residences, at each of which there is a day school. In one residence the Fathers maintain a small boarding school for the Indian children. And here "maintain" is taken literally, for on account of the poverty of the natives the children are fed, clothed and taught at the expense of the missionaries. The Sisters of Mercy have come to the help of the women and little girls by establishing three convents in which they have schools where they teach the children and catechize the squaws.

The spiritual harvest for the year 1909 shows that God has blessed the labors which have been undergone in a wild and unproductive region amidst poor and ignorant Indians. The baptisms of children number 1,806, of adults, 96. There were 427 marriages, 28,693 confessions, and 421 sick calls.

CORRESPONDENCE

A Humble Heroine

PARIS, APRIL 20, 1910.

Only ten days ago, on the feast of the Good Shepherd, April 10, a funeral procession wended its way between flowering hedgerows, to the tiny convent cemetery of Larnay, near Poitiers, in the west of France. The coffin was followed by a number of grey-robed Soeurs de la Sagesse, whose institute is well known throughout the country, by the two hundred deaf and dumb girls, who are educated at Larnay and by a pathetic little group of blind deaf-mutes, to whose imprisoned souls the woman just dead had brought light, love and happiness.

Some friends followed, among them was M. Louis Arnould, the distinguished professor of the University of Poitiers, who was the first to make known to the world the great work accomplished by Soeur Ste. Marguerite, the humble heroine who, on that April day, was laid to rest in the quiet graveyard.

The story is an interesting one: Soeur Ste Marguerite, a native of Brittany, became a Soeur de la Sagesse at the age of eighteen; in 1888, she came to Larnay and was employed in the training of the deaf-mutes, who are educated by these nuns. Soeur Ste. Médulle, who had much experience in the matter, taught her methods to Soeur Ste Marguerite, but the latter soon became more efficient than her teacher and achieved the great work of her life, when she undertook to train a girl called Marie Heurtin, who was not only deaf and dumb, but also blind from her birth.

Marie was brought to Larnay in 1875, at the age of ten; she was the child of poor peasants, who had never succeeded in controlling her; it was pitiable to see how the girl's wild soul, untouched so far by any external influences, battled against its prison house and fought with the barriers that separated it from the world of the living! Marie's fits of passion terrified the sisters, her yells and shrieks alarmed the neighbors, she would beat the floor with her fists in her vain efforts to make herself understood. To Soeur Ste Marguerite was entrusted the task of training the little creature; it was no easy one and demanded much capacity, penetration, good sense, as well as unlimited devotedness. The sister began by studying her pupil's tastes and fancies and managed to establish a system of signs by which Marie was able to ask for the things she wanted: eggs, bread, a knife, etc. The child thus learnt that certain signs were connected with certain objects. When this was done, her mistress taught her the special alphabet that was in use among deaf-mutes before the invention of the vocal method that is now generally adopted; only, the signs that are seen by ordinary deaf-mutes had, in this case, to be felt.

As a next step, Marie was taught to read the books written for the blind, where letters are represented by raised dots. It was a more difficult task to lead her to grasp abstract ideas and supernatural truths, but, by dint of much patience and tenacious effort, even this stupendous undertaking was successfully accomplished. Soeur Marguerite taught her the difference between riches and poverty, by making her touch first a richly-dressed lady, then a poor beggar, she made her realize death by touching the cold cheek of a dead nun; the existence of God and His creative power by making her feel the influence of the sun. Then, having bridged over the abyss that separated her charge from the outer world, she went on to develop these first elements of knowledge. By degrees, she made the girl understand the difference between right and wrong, the wisdom and goodness of God, the history of Christ and, while impressing upon her mind those higher truths, that alone could bring light and joy into her shadowed life, she accustomed her to the household duties that would make the blind deaf-mute a useful member of the Larnay Community.

Marie Heurtin's education lasted for years, but she proved an apt pupil, quick and eager to learn, passionately interested in the new world to which Soeur Ste. Marguerite had introduced her. That she thoroughly grasped her teacher's meaning was proved by the violent repulsion she showed for poverty, old age and death, until the sister brought higher motives to control and modify these first impressions. She was truly appreciative of the supernatural truths that opened out new vistas of happiness before her sightless eyes, and her desire to obey the gentle sister, who to her personified all that was good and beautiful, was often touchingly expressed.

Soeur Ste Marguerite never lost sight of the fact that Marie Heurtin was a peasant's daughter, she wisely made no attempt to educate her above her station, but she taught her general history, geography, arithmetic, a certain amount of Church history and literature; Marie can write a good letter, she can describe her sensations and feelings in excellent French, she is an intelligent reader and keenly interested in all the subjects that come under her notice. Besides this, she can knit and crochet. Her temper is constantly bright and gay and the serenity of her sweet countenance impresses all those who come near her.

But the sister's chief endeavor was to develop the girl's soul, and here also she was met half-way: the wild creature whose bursts of fury once terrified the nuns is now, after fifteen years' training, a bright, strong, sensible and happy young woman, who not only is resigned to her infirmity, but who smilingly accepts it from the hand of God. Within the last three years, another blind deaf-mute, Anne Marie Poyet, has become an inmate of the Convent of Larnay and very wisely Soeur Ste Marguerite enlisted Marie Heurtin's services to help her to educate the new comer, who had become blind, deaf and dumb at the age of seventeen months. The task was accepted by Marie Heurtin with delighted earnestness and her motherly feeling towards her little sister in misfortune has done much to develop her own attractive personality.

Soeur Ste Marguerite's one desire was to remain unknown, but her friends having made a statement of the case to the French Academy, one of the prizes "for virtue" was awarded to her in November, 1899. Four years later, in June, 1903, she received one of the three civic crowns that are given, every year, by the Société d'Encouragement au bien, to men or women who have distinguished themselves by devotion to their fellow creatures. By degrees her story became known in England, Sweden, Germany, Holland and other countries; a number of celebrated philosophers or sociologists wrote to Larnay or came to visit the convent, but the attention of the outer world never disturbed Soeur Ste Marguerite's sweet humility.

She continued to work for her special charges, the blind deaf-mutes, striving to lighten their heavy cross and to make them in spite of their triple infirmity good, happy and useful members of society. Her long experience made her an authority on the subject and she continued to improve and develop the method that had proved so successful. Only last year two nuns from Canada were sent to Larnay to be trained by her for a similar work at home. But, although she looked incredibly young, although her courage never flagged, Soeur Ste Marguerite was wearing herself out in the service of her beloved pupils. A work like the one she had assumed demanded a ceaseless expenditure of physical strength as well as close mental effort. A year ago, she became ill, but she laughingly declined to modify her arduous task and when, only six days before the end, she felt death at hand, she made the sacrifice of her life with uncomplaining resignation and died, as she had lived, humbly and brightly, with a smile on her lips.

In the United States of America Marie Heurtin, of Larnay, has a sister in misfortune, Miss Helen Keller, but whereas the French girl was born deaf, dumb and blind, Miss Keller heard and saw till she was eighteen months old. Her education is more brilliant than that of Soeur Ste Marguerite's pupil, for she knows several languages and is a proficient in out-of-door sports; the task accomplished single-handed by the French nun was, in Miss Keller's case, divided between several devoted and efficient professors. In both cases we find the same quickness of perception and eagerness to learn on the part of the pupil. But, whereas Miss Keller is almost a public character in America, Marie Heurtin and her devoted mistress, now gone to her rest, were comparatively little known, even in France, where the fact of a noble task having been accomplished by a religious is sufficient to prevent any public recognition on the part of the anticlerical government.

The Wealth of Manchuria

SHANGHAI, MARCH 25, 1910.

During the latter part of February, a fine exhibition of native products took place in Kirin, capital of the central province of Manchuria. A short list of the articles exposed will give your readers a fair idea of the wealth of this corner of the Chinese Empire: tiger and leopard skins, white fox, sable, otter, squirrel, badger, beaver, ferret, wolf, wild dog, cat, bear, deer, sheep and lamb skins; gold dust, silver ore, pearls; ginseng, rice, wheat, barley, buckwheat, Indian corn, several varieties of millet, hemp, beans, bean cake and bean oil; tobacco of excellent quality, indigo, sesame seed and potatoes. All these bespeak a rich agricultural country, which would be much improved by further railway expansion and the introduction of foreign machinery, ploughs and modern agricultural implements. Among other valuable products are also wood, fruit and medicinal herbs. The oak, chestnut, elm, maple and poplar grow to a large size, and could well be exported to other parts of the Empire, but in China inter-provincial trade is little developed, highways that can lay claim to the title of good roads are rare, and likin barriers oppose an insurmountable obstacle to the expansion of trade.

The city of Kirin is a great industrial and trading centre and the head of steam navigation on the Sungari River. Two new steamers are now being built by the Government for the traffic on this river. Communication with Kuangchengtse on the South Manchurian railway line will also be soon established. When the Antung-Mukden Railway will be completed, Japan intends connecting Kirin with the Korean railway system, thereby gathering into her own barn the agricultural products mentioned above, i.e., the whole harvest of the finest and richest parts of Manchuria.

To induce foreigners, others than Russian or Japanese, to settle in Kirin, the Government is marking out the limits of an international settlement. It is situated outside the east wall and will be two miles in length by one broad. Offices of the Imperial Maritime Customs were opened in the city in the early part of the year. A Constitutional Assembly Hall is already erected and has cost 50,000 taels. Schools are being built with all possible haste and are largely attended. The students have imbibed the new patriotic spirit and show everywhere a marked hatred of Japan. Owing to their agitation, a boycott is still maintained against Japanese goods.

To resist the influx of foreign settlers in Manchuria, the Chinese Government has recently started an emigration movement, principally to the north and North-eastern parts of the country. In these regions, frontier towns are springing up with the mushroom rapidity of American cities in the Far West. Many places destroyed during the Boxer crisis have now a Chinese population three times as numerous as before. The Government encourages these settlers against Russia and Japan. They are generally reserve soldiers, and being trained to bear arms, will prove helpful in all cases of trouble with the new invading element. To enable them to settle quickly, a loan is advanced for traveling expenses, first sowing of seed and initial outlay. Within ten years, the emigrants have to pay to the Government all these advances. This emigration movement shows that China is wide awake to the danger and needs of the moment in Manchuria, and is firmly resolved to hold her own against all outsiders who may wish to settle within her frontiers and exploit her wealth for their own purposes. America has her racial and economic problems. The white race and labor must be protected against the "yellow peril." China, on the other side of the Pacific, is confronted with the same problems in Manchuria and puts into practice the lesson given by the States. With her internal weakness, her lack of organization, the "open door" imposed on her and the rivalry of the Powers, her position is difficult, and the least that should be granted her is benevolent encouragement, fair play and opportunity to develop her own resources for the benefit of her countless millions.

China's national finances have practically made no progress. Everywhere there is a lack of revenue to meet increased expenditure. The danger arising from over-issue of banknotes or circulation of paper-money without sufficient security behind it, is not yet remedied. Nobody knows exactly what are the issues and reserves of private banks. In November, two native banks in Hankow failed to the amount of several millions. Upon investigation, it was found that they belonged to the same family, who thus imposed upon the credulity of the public. The depreciation of copper currency—the universal money of the people—has caused much distress throughout the Empire, and injured trade, agriculture and labor. Unification in national currency and the adoption of a uniform silver dollar has not yet materialized. The necessity of reorganizing a national budget is platonically admitted, but the Government meets with much opposition in the provinces and seems to be powerless in securing compliance with its orders. Chinese officialdom little understands ordered accountancy, and generally discriminates little between the public and the private purse. Financial Commissioners are at present touring the provinces with the purpose of controlling all revenues, and when they have completed their task, the work of reorganization will begin in earnest.

What I Saw in Ireland

LOUGH REE, APRIL 23, 1910.

I crossed the Irish Sea late in March in the midst of a strong gale from the west that tossed our boat like a cork and sent the angry waves to dash upon the English coast like execrations from the "sister" isle. Every one went below and was consequently seasick except an American priest, who stood on deck, hanging on to a railing during the three hours' trip. By staying in the fresh air he escaped the common fate of the passengers. In Dublin my first visit was to the Hill of Howth, from which a splendid view of the neighboring scenery, south to the Wicklow Mountains, was obtained, and I had a chance to hear every wild singing bird in Ireland in solo and in chorus.

An eight-mile walk partly across and partly around the hill brought out firstly the best of all the singers, the Irish thrush. He is a tenor with a voice sweet and clear as a bugle. Perched on the branch of an elm tree with his face turned to the east, his tones sounded like a challenge. He seemed to say, "I defy, I defy, I defy," and then turning his face to the west he began to warble "come back, come back to the land that you left but that loves you still." Any one who has ever heard this grandest of all singing birds will remember how he changes his challenge to a melancholy warble as he closes his chants. Two sopranos from a meadow, two larks, were up singing in the sky, a rich barytone, a blackbird, was adding his sweet tones to the harmony, while chaffinches, bullfinches, goldfinches and linnets made a sweet chorus. I must not forget the little robin, everybody's friend, who sings even in the rain, flies out when he sees you on the road, goes into your garden, even into your room and sings for you; always cheerful, always happy.

There's a little scolding in his voice, too, for as I walked along the road he always seemed to say: "Well! how do you do? Welcome back! You ran away, but I am here still. It may rain or it may snow, but I'll stay here and have a pleasant chat with the people who remained loyal to this island and stayed behind."

After the birds on Howth I noticed the children in Dublin, and from there to the Shannon, where I am penning these lines. They have all red cheeks, every one of them; but so have the people, young and old, with hardly an exception. "Has that big policeman red whiskers?" I said to a friend in the streets of Dublin, and I pointed to a big fellow fully six feet, five inches. The Dublin police are all giants. "Nonsense," said my friend, "it's his cheeks that are red." And they were as red as two Oregon apples. From the little urchin in the streets, in town and in country, to the young women and the old, to the young men and to the old, it is the same clear skin and red cheeks.

"Is it tuberculosis?" I asked my friend, a learned gentleman who has lived in Dublin forty years. Again he said: "Nonsense! You have got that foolish idea from some of those who have been exaggerating in speaking and writing of the spread of consumption in Ireland. Those fresh, rosy cheeks come from the simple food, the purity of the people, and the genial climate of Ireland. The hot sun in summer and the intense cold in winter thicken the skin of you Americans. You know you have too much cheek anyhow, and the blood does not show through it. But in Ireland the bloom of the rose and the sweetness of the Shamrock appear in the faces of our children and people."

I could not argue with him, for he is a poet and a theologian. I think he is right. At any rate the universally red cheeks are no sign of tuberculosis in Ireland. "Is it the punch?" No! Because the cheeks are redder among the peasants of Meath and amongst the clergy of Meath than anywhere else; and yet total abstinence is widespread among priests and people. In fact in the Diocese of Meath, there is a law, called the ante-dinner law which makes it a case of suspension for a priest to taste whiskey, brandy, gin or liqueur before dinner. And although the clerical dinner is usually at 4 P.M., I never heard the joke about what the Governor of North Carolina said to the Governor of South Carolina in any of the clerical houses I visited from Dublin through Meath, Westmeath and Longford to the Shannon. In fact the total abstinence on a cold, rainy day was sometimes painful but I never saw any one break it. So the red cheeks are due to the causes alleged by my friend.

Then I visited the schools. I'll say a word only of the primary schools. Of course, I saw Maynooth with its seven hundred seminarians, and All Hallows with its two hundred; then many of the training schools. But the primary schools interested me most. In Dublin I heard in the church at Fairview near Clontarf, the best boys' choir I ever listened to. They sang on Holy Thursday and Easter Sunday, voices clear and sweet, time perfect, unison complete and trained by the Christian Brothers in their elementary schools. Passing through the country from little parish to little parish, I found every school flourishing. The Government supports the Catholic schools and the priests absolutely control them. Score one for the liberality of the English Government. You could not puzzle the little boys or girls in Catechism. I tried it. They are talented, they study hard and they are anxious to learn. They learn Gaelic in every school; and sing sweetly Gaelic songs. The teachers are usually in the small parishes laymen and laywomen, good, fervent Catholics cooperating in everything with the parish priest.

And he is a worker. Run through the country everywhere. You will find the old church of the days of persecution replaced by a beautiful new stone building of good architecture, furnished with costly marble altars and mosaic floors. Go to the old town of Trim on the Boyne and see the grand granite columns and the stained glass windows in the church there; pass over to Kildalky or to Summerhill; or farther on to Kinnegad in Westmeath, or to this spot on the Shannon on the borders of Roscommon, once a very poor district and see what costly churches are going up all over the country. This is the age of the Irish "Renaissance." May it continue!

Yet the people emigrate still. Even the Protestants are going away. Where there used to be fifty of them in a Leinster country parish, there are now not half a dozen. They have not emigrated, they have simply died out. I went the other day into the Protestant church at Clonard, the site of one of the most famous monasteries in Ireland during the golden age before the Danish invasion, and saw in that church an old Catholic baptistery of the eighth century. It is a beautiful work of art and is in the wrong place. But it cannot be bought. Although the Protestant congregation there has died out to a few poor hangers-on, the authorities hold tenaciously to the relic and still call the Catholic Church "a foreign Church;" and they still call the dwindling little sect of Anglicans in Ireland "the Church of Ireland!" A document before me proves all this. When will man fully deserve the title of rational animal conferred on him by our philosophy and our theology?

Socialists on Parade

An accommodating municipality gave the residents on Fifth avenue an opportunity of witnessing a parade of Socialists last Saturday. Numerous placards and banners bore eloquent descriptions—mostly in Hebrew characters—of the misery of the poor and of the grinding heels of capitalistic tyranny. But the paraders failed ignominiously to live up to their rôle. They all appeared to be more cheerful than most of the property owners who paused to watch them. One well-dressed gentleman, apparently a member of that race that has lived in every nation of the earth without ever mingling with any, kept up a running harangue, along the whole line of march, on the meaning of true patriotism. But his denunciation of the present American type of patriotism was bitter only in words. His soul did not seem to be harrowed into small flinders over his wrongs. Milwaukee was trumpeted up and down Fifth avenue as a true Socialist city.

The only disquieting feature of the parade was the large number of women who participated in it. History, of course, does not have to repeat itself always; and, if the presence of crowds of women in the streets has always been in the past a sign of trouble, it does not necessarily follow that the same thing need be true now. It would require an effort of the imagination to transform the orderly and well-dressed women in Saturday's parade into citoyennes, leading mobs and jeering after tumbrils. Still we regret, firstly, the misdirected philanthropy of a small class of wealthy American women in teaching their foreign-born sisters among the poor to lay aside womanly modesty and reticence in order to become public "agitators;" and, secondly, the selfishness of employers—of the same race, for the most part, as that of their Socialistic workmen—who discourage the characteristic virtues of womanhood by taking advantage of them for commercial profit.

The Use of Decoys

The daily papers announce the success of the prosecuting attorney of New York in obtaining evidence that proves the existence of what is called the white slave traffic. The evidence at the same time, if the announcements are true, will purge society of the monsters engaged in the vile commerce of trading in young souls.

While the official gentlemen, concerned in the business of uncovering and stamping out the crawling secrecies of our civic life, have our complete sympathy in their honest aims, we cannot entertain the same whole-hearted approval of their methods. It is declared that they employed two graduates of colleges for girls in order to trap the criminals. One of these women is described as being young and beautiful and as having won the entire confidence of the low creatures whom the law had employed her to decoy. The circumstance is revolting. It leaves one in doubt whether the remedy has not been worse than the cure.

There is an old Latin proverb to the effect that a hard knot needs a hard tool. Someone has to be engaged in the unwholesome duty of laying crime bare and bringing it to justice. But we deprecate most earnestly this use of young women by criminal prosecutors. They should not be allowed, much less commissioned, to touch pitch. It leaves a stain on them. It is, moreover, a sort of official sanction of the sociological classes in large universities, in which young ladies find excuses for visiting slums and night-courts and satisfying a curiosity that is not above criticism; and, finally, we believe the State weakens its own power and dignity by thus shocking and alienating the sympathy of all decent and sensible citizens.

New Wine in Old Bottles

To those who are neither Catholics nor Papist-haters Catholicism appears as one of the most interesting problems in the world. While they do not recognize its Divine origin and character, which alone explains its history, past and present, they find Catholicism different from any other human system. If they move in the sacred circle of what is called par excellence "society," they cannot help noticing how the real Catholics they meet therein, albeit enjoying all the legitimate diversions of the select few, have a certain aloofness about them that tells of only partial acquiescence in the first principles of the social world, and of deep underlying doubts as to the whole catalogue of social exigencies being really worth the absorbing attention of immortal souls. If these non-Catholic observers are philosophically inclined, if they are in any sense independent thinkers, they remark the very exceptional atmosphere of certainty, not aggressive cocksureness, but quiet, unobtrusive certitude that envelops the true Catholic. He does not, like the rest of cogitative mankind, lie awake at night expecting some great intellectual and moral upheaval that will completely revolutionize the traditional processes of reasoning and the fundamental bases of morality. Being the only heir of all the ages, descending from a family that has passed unscathed through heresies innumerable and revolutions more and more irrational, he views with long-suffering pity the vagaries of the helpless victims of that ignorant slavery which cloaks its sciolism under the high-sounding name of freethought.

Society people as thinkers are, unfortunately, a small minority. Towards them gravitate, as planets and comets around the sun, a host of minor, frivolous stars for whom all things Catholic are a fit subject of ridicule. They childishly blaspheme what they know not. Unwittingly conscious of the unapproachable majesty and vitality of the Catholic Church, which they are powerless to impugn, they take refuge in the impotency of an infantile sneer. They besmirch what they cannot controvert. A syndicate of vile publications has been for years exploiting the similarity between "monkey" and "monk," rejoicing in its degradation of humanity merely because that degradation is supposed to affect the monastic orders, whereas it disgraces only that part of the human race which abjectly believes, on insufficient evidence, that its ancestors were apes. Advertisements of drinking monks are as common as they are contemptible. But it was reserved for a widely-circulated and fashionable illustrated weekly of New York, in its issue of April 9, to recommend a brand of champagne by means of a highly colored, full-page advertisement which is a reproduction of a picture representing four bishops, two monsignori and one cowed abbot drinking, in that identical champagne, the health of the chef who bowingly acknowledges their good wishes. Of course, the seven prelates have double chins and beaming faces. But one silently wonders if the artist and the advertiser have not stupidly overreached themselves. Who will buy that champagne solely because the much-maligned clergy are supposed to like it?

Eucharistic Congress Stamps.

Many priests in this country have lately received a circular signed by P. N. Breton, who heads his typewritten communication "Official Commemorative Stamps, 21st International Eucharistic Congress, Montreal, Canada, 6 to 11 September, 1910," calls himself "Organizer" and gives his address as 215 West St. Catherine St., Montreal. He encloses one hundred Eucharistic Congress stamps for which he demands one dollar by return mail. That he has no authority for such a proceeding is made clear by the following really "Official Communication," explicitly so styled by the General Secretary of the Montreal Eucharistic Congress:

"MONTREAL, 25th April, 1910.

"Owing to the fact that many have asked for information about the Congress Stamps and the dailies have taken the matter up, we deem it our duty to declare officially that the issue of those stamps is a purely private undertaking and that the General Committee has absolutely nothing to do with it. The idea may be all right and the originator's intentions excellent, but no such scheme has had our official sanction. It may not be amiss to mention here that several parties have asked our authorization to get out guides, solicit advertisements and manufacture and sell various articles such as medals, pictures, etc., on the occasion of the Congress. We have given no such authorization. As far as the Committee is concerned, the Official Guide and the Commemorative Medal alone have received our approval and they will be ready in the course of a few weeks. Other schemes may be encouraged, such as the stamps in question, but at the sole risk of the purchaser.

THE GENERAL SECRETARY."

P. N. Breton's circular concludes by offering to secure lodgings and board with good families for visitors to the Congress. In this also he is clearly unauthorized. But his action suggests that this question of accommodation for clerical visitors should be taken up officially by the General Committee. Provision has, we understand, been made for entertaining the higher clergy, such as bishops and prelates, and no doubt the accommodation for them will be ample; but where shall the many hundred priests expected at the Congress, and yet having no acquaintances among the Montreal clergy, find suitable lodgings? Perhaps this difficulty, which considerably exercises American priests intending to take part in the Congress, has already been examined and overcome by the very thoughtful and skilful organizers; but if so, we hope we may receive official notice of proposed arrangements, so as to let them be widely known to all the clergy as early as possible.

The Masonic Conspiracy

M. Valentin Brifaut, advocate of the Court of Appeal of Brussels, Belgium, writes to AMERICA, directing attention to the recent efforts at a closer union between the Grand Orient of France and Masonic lodges all over the world. "This question," he says, "is becoming more and more a live one throughout Europe. Catholics are beginning to perceive that the centre of all anti-Christian activity is to be sought nowhere else than in Freemasonry . . . the object of which is to wipe Christianity out of the world and even to destroy all Christian civilization." To those who object that in North America at least this question is unimportant, he replies that this is a great mistake, which he had occasion to point out more than once during five months which he spent in 1904 traveling over the United States with a view to observing the tactics and influence of American Freemasons. He mani-tains that the essential principles of Freemasonry are the same in Protestant as in Catholic countries. The only difference is the period of evolution. Time will reveal the secret evolution of Protestant Freemasonry. Referring to Mr. Roosevelt's recent reception by the Mayor of Rome, he writes that this "proves how urgent it is to remove from all men of good faith in your country the illusion under which they have fallen and thanks to which in America and England Freemasonry, by its influence on the movement of ideas, will make possible the evolution toward paganism and anarchy of countries hitherto so deeply impregnated with Catholicism. For how can we explain that Mr. Roosevelt, himself so Christian, so convinced of the necessity of religion and of the forces it represents in the cause of social order, should have strayed into the company of a fanatic like Mr. Nathan, who is not only anti-Clerical in the ordinary sense but a militant anti-Christian Jew, a natural son of Mazzini, who destroyed the temporal power of the Popes, that pet scheme of Freemasonry and its first step toward the complete destruction of the Papacy and Catholicism. Nathan-Mazzini and Mr. Roosevelt have ideals that are as the poles asunder. How explain their hobnobbing except through Mr. Roosevelt's ignorance of the true rôle of Freemasonry in Europe and in the whole world."

A similar warning appeared in the London Tablet of March 26. Under the heading, "Freemasonry and the Church," Father Herman Gruber, S.J., of Feldkirch, Austria, writes to the editor, describing the various unitive efforts between the Grand Orient of France and the German lodges, efforts which have been momentarily stopped owing to the reaction produced by incisive articles of Germania which alarmed the Prussian Government. Father Gruber adds: "The event is of the greatest importance also for English-speaking Catholics. For if the closer union of the Grand Orient with the German Grand lodges should be accomplished, the union also of the Grand Orient with the British and American would follow, or at least partially and practically be realized. And this would be very dangerous for the generalization of the French Kulturkampf throughout the whole world. Think of the Ferrer agitation. I wonder that the foreign press has so little seized this aspect of the matter."

The Archaic Jest

Searchers into ancient folk-lore are struck by the perpetual recurrence of the same popular jests amongst peoples most widely separated in place, time and manners. Like the Greek peasants and fishers, men and women, who, as Kipling feigns, marked Homer's plagiarisms, they are constantly hearing old tales turn up again, but do not, like them, keep it quiet. While one is chuckling over something good in the comic paper they hasten to tell him that the same joke is being retailed for the millionth time in the shadows of some Chinese tea-garden or in an Indian bazaar, or under the palms of the southern sea. It has shaken the sides, say they, of Pharaoh sitting on his throne and of the handmaid behind the mill. It has stirred unquenchable laughter around the camp fires before Troy, and has rejoiced the souls of bystanders when Nimrod returned sometimes empty-handed from the chase. Most persistent of the things of earth it will continue when we are dead and gone, as long as the world endures. Much energy was most laudably bestowed in the months just past to destroy the fable of the Pope and the Comet; and some, more sanguine than sage, have flattered themselves that it has been laid low forever. Not a bit of it. It died as the phoenix dies: it disappeared as do the seventeen-year locusts. When 1985 comes around it will revive in full vigor and our grandchildren will have to slay it again. But this is an example, not so much of the recurring jest, as of the recurrent lie. There is an ancient jest of the schools, for even these have their times of relaxation, which pretends that metaphysicians dispute as to how many angels can dance on a needle's point. It is not a witticism of the first water, but its pith consists in this, that, as angels are spirits, they do not occupy space neither can they dance. Still it is handed down from generation to generation to move the genial laugh. Unfortunately it sometimes finds its way out from the porch and the grove and wanders as far as the editorial rooms of the modern newspaper, where the editor receives it gravely as an historic fact, and proceeds to animadvert solemnly upon the futility of scholastic philosophy. Some people cannot see a joke. Sometimes this is the fault of the joke, but sometimes it is due to their own limitations.

In an issue of AMERICA in December last we had occasion to say a word regarding one manner in which Catholic fraternal organizations can exercise in a practical manner their power for good. A communication received last week from Emporia, Kansas, is our excuse for touching the topic again. Two years ago, it tells us, Leo Council, Knights of Columbus, of that town presented the Kansas State Normal School with a set of "The Catholic Encyclopedia." The motive of the gift was to place at the disposal of the teachers of the future, this great storehouse of learning and information. Consultation of the work by the students, it was thought, would overcome many prejudices against the Church and correct some of the false notions regarding its history and mission. The action of the Leo Council was so much appreciated by the faculty and students of the school, that the Knights have recently purchased a second set, as a gift for the Carnegie Library of the town. This is the public library and is used by the High School students, many Normal students, professional men and the general public. The communication needs no comment; the practical regard it shows for Catholic interests is convincing evidence of the manner in which the organization loyally strives to fulfill one aspect of its mission.

"BY THE WATERS OF BABYLON"

From one point of view there is not much variety about the "cases" that come to our parish Conference of St. Vincent de Paul. The vast majority of them fall under one or other of a very few heads. Husband dead, deserter, incurably sick, or a drunkard, covers most of them. Sometimes there is a genuine "hard luck" and a fair sprinkling of plain "old age" in the number. Nevertheless, in spite of the sameness of causes, every case has its own peculiar interest when you come to know about it, for to the normal man everything is interesting that has happened to somebody else. But once in a while we develop something unusual in an ordinary-looking piece of misfortune—well, perhaps it is not so very unusual after all, but here are the facts:

One night, some months ago, the President reported a new case: Patrick and Mary McCarthy, — West —th street. On our visit Sheridan and I found an aged couple (seventy-five and seventy-three years respectively) in a four-room flat. Food and fuel were needed. Neither could possibly work by reason of age, and the woman was crippled with rheumatism and her heart so badly affected that she might die at any moment. It was a case for relief of a temporary character, and then the Home as an ultimate solution. We did not mention the latter on the first visit, but agreed about it on the sidewalk when we came out. The sexton came along while we were talking and, just to make conversation, we told him about the case. He displayed considerable interest.

"That's quare," he said; "I buried a man from that place six months ago and McCarthy paid the bill. His name was James Fitzgerald. He lived with them two, and McCarthy said he must have a grave of his very own and there was a requiem Mass at the church. The two of them was at the funeral and went to the cemetery with him. He was a fine-looking man. He died of pneumonia, and Dr. Molloy attended him and gave the certificate. McCarthy said he was fifty-five years old. They'll have to go to the Home of course. 'Tis a hard endin'. Well, the Lord knows best, and He'll even things up somehow or other."

At our next meeting we found that our problem had been cut precisely in half, for the sexton reported that Mary McCarthy had died suddenly that day and that Patrick was half-crazed at the thought that she might be buried as a pauper. He said that for forty dollars she could be decently laid away in a grave of her own with a name-plate on the coffin and a hearse to the cemetery—all in good style, and he didn't want any profit on it. We keep a member on our rolls, who has more money than he needs—or ought to have, for just such occasions, so we taxed him the forty dollars and were instructed to inform Patrick that everything would be done properly, including a Mass at the church. We were likewise instructed to tell him that he could go to the Home at the end of the week. All which we did that night as Mary McCarthy lay dead on the bed in the flat—she had a very sweet face, the poor old woman!

Patrick agreed to go to the Home on Saturday. On Friday, the day after the funeral, I happened to pass the house where he lived and something impelled me to go in. I found the place dismantled. He had an old wooden trunk open on the floor and was putting into it some odds and ends of his own, half a dozen books, some portraits, and so on. On the top of the pile a large photograph caught my eye. It represented a big white house standing on a hill half hidden by trees. Written on it in plain characters was "Kilbeggan House, 1876." I do not, as a rule, suffer from intuitions, but at that moment I had one and yielded to it.

"Mr. McCarthy," I said, "pardon my curiosity, but—tell me about that," and I pointed to the photograph.

He took it off the pile, looked hard at it and came over to where I sat.

"That's the back of the house," he said, "looking down the hill to the river. Here was the dining room—these four windows—next to that the drawing room an' then the billiard room. You can't see the other rooms to the right, for the trees hide them. The master's rooms were there, an' the young master's. There was the young ladies' rooms on the next floor, an' the young gentlemen had the rooms over the billiard room an' at the front of the house. The chapel was at the other end, beyond the young master's room an' to the front of the house where the drive came in."

"'Twas a gran' place, Kilbeggan House," the old man went on. "The master bought it in 1840, after he came home with his wife an' his fortune made. There was three hundred acres an' the river through it, an' he had flower gardens an' fruit gardens, an' green-houses—acres of them. He had twenty horses in his stable an' a four-in-hand an' all sorts of carriages, an' a coachman an' two grooms an' half a score of stable-boys. An' he had a dairy an' fine cattle an' sheep, too. 'Twas a great place for the gentry, an' they was in an' out of it every day. The hounds would meet with us twice a year anyway, an' there'd be a hunt breakfast. The day the young master was married we served the wedding breakfast on the lawn in the front of the house in a big tent, an' that night there was twenty-five people slept in the house after the dance besides the family."

"There was eighteen of us in the house—I had two footmen under me—to say nothing of the coachman an' the grooms, an' every New Year's day there was the servants' ball, an' the young ladies an' gentlemen came down to dance with us in the servants' hall. The mistress died in 1870, when the master was sixty years old. The young master was married in 1863, an' for ten years after that we had a wedding every year except one, when Miss Honoria went to be a nun. Twelve children there was—seven of them boys. First I was stable-boy, then groom, then footman, an' in 1873 I was made the butler. I was thirty-eight years old then. Mary—God rest her soul—an' I had the Lodge to live in, an' we'd buried three children. Our two oldest girls were near grown up an' they were in the dairy. The next year all the young ladies an' gentlemen was married an' gone but Master James, the youngest, but the grandchildren was beginnin' to run about the place, an' the Master was never easy unless he'd some of the family about him."

"Master James was eighteen then an' a terrible wild boy, but there was no harm in him, at all at all, just innocent devilment. He had hard words with the master because he didn't want to study for the Bar but would be all the time huntin', an' fishin', an' playing games an' what not. He was a gran' young man, six foot high, as straight as an arrow an' strong as a horse, an' he could do anything—sing like a bird an' play the piano, an' ride like the old boy himself! He used to come an' coax me to give him the master's gun to shoot rabbits an' wood-pigeons with, an' I'd give it to him, though 'twas against my orders. There was no better man at the sport the country round, whatever it was!

"In 1876 he came of age an' him an' the master had a quarrel. He told me 'twas over a girl the master wanted him to marry an' he wouldn't, an' he went away to America. After he went away the master talked about sellin' the place an' going to England, because he had the gout an' the doctor said the climate didn't suit him, an' I got letters from Master James tellin' me to come to America; that 'twas a grand country to live in an' easy to get rich in, an' he'd take care of us."

"We had a bit of money saved between us, an' the master's talk of sellin' the place decided us to go. So we did. When we got to New York Master James was in the West somewhere. He wrote to me he was makin' his fortune. So we looked about a bit and took a house and kept boarders an' we did well enough. At last Master James came to New York to live—'twas in 1884, the year we bought the house we were in. 'I've made my pile, Patrick,' he says, 'an' I'm going into Wall Street,' he says. 'Where's the mistress, Master James?' says I; 'tis cheatin' some fine girl ye are not marryin' her,' says I. He just laughed an' said 'What's the hurry?' But the very next year he married—she was a Protestant, but a fine, good woman—and he made Mary an' me come an' keep his house.

"I was butler an' she was housekeeper. There was great times for a while! But in two years she was dead an' her first child dead with her, an' the same year Master James he got word that the old master was dead, too, an' the place sold. He told me to keep the house for him an' he went back to the old country an' was gone two years or more. When he came back he told me the family was all scattered and three of them was dead, the young master among them. 'The place is gone to rack an' ruin, Patrick,' he says. 'The man that has it is stablin' his horses in the servants' hall,' he says, 'an' the gardens is all overgrown with weeds,' he says, 'an' I don't ever want to see it again,' he says. I cried when he told me about it.

"A couple of years he lived alone in the house, with me an' Mary keepin' it for him. He had his friends to come an' play cards with him, an' they'd be at it all night, an' they'd drink—but Master James was no drinker for the drink's sake; he'd just do it to be sociable. Then in 1893 there was some trouble in Wall street an' Master James lost a lot of money. He had to sell the house an' Mary an' I went back to keepin' boarders—we knew how to do it well an' had no trouble.

"Master James went West again an' was gone seven years. I know he was in Alaska some of the time. He came back in 1901, an' he had a pile made again an' he went down to Wall street with it. Two years after 'twas all gone again. This time he didn't go West. He came to board with us. 'All I want is a little capital, Patrick,' he says 'an' I'll get it all back.' Mary an' I mortgaged the house for ten thousand dollars—we'd paid eighteen thousand for it—an' we made Master James take the money. In a year we had it back again, but then it went again, and Master James broke his heart over it. An' in the winter of 1907 he had typhoid fever an' was three months in hospital. He had the best there was. We sold the house."

The old man stopped a moment. I studied the photograph critically for some seconds. He went on:

"Then the luck went against us. Mary got rheumatic fever an' we had to give up the boarders, an' whatever we did 'twas no use."

Again he stopped and took the photograph from me. "He's dead now. Lord have mercy on him an' Mary, too! Anyway, we took good care of him while we had him."

He looked long and hard at the photograph.

"They were gran' days when we had Kilbeggan and Master James was a boy. The Lord knows where they all are now, an' if 't wasn't for this picture I'd think sometimes it was nothin' but a dream. But see now, there's the steps he used to run down to go fishin' in the river. An' to see him serve the Mass in the chapel when we had the priest in the house! An' to hear him sing 'Oh! Ireland is my country an' my name is Pat Molloy!' The old days an' the old house an' them all gone! Oh, 'twas different from this."

He threw it in the trunk with a heavy sigh. It was time to go. But though I knew in advance what the answer would be, I couldn't help asking the question: "What was the family name, Mr. McCarthy?"

"Fitzgerald, sir! The old master's name was Hugh Fitzgerald."

As I went away I thought of the Psalmist's wail: "By the waters of Babylon there we sat down and wept when we remembered thee, O Sion!"

LITERATURE

Ireland, A Popular History for Young People. Edited by R. BARRY O'BRIEN. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 1s. 6d. net.

The War in Wexford. By H. F. B. WHEELER and A. M. BROADLEY. New York and London: John Lane Co.

A History of the Irish Parliamentary Party. By F. HUGH O'DONNELL. New York and London: Longmans, Green & Co. $5.00 net.

The publication of these books by London houses at a time when Ireland is the parliamentary topic of the hour and the pivot of British politics, shows that publishers are keen to launch their wares on the flood-tide that leads to fortune. Mr. Barry O'Brien's "Ireland" is a reprint of an historical primer which he compiled and edited for the Children's Study series in 1896. Prefacing that it is not a history but "rather an elementary sketch which may stimulate the reader to take up worthier works on the subject," he groups the facts of each period around some central figure, beginning with St. Patrick and ending with O'Connell, and thus succeeds in investing his story with dramatic interest. One could find fault with his sense of proportion—Irish schools and missionaries get but one page while the Tithe-War has thirty, and Catholic interests receive frugal treatment—but into the 330 pages at his disposal he packs a vast amount of solid information with the accuracy of the historian and the skill and lure of the romancer. Fisher Unwin has done well in re-issuing this handy book.

Messrs. Wheeler & Broadley devote a large volume to what Barry O'Brien tells better in sixteen pages. Their excuse is that while "the eyes of travelers and politicians are alike directed to Ireland" and the short Fishguard and Ross-lare route invites them to Wexford, the discovery of three new contemporary manuscripts about the Wexford war of 1798 should procure a welcome for their book. The discovery will not add much to the travelers' knowledge. One is the diary of an ungrammatical and biased old lady who was in the custody of the rebels for three weeks and belabors them soundly though they did her no harm; while Lord Mount-norris's Correspondence and the Day-book of the Camolin Yeomanry are only interesting in as far as they confirm unwittingly what history records of the brutalities of officers and soldiery in '98. The fact that the writers consider Froude a fairly impartial historian determines the value of their views. The book is admirably illustrated, is well supplied with maps, index and biographical notes, and has a very valuable bibliography; but compared with works on the period by Kavanagh, Madden, Lecky and Barrington and Barry O'Brien's "Wolfe Tone," it is partial and inadequate.

Mr. O'Donnell's work is not a history, but a series of venomous invectives against the party to which he belonged till his egotism had made him impossible; and with every wail is sandwiched a paean on himself. Its proper title would be "The work, worth and woes of F. Hugh O'Donnell, in two volumes, by himself." It is written in good style and gives evidence of much ability and wide knowledge, but none of judgment or mental poise. Liberals, Tories, O'Connellites, Fenians, Parnellites, Anti-Parnellites, Irish-Americans are in the wrong, all of them some time and most of them all the time—everybody except the Irish landlords and F. Hugh O'Donnell. He looks down with lofty contempt on the Irish members, several of them men of distinguished lineage, who though honest and talented are unfit to associate with one who holds social relations with dukes and dignitaries and is a kinsman of the Duke of Tetuan and other titled O'Donnells. His own impressive portrait of twenty years ago is the frontispiece of the first volume, and the rather plebeian features of the Duke of Tetuan adorn the second, though it happens that their kinship is no nearer than that of one Smith with another.

He condescended to teach the obstruction policy to Mr. Biggar and Mr. Parnell, but "outside of the furtherance of my policy it was impossible for me to have an enjoyable conversation with either of them or with both." Neither could discuss with him "Greece and Rome, the French Salon or the British Academy, the Renaissance and the Revolution, the tragic muse of Dante or the voix d'or of Sarah Bernhardt. I lived on the contrary with the finest flower of the intellectuality of three capitals. What on earth, outside of the policy, had I to do with an unlettered squreling and a rugged provincial tradesman?" Parnell spoiled "my policy" and everything else, until the divorce proceeding set him right, and he finally failed only because he rejected Mr. O'Donnell's advice. National self-government is necessary for Ireland but the people are unfit, the Party is unfit, the priests are unfit, none has capacity for it except a few landlords and Mr. O'Donnell of London.

Le Catholicisme au Japon, Vol. I, S. François Xavier et ses premiers Successeurs, 1540-93; Vol. II, L'Ere des Martyrs, 1593-1660, par L. DELPLACE, S.J. Bruxelles, Librairie Albert Dewit.

Father Delplace is not the first Jesuit to write the history of the Church in Japan. In 1689 Father Crassel published "L'histoire de l'Eglise du Japon" in two volumes, and in 1736 Father Charlevoix a work in nine volumes on the "Histoire et Description du Japon," of which six and a half are devoted to the Church. These two works, along with the letters of St. Francis Xavier, "whom all the Japanese know and of whom they are proud," the government of Japan has of late years caused to be printed in the language of the country. The present work differs from the foregoing ones in the method employed in its composition; a large place is given to the letters of the missionaries. Father Delplace has been judicious in his selection. The picture he presents of the hopes, trials and desolation of the Church in Japan is very vivid and full of interest.

The question of the resemblances and differences of Christianity and the religions of Japan has been discussed now for centuries. Bartoli attributes the resemblances to the devil, who used them to confuse and distort men's minds; Charlevoix thinks them due to the influence of heretical Christians from Syria or Armenia in the sixth century, Nestorians perhaps. Missionaries of to-day are inclined to follow the opinion of Charlevoix. "The present state of things in Japan gives us an idea of the past. The contact with Christian and European ideas has caused Japanese Buddhism to undergo a change profounder than any it has hitherto suffered. Superstitious and puerile practices are on the eve of disappearance, and soon nothing but pantheism will be left, clothed in the transcendentalism of German philosophy."

After treating of St. Francis Xavier in the first chapter and of his successors in the following chapters of the first volume, Father Delplace passes to the most delicate part of his task—the persecutions. Before entering upon it he lays down his principles. History is a lesson, a light, testis temporum, lux veritatis, as Cicero called it. We go to the past in quest of light for the future. In his letter on historical studies Leo XIII wrote of the historian "ne quid falsi dicere audeat, ne quid veri non audeat." What, then, was the cause of the persecutions in Japan, the principal cause, for there were several, as we shall see? The brief of Gregory XIII, "ex pastoralis officio," had reserved the mission of Japan to the Society of Jesus and forbade other religious to enter under pain of major excommunication. Spanish Franciscans from the Philippines, in their zeal for the Faith, but not from a zeal secundum scientiam, insisted on entering the mission and working there. They regarded the brief as a forgery; troubles arose and finally bloody persecution, which peopled heaven with glorious martyrs but utterly ruined the prospects of the Church in Japan and closed that country to the civilized world for over two centuries.

As is known, the Holy See follows to-day the principles which guided Gregory XIII in forming his decision. To each Order, to some province even of the same Order, a whole mission is confided. As the number of the faithful increases divisions and subdivisions are made, so that a uniform direction is assured.

Father Delplace treats this whole question well; the faults of a few are not laid down to the Order of which they were members. Expressions such as "the intriguing, indefatigable commercial agent," "the blue-blooded Sotelo," "new Cains," are foreign to his work. Documents are quoted in support of his assertions. The influence, too, of English and Dutch traders is also accounted for. The General of the Jesuits had, with few exceptions, sent only Portuguese to Japan. With the presence of the Spaniards from the Philippines the English and the Dutch, moved alike by national and religious prejudice, easily found a means of arousing Japanese suspicions. The Spaniards were more enterprising than the Portuguese; they even hoped to subdue Japan as they had the Philippines. The Jesuits wrote to Philip II that such a desire was utterly vain; that Japan could never be subdued and that 300,000 men could be put in the field by them at the shortest notice. The English and Dutch were heard; Japan was alarmed and persecution triumphed.

Father Delplace devotes some final pages to modern Japan. Unhappily, material progress has not been accompanied by spiritual awakening; materialism and low moral ideas have nothing to stop them as in Christian countries. Japan has been civilized, not Christianized, and has no protection against the Socialism of to-day. A few have seen the dangers and realized that religion is necessary for a country's welfare. May their number increase. At this time, when the Society of Jesus has just returned to its former mission in Japan, Father Delplace's work comes well to hand.

A Nautical Knot, or The Belle of Barnstapole. Operetta by MAUD ELIZABETH INCH and WILLIAM RHYS-HERBERT. New York: J. Fischer & Bro.

Mr. Rhys-Herbert has been composing part-songs for men's voices quite successfully, and has arranged many old airs—English, Irish, Negro, for quartets. His mind is evidently full of these olden melodies, for most of the songs in this operetta are founded on memories which stick out very boldly at times. Some of the songs are pretty, rather catchy, good for amateur organizations and school societies.

To exemplify, "I Love to Stroll," has a chorus that runs for three or more measures like an old song, "Erin on the Rhine," we believe the title is; "Love's Full of Joy," begins like "Say Not Goodbye"; "'Tis Then I'll Think of Thee" is beyond doubt built upon a song whose title and composer we cannot recall, although some of the words and verses we can remember; and finally, as a climax, "In Sunny Spain" is so decidedly imitative of Trotere's "In Old Madrid" with a chorus that is second cousin to "Esmeralda," that one is constrained to conclude that this was purposely modelled after those once favorite compositions.

Among the songs that are quite pretty are Julia's solo, "I Love to Stroll," Nance's "Love's Full of Joy," the waltz "Love that Tarries" in the first act; while in the second, there are the "Flower Song," a waltz; "Sunny Spain," and "Arm in Arm We'll Walk on Sundays." The work of the publishers, as usual, is well done and leaves nothing to be desired.

Die Geschichte der Jesuiten in Portugal unter der Staatsverwaltung des Marquis von Pombal. Porto Alegre, Typographia do Centro.

The author's name is not given, but his vivid descriptions and minute knowledge of facts, as well as the testimony of the publishers, prove that he was an eye-witness. The accuracy of the narrative is borne out by the latest publications on this subject based on official documents found in the archives of Lisbon and other European capitals. The book was first published in Nürnberg, in 1787, by Christoph Gottlieb von Murr, a Protestant scholar of no little name in his day, who was in correspondence with many Jesuits and learned men of all nations. He says of himself: "As an impartial Protestant, as a defender of the rights of humanity, as a sworn enemy of all oppression, and as an admirer of great merit for learning . . . I find it an agreeable pastime to publish useful knowledge about renowned Jesuits." The work as it comes to us has been revised and improved by J. B. Hafkemeyer, S.J. Its strikingly interesting narrative and its short but thorough refutation of the calumnies spread by Pombal make it a welcome addition to our knowledge of a sad period of the history of the Church in Portugal. The Young Man's Guide. Counsels, Reflections and Prayers for Catholic Young Men. By REV. F. X. LASANCE. New York: Benziger Brothers. Price, 75 cents and $1.25.

A glance at the contents tells us that the ground is well covered, for a young man will find in the compact little volume advice upon about every point that may concern him. The simple, straightforward way of putting things is not the least of the book's merits. The sane and sober manner in which such topics as Politics and Temperance are treated appeals to any thoughtful person. Every word of Part Second conveys its lesson to our youth. For boys who leave school early Father Lasance's little book will serve admirably to bridge the gap between boyhood and manhood.

Bibliothèque des Exercices de saint Ignace. No. 25. La Pratique des Exercices dans l'ancienne Mission du Maduré par le P. LÉON BESSE, S.J.—No. 26. Sacra Tempe, seu de Sacro Exercitiorum Secessu Exempla Collecta a Petro Manrique, Hispano. Enghien (Belgique) Bibliothèque des Exercices; Paris, Lethielleux; Rheims, Action Populaire.

The first of these booklets, No. 25 of a series of studies and documents concerning the Exercises, gives an interesting account of the fruit reaped from them amongst the converts of Southern India in the eighteenth century, and is full of instruction for missionaries, whether at home or abroad. The second, No. 26, of the same series, consists of a number of examples of spiritual profit gained from the retreat, even though necessity restricted it to but one day. The personality of the author is not certain. The editor, however, holds the more probable opinion that Pedro Manrique is no more than a pseudonym of Father William Bathe, an Irish Jesuit of the first century of the Society, concerning whom one can learn more from Father Edmund Hogan's well-known book, "Distinguished Irishmen of the Sixteenth Century."

La Storia della Passione di Nostro Signor Gesù Cristo, spiegata ed applicata alla vita cristiana, dal R. P. GIACOMO GROENINGS, Gesuita, tradotta dall'inglese dal REV. SAC. GUGLIELMO PAOLINI.

This book, which originally appeared in German in 1889, has passed through several editions and has been translated into English. Hungarian and Polish versions are now in preparation. The solid nature of the work is gathered from a single sentence of the author's Introduction: "The author deemed it prudent not to touch upon private revelations, no matter how venerable the names that may be connected with them; because in such revelations it is too difficult to distinguish between what was really revealed and what was the fruit of pious meditation. He has judged it in more strict conformity with his office of teacher and interpreter of the Gospel to confine himself to the inspired text and to its interpretation as given by the Fathers and men scientifically trained for such work."

The Alchemist's Secret. By ISABEL WILLIAMS. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. Price, 85 cents.

This is the second volume of short stories that has come from the pen of Miss Williams, following soon upon the first. In the new volume she shows a maturing art in the difficult field of the short story. The pathos is more restrained, the handling of situations firmer and the characters more freely allowed to develop in action and speech. The stories are simple and natural in their plots; and yet, especially in the two, "He Hath Put Down the Mighty" and "Nancy's Tale," a dramatic interest is created and sustained to the end, which we would not expect from such simple materials. Young persons should find these gentle annals of the poor as wholesome as they are interesting.

La Civiltà Cattolica, which has entered upon its sixty-first year of fighting the battles of the Lord, has been honored by His Holiness with a letter in which he specially praises its work against Modernists and urges it to continued activity and zeal.

The second number for April has an article on Missions and Missionaries, in which the rise and growth of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith and other kindred associations are traced. The question of missions is to-day more than ever before the "burning question," for if the Church now has helps which were unknown in earlier days, she also has more rivals and adversaries in her chosen field.

A sketch of Mariavism, not wholly unknown, we believe, in the United States, is a repetition of the old, old story of piety degenerating into pietism, fanaticism, spiritual pride, rebellion and fantastic heresy. A certain woman, Felician Kozłowska, beginning as a Franciscan Tertiary, advanced to the position of Popess of some seventy priests in Russian Poland. One of these secured sacrilegious consecration from the Jansenist Archbishop Gul of Utrecht, and thus the new coterie was "ready for business." Thirty-eight parishes have fallen under the sway of the organization, which very properly maintains friendly relations with the Old Catholics and other similar amputated limbs of the Church. Naturally, it is viewed with favor by the Russian Government, because it is hostile to Rome. Poland is a nation of martyrs. How sad that even one of that chivalrous people should be entrapped in Mariavism!

THE NUNS OF CEBÚ, P. I.

In 1904 there was something of a famine in one of the Philippine possessions, the island of Cebú. The Sisters of Charity, in charge of the local Asylum of St. Vincent de Paul, took up a collection from Americans and others to buy rice which they distributed to the needy. On March 11th, 1909, the Christian Herald published an article signed by Frederick and Elizabeth White-Jansen, Presbyterian missionaries of Cebú, accusing the nuns of buying the children from their mothers and illegally detaining them.

The following extract from the Christian Herald of that date explains the nature of the accusation:—

THE LITTLE CHILDREN WHO SUFFER.

"Can the little orphan children of the Philippines answer with hope and promise the call of the Saviour, when over-burdened with heavy toil, and too often surrounded with degrading immorality? Shall we not try to get some of them free, and give them the Christian home and good surroundings so often denied them? The Friend of all little children made them a shelter in His arms when they were brought to Him for blessing. Will you not take up His work, and make sheltering homes for the many little orphaned ones of Cebú Island? Some of them are now being cared for in the dispensary of our medical missionary, during his short furlough home.

"There is ample space on our missionary property where an orphan home might be built. There are only eleven orphans now under our care, but many others are waiting to be received. Surely food and clothing and shelter for these little ones will come from the friends of the ever-near Friend of all little children. Knowing that the Saviour has His friends, we receive these little orphan ones and tell you of their need. Orphan children who have a living faith in Christ, when brought for care and shelter, we will not refuse.

"During the Cebú famine many poor mothers brought their little starving children to the nuns in this city. Death seemed so near that the mothers thought they had better save themselves and their little ones from starvation in this way. So, for a bowl of rice little children were sold to the nuns. When the food was eaten and hope revived, numbers of the poor mothers returned to the door of the convent to beg that their children might be restored to their arms. But their prayer in every instance was denied.

"We purpose that when there are orphan brothers and sisters they shall share home life together, and that the little ones shall mingle in school life with other children, while giving them the Christian environment and watchful home care which they lack, and so prepare them to meet life and mingle with their fellow-men, bearing life's burdens and duties beside them.

"(Signed)

"FREDERICK AND

ELIZABETH WHITE-JANSEN.

"American Presbyterian Mission,
Cebú, P. I., Nov. 15, 1908."

A fortnight after the publication of this letter, on March 24, 1909, the Secretary of the Protestant Alliance of London laid this grave charge before our Ambassador, Mr. Whitelaw Reid, who in turn handed the matter over to the Secretary of State, Washington, D. C. From the Secretary of State the accusation found its way to the office of the Secretary of War, whence it was despatched to the Governor-General of the Philippine Islands. The official communication from the War Department bears the date of April 16, 1909. On June 9 the Governor-General of the Philippines wrote to the Director of the Constabulary of the Philippines, and finally, a week later, that official passed the document on to the Senior Inspector of Cebú for investigation and report.

The report is here given in full, together with the statement of the Sister Superior of the Cebú Orphan Asylum:

"PHILIPPINES CONSTABULARY,
"Headquarters, Province of Cebú.
Cebú, August, 1909.

"The Executive Inspector,
Bureau of Constabulary, Manila.
"Sir:

"In compliance with your instructions of recent date, I have the honor to submit the following report of my investigation of alleged criminal detention of children by the Catholic nuns of Cebú, as charged by the Reverend Frederick Jansen of the American Presbyterian Mission here, in an article published in the Christian Herald of March 11, 1909.

"On the 13th of July a letter was addressed to the Rev. Mr. Jansen, informing him of my instructions to investigate the matter, and requesting him to furnish me the names of fathers or mothers whose children had been illegally detained by the Sisters, and although Mr. Jansen did not honor me with a reply to such letter, his wife wrote a short letter questioning my interest in the case, and declining to go into details. I did not at first notice that this letter was signed by Mrs. Jansen, instead of her husband himself, so I wrote him a second letter advising him of the source of my authority for making the investigation and again requesting him to furnish me with the names of the injured parties. Again Mr. Jansen ignored my letter, though a second letter was received from Mrs. Jansen, in which she stated that the article published in the Christian Herald was hers and not her husband's, and that in writing it she had based her statements on information given her by reliable natives, after having assured herself of the absolute truth of the same.

"A third letter was then sent to Mr. Jansen informing him that the article in question was signed by himself as well as Mrs. Jansen, and again requesting the names of the parents concerned. To this he made reply, stating rather indefinitely that he was working on the matter slowly, and that he would furnish me any information that might come to hand. Not being very well impressed by Mr. Jansen's apparent evasiveness and indifference, and having little assurance of securing the names of material witnesses, I interviewed a number of the older residents of the town, of different nationalities and religions, and finally carried the matter to the Mother Superior of the Convent, through the Bishop of Cebú. The Mother Superior was somewhat astonished at the nature of the charges made against her by Mr. and Mrs. Jansen, but very willingly consented to make a statement in reply to the same, and did so, addressing herself to the Bishop, in the presence of Captain George W. Read of this office. A copy of such statement, translated from Spanish by Captain Read, is enclosed herewith. It explains the means adopted by her Order, as well as that of the Fathers here, to alleviate in so far as they were able the famine-stricken people, and denies in toto the charges made by Mr. and Mrs. Jansen. This statement of the Mother Superior was substantiated by information received in my interviews with older and most reliable citizens of the town. As yet, Mr. Jansen has not furnished a single witness, nor given me other evidence in support of the charges made by him.

"The Sisters here are rearing and educating a limited number of orphans, the support of whom is borne in part by the officials and merchants residing here, and the remainder by the Religious Orders. The Sisters would be only too glad to deliver such children to their parents, had they any. I might add that the list of subscribers to the support of these children contains the names of a number of non-Catholics, including that of the undersigned.

"The undersigned finds the charges made in the article in question as being entirely without foundation.

"Very respectfully,

"(Signed) L. E. BOREN,
"Major and Senior Inspector."

STATEMENT.

By Sor Teresa, Mother Superior of the College of the Immaculate Conception and Hospice of San José, regarding alleged detention of children against the will of their parents:

"In April, May, June, July and August, 1904, a great famine prevailed in the Province of Cebú, and hundreds of poor people swarmed in the streets of the capital. In order to relieve, in so far as was possible, the thousands of needs of so many destitute, the late Father Julia opened a subscription, which he headed with a large sum from his Order, followed by the College of the Immaculate Conception, which the Sisters of Charity, the only nuns in the city, had been directing for many years, and the gifts of other influential persons, who joined in the good work. For several months rice was distributed, in the court now occupied by the College of the Child Jesus, to all the poor who presented themselves, giving two measures to each adult and one each to children. If any mother came with two, three, five, seven or more children, she was given a measure for each, to take away with her and give it to her family in her own house. It follows that it is a base calumny, as all Cebúanos can testify, that, as some newspapers have stated, the Sisters of this city bought children from their starving mothers for a plate of rice, and later refused to restore the children when their time of need was past.

"On the 19th of July of the aforementioned year, Feast of St. Vincent de Paul, a free dinner was given by both religious communities. Said dinner was given in the cinematograph theatre of Sr. Pedro Royo, a Spaniard. There were to be found, serving the poor, the daughters of the principal families of the city. The distribution lasted from 8 A. M. until after 1 P. M., and as the voluntary helpers were exhausted and the gathering of the starving was innumerable, it was arranged to give the unserved applicants uncooked rice and money in order that they might eat in their houses or where they might best accommodate themselves. The above is all that I am able to inform Your Grace regarding the matter in question."

The last work of the lamented Bishop Hendrick, in whose diocese the alleged transaction took place, was to further the investigation and expose the baseless character of the slander. Before his death he had the satisfaction of receiving the following retraction from the Presbyterian minister:

"Cebú, Sept. 25, 1909.

"Bishop Hendrick, Cebú.

"My dear Bishop:

"Some time ago, as you know, there appeared in the Christian Herald an article to which the signatures of Mrs. Jansen and myself were attached, in which certain charges were made against Cebú nuns, and while the article stated, I believe, that these cases had not been personally investigated by us, when asked to help in investigating the same, we felt, of course, in duty bound to do so. The persons who made these charges lived, at the time, one family (according to their own statements) in the mountains back of San Fernando, others in the mountain region back of Cascar. However, the parties could not be found, and as we did not even have their full names, the investigator had no easy task, though it seemed that, at the time (1904), such people had lived there, but had moved away to other places in the interim. I made a full and frank report of the matter to officials concerned, and the report will of course be sent to all concerned in the matter. So far as we are concerned the matter is settled.

"But I cannot refrain from writing you to say, that I sincerely regret the article ever was written. I have myself, on a number of occasions, been offered and begged to take children off the parents' hands for adoption, because of their poverty. Lack of facilities has prevented me, but I have often of late thought that, had I received such children and, moved by compassion by the parents' utter poverty, had assisted them at the same time with gifts of food or money, they might possibly have turned round and accused me of having bought the children; and in the case they sought to recover them, and I most certainly should have refused to give them back to such parents, realizing that only need or greed or opportunity might offer itself for them to effect a real sale, especially of the female children to their sure moral ruin, then I do not put any accusations whatever beyond such people.

"May I ask you to tell the Mother Superior of the Convent of my regrets. While your Church and mine may differ in doctrine, believe me it would grieve both Mrs. Jansen and myself unspeakably if we knew that we had done anybody an injustice.

"I am glad with this to take the opportunity of expressing to you my heartfelt sympathy for your feeble state of health, and I should regret very much if you, on that account, should be hindered from continuing your work in this diocese.

"Hoping that you may, on the contrary, be spared for the good of your Church here for a long time, believe me, dear sir,

"Very respectfully yours,

"FRED. JANSEN."

The moral taught by the documents given above, or borrowing the form of the ancient Prince of Fabulists, "the fable shows" that bigotry is like "vaulting ambition which o'erleaps itself, and falls on the other."

EDUCATION

A recent critic in a quasi-religious review says: "In favoring schools entirely free from denominational influence and not subject to control by any religious body, one does not necessarily show himself to be a patron of anti-Christian schools or anti-Christian training." The contention is rather frequently advanced of late to meet one of the objections which is urged against the processes of Mr. Carnegie's Foundation. It is not easy for some to grasp the fundamental principle that Christian teaching must be "denominational"—if one may use a word which is not a particularly happy one. Sometimes an illustration drawn from experience is a more effective teacher than is pure reasoning. Few will deny that the school system in vogue in France to-day is anything but Christian or religious in its influence, and most of us will affirm that the ruin of Christian education in that hapless land dates precisely from the closing of the schools controlled by the religious bodies. Yet M. Brisson, the French Deputy whose report led to the undoing of these schools throughout France, was just as insistent as are some later friends of education that he was not opposed to religious or educational liberty. He merely meant to put an end to dominant control of schools by religious bodies.

Similarly in the educational struggle that occurred a few years since in England's Parliament, Dr. Clifford, the non-Conformist leader, openly boasted his purpose to follow the policy of Combes in France against religious schools. And who does not remember the means he used to put his policy into execution? He would have eliminated every religious test in education. In the catchword used there is a surprising likeness to the formula met with in the Carnegie Foundation. One may be permitted to hope that in the great opportunities the fund ensures for the advance of education the evil results which have attended education without religion in other lands may not come home to us.

Coeducation has been found wanting in another of its once favored haunts. The abandonment of the coeducational feature has been discussed for some years by the trustees and alumni of Tufts College, Medford, Mass. Definite action follows the report of a committee recently appointed to determine the school's policy. The report was emphatic in favor of the policy of separation of the sexes. Last week its trustees, acting on the report, recommended the establishment of a separate women's department at the college next fall, to be known eventually as the Jackson College for women. The committee had urged that action be taken at once to raise the necessary funds for the new buildings required because of the change.

An article in a recent number of one of the popular magazines has occasioned considerable discussion of the methods prevailing in advanced schools for young women. Naturally enough, the stand which the Catholic Church has ever taken in regard to the training of her children has been referred to more or less favorably in the discussion. There will be always among us those who find it difficult to accept guidance on the educational question, and who claim they cannot understand why objection is made to Catholic young men and women attending non-Catholic schools or colleges. Perhaps it may not be amiss to quote again the excellent summary of reasons for our Catholic policy advanced years ago by the late Bishop McQuaid of Rochester. A query had been made by the Outlook regarding the Bishop's opposition to the presence of Catholic young women at non-Catholic higher schools. Among the reasons of his opposition which the Rochester prelate enumerated were these: "Compulsory attendance at non-Catholic religious exercises; the system of co-education commonly prevailing; the teaching of philosophy and history there followed; the existence of Catholic colleges in the East and West where are found Catholic ladies still loyal to their Church and ambitious to attain to the highest ideals of pure, cultured, noble womanhood." The reader who keeps in touch with the educational history of to-day will not need to be reminded that time has not weakened the strength of the Bishop's reasons.

As has been stated frequently in this column, the tendency among us to demand provision for definite religious teaching in the educational system is growing more marked every year. The disposition appears to exist even to study a practical plan suitable to our schools. Unfortunately the ingrained fear of, anything that suggests closer relations between Church and State still holds its place in the United States. Much as the need of religious teaching is recognized, there is the old cry to frighten men away from a sensible study of ways and means to satisfy the need. "It will never be possible for religion to be taught in the public schools, and a division of the school tax which shall permit each Church to secure the benefit of religious teaching to its children is not a feasible proposition in this country." The first of these contentions is correct; the heterogeneous composition of the public schools in the States forbids the possibility of teaching religion in such a way as to satisfy all or any who frequent their classes. But why must we concede offhand the impossibility of the second? England and Germany and Canada have solved a similar problem to the practical contentment of their citizens. Why cannot we do the like in a country which makes so great a boast of its educational freedom?

SOCIOLOGY

The United States Steel corporation has put a plan of relief before its workmen, to be tried for a year before being accepted. It is a purely voluntary relief in case of death or accident in its service, on the part of the corporation, but the condition of its acceptance by the workman is his renunciation of any legal claim he may have for compensation. The plan makes a very wide distinction between the unmarried workman and the married man living with his family. The family still in Europe of the foreign workman is ignored. Still a large discretion is left in the hands of the management. For temporary disablement no relief will be paid for a longer period than a year, or for the first ten days. Unmarried men are to receive 35 per cent. of their wages with certain increases for length of service, but in no case is the relief to exceed $1.50 per day. Married men are to receive 50 per cent. of their wages with increases for length of service and number of children; but the relief is never to exceed $2 per day. Permanent disablement is to be compensated for at from six months' wages for the loss of an eye to eighteen months' for the loss of an arm.

Death relief equivalent to eighteen months' wages will be paid under due conditions to widows and children under sixteen years of age, with increases for length of service and number of children. But in no case shall the amount paid exceed $3,000. It must be acknowledged that the relief thus planned falls short of that allowed under the English system and proposed by the New York State Commission.

From the Pension Committee's report the Irish Local Government Board appears to have seized every opportunity to cut down the Pension list outside of the Protestant counties of Ulster. The census of 1841 and 1851 are frequently contradictory; such cases seem to have been decided in favor of Ulster and against the South, with the result that North-East Ulster gets much the best of it in number and value of pensions. Mr. Birrell, in reply to Mr. Ginnell, M.P., has promised to secure rejected claimants a rehearing under more reasonable conditions.

The boys at the Colorado State Home for Dependent Children are permitted and encouraged to raise chickens and pigeons. Every boy must care properly for his stock or surrender the privilege of keeping it. Very few of the youngsters go out of business. The neighborhood forms a ready market for fresh eggs and squabs. Superintendent Cowan is satisfied that business methods and a sense of responsibility and thrift result from what is pleasant diversion for the boys. His young charges are orphans or children rescued from dangerous surroundings and are under the guardianship of the State.

The young people in Baltimore want more playgrounds. The means they took to express their wishes to the city authorities was a military parade of three thousand schoolboys, reviewed by the Mayor. The public interest thus aroused is not to be allowed to cool. The "playground regiment" is now getting to work to collect the subscriptions promised by citizens in the hour of enthusiasm.

There are signs that a fall in prices is beginning, though there is no reason to expect an immediate return to the very low cost of living of some years ago. Wheat is to-day 14 per cent. lower than the highest price of last year; corn is 24 per cent. lower, and oats 32 per cent. Cattle, sheep and hogs have declined somewhat in price, but they are still very high.

ECONOMICS

One reads from time to time statistics of the yearly production of coal, oil, iron, timber, grain and cotton, and deplores the looseness of expression. Man by his labor produces the annual crops; but for the production of timber a period of many years is required. As for coal, oil, iron, etc., he cannot produce a single ounce. With regard to timber, then, the so-called production is a consumption, with a possibility of replacing the stock consumed after a certain length of time. As regards iron and other metals, it is a utilization involving a certain necessary waste which can never be replaced. But the so-called production of coal and oil is absolutely irreparable destruction. When one considers the recklessness of this destruction he sees how wise was the warning given many years ago by the great Lord Derby on the danger to England of excessive coal mining, how practical is the action of the Government of Victoria (Australia) in taking steps to conserve its coal resources, and how necessary to sound economics is the understanding of such elementary exactnesses as we have here put down.

These considerations are occasioned by the reading of a report of an address made by Henry S. Graves, chief of the Forest Service, to the National Lumberers' Association. Mr. Graves spoke for private reforestation by lumbermen themselves as opposed to public reforestation either by the agents of the State or made compulsory on private parties by legislation, and urged American lumbermen to undertake the work at once. He thought that it would be impracticable from a business standpoint to ask large holders to do so throughout their entire holdings, but recommended them to begin on a moderate scale. Mr. Graves seemed to look upon the matter from the lumbermen's point of view as an investment. Such a restricted view, it is to be feared, will frustrate the movement, as the lumberman will be dead and gone long before any returns will come from his planting. Let it be understood that his duty to the nation requires him to plant a tree for every one he fells, and a solid foundation will have been laid on which to build up a practicable system.

Canada's export trade with the United States passed, in the month of March, the twenty million mark. In the corresponding month last year it reached only $14,400,000, while in March of this year it amounted to $20,172,673. This great gain increases the total of trade for the nine months ending with March from $113,000,000 in 1909 to $152,000,000 for the present season. Imports from the United States in March of this year were $7,643,000 against $5,752,000 during the same month of 1909. Washington advices say that no other country shows so marked an increase as the Dominion of Canada.

Negotiations, which have been under way since last November, were concluded on April 26 for the sale, by Messrs. R. W. Strong and C. W. Tessie, of St. John's, Newfoundland, to a syndicate comprising twelve New York capitalists, with C. D. Stanford, of Bangor, Me., as managing director, of 13,850 square miles of well-wooded land for $250,000 and 49 per cent. of the proceeds of the pulp industry in the future. Ten thousand miles of this land is situated on the Labrador coast, extending from Byron's Bay, north of Hamilton Inlet, to Port Manners. The remainder of the timber is in Newfoundland. The company, which has been capitalized at twenty-five million dollars, will erect pulp and paper mills at the most convenient point on the stretch of coast where the limits are situated. A line of steamers is provided for, and by this time next year the pulp will be shipped to England and the United States. This enterprise is the outcome of Lord Northcliffe's, referred to by Sir Edward Morris as the Harmsworths', venture on the same lines in Newfoundland, and of the Quebec legislation now going into effect, prohibiting the exportation of pulpwood from Crown lands. Through this transaction the Newfoundland Government received $55,412 as timber fees.

SCIENCE

The Prussian Government has been testing the feasibility of introducing the new Edison storage batteries into railroad service. A locomotive has been furnished with 408 such cells with a capacity of 280 ampere hours. The total weight of this battery is 5.9 tons, the driving mechanism consisting of two 35 H.P. series wound motors. On the trial trip the engine hauled 36 tons over a distance of 132 miles on a single charging, and on examination the batteries showed power remaining to cover a third of this distance.

That the transmission of wireless telegraph messages is greatly affected by sunlight seems to be well established. It is found that the stronger the sunshine the less is the inductivity of the ether, and thus a larger radius of communication is ensured in Northern latitudes than in the Tropics.

Dr. Roberts Austen, an English chemist, has compounded a new alloy of gold and aluminium which, it is said, outrivals in brilliancy any known metal. Its general hue is purple, which changes into a bright ruby tint when revolved in sunlight. Another alloy just introduced into industry is the so-called "metal cork." Analysis shows it to consist of 99.30 per cent. magnesium, with zinc, sodium, aluminium and iron. The density of the alloy is 1.762, that of magnesium being 1.74. Its color is grayish-white.

Owing to the failure of the National Geographical Society and the Peary Arctic Club to raise the $50,000 necessary to finance the expedition for the discovery of the South Pole, the project has been abandoned, for this year, at least.

With new facilities for the safer transportation of radium, the trade has been placed on a firmer footing. The preparation, which is not pure radium, but radium-barium chloride, is enclosed in a so-called radium cell, some two inches in diameter and three-quarters of an inch in length. This container is re-encased in a tube of brass provided with a lead bottom. A mica plate fitted to one side of the capsule obviates the necessity of opening it when in use.

The present magnitude of Halley's comet is estimated to be about 4.0, which will grow until May 21, when it will reach about -1.7, which is about equal to the brightness of comet 1910-a at its perihelion. If these estimates are correct the comet should remain visible well into July.

Measurements made on the tail of the comet, as photographed at the Lick Observatory, show a length of 7,000,000 miles. Unless this length is much increased, our chances of cutting through the tail are very slim. F. TONDORF, S.J.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Archbishop Ireland, on May 19, at St. Paul, will officiate as consecrator of six Bishops, an event unique in the history of the Church in the United States. The new prelates will be the Rt. Rev. Timothy Corbett, Pastor of the Cathedral, Duluth, Bishop of Crookston; Rt. Rev. Vincent Wehrle, O.S.B., Abbot of St. Mary's Abbey, Rich-ardton, N. D., Bishop of Bismarck, N. D.; the Rt. Rev. Joseph F. Busch, head of the diocesan missionary band, residing at Excelsior, Minn., Bishop of Lead, S.D.; the Rt. Rev. John J. Lawler, Pastor of the Cathedral, St. Paul, Auxiliary Bishop of St. Paul; the Rt. Rev. James O'Reilly, Pastor of the Church of St. Anthony of Padua, Minneapolis, Bishop of Fargo, N. D., and the Rt. Rev. Patrick Heffron, Rector of St. Paul Seminary, Bishop of Winona, Minn.

The Right Rev. John Joseph Nilan, D.D., seventh Bishop of Hartford, was consecrated in St. Joseph's Cathedral, Hartford, on April 28, by the Most Rev. William H. O'Connell, D.D., Archbishop of Boston, assisted by Bishop Walsh, of Portland, Me., and Bishop Feehan, of Fall River, Mass. The ceremony was performed in the presence of a distinguished gathering of Rt. Rev. Bishops and Monsignori, eight hundred priests, secular and regular, and a large concourse of the laity. Governor Weeks of Connecticut was also present with his executive secretary and other members of his staff. The sermon was delivered by the Rt. Rev. Mgr. M. J. Lavalle, V.G., of New York.

The Rev. Michael Francis Fallon, who was consecrated, on April 25, Bishop of London, Ontario, was born in Kingston, Ont., May 17, 1867. Educated there and at the University of Ottawa (B.A., 1889), he entered the Congregation of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, pursued his theological studies in the Gregorian University, Rome, where he received the degree of D.D., and was ordained priest in 1894. He was professor and later on Vice-Rector of the University of Ottawa for three years, then Pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Ottawa, for three years more, during which he edited an influential Catholic weekly created by himself. In 1901 he became Pastor of the Holy Angel's parish, Buffalo. Two years later he was chosen Provincial of the American Oblates and held this position till he was appointed to the vacant see of London. The consecrator was Archbishop McEvay, of Toronto; the assistant Bishops were Bishop Scollard, of Sault Ste. Marie, and Bishop Macdonnell, of Alexandria. There were also present Archbishop Donatenwill, Superior-General of the Oblates, the Archbishops of Chicago, St. Boniface, Montreal, Kingston and Halifax, the Bishops of Buffalo, St. John, N. B., Chatham, N. B., Sherbrooke, Valleyfield, Peterboro, Detroit, Hamilton and Rochester, and about three hundred priests from all over Canada and the United States. Mgr. Shahan, Rector of the Catholic University, Washington, preached the consecration sermon. Rev. George I. Nolan, O.M.I., of Lowell, Mass., preached at Pontifical Vespers. Mgr. Meurier, administrator sede vacante, read an address to the new Bishop of London on behalf of the clergy, and the Hon. Thomas Coffee, Dominion Senator, read another address from the laity. The Right Rev. Bishop Fallon replied separately to both addresses.

On May 11 the annual meeting and banquet of the Alumni Association of the North American College, Rome, will be held in Baltimore, Md.

The seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Mary was celebrated April 14, in the Diocese of Dallas, where that Sisterhood conducts several educational institutions. At Sherman, Texas, Rt. Rev. E. J. Dunne, Bishop of Dallas, presided at Solemn High Mass in St. Mary's Church, and afterwards at the public celebration in the auditorium of St. Joseph's Academy, conducted by the Sisterhood, when he paid high tribute to their services for Christian education in Texas.

A unique combination of anniversaries was celebrated in Cleveland, Ohio, on April 17. This date marked the fortieth anniversary of the erection of St. Stephen's parish, of the priesthood of its Pastor, and of his appointment to this parish. The beautiful parish church and a well-organized school mark the successful administration of the Rev. C. Reichlin during his long years of service. He is now irremovable Rector of the parish he started. An enthusiastic gathering of grateful parishioners and other well-wishers filled the large hall of Gray's Armory, where the commemorative celebration took place.

An interesting celebration will be that of the ninth anniversary of the institution of early services for night workers to be held at St. Andrew's Church in New York, May 8. Rev. Luke Evers, Pastor of the church, who has been in charge of this work from the beginning, will be celebrant of the commemorative solemn high Mass at 2.30 A. M. Nine years ago the idea of having services for the night workers was first broached to Archbishop Corrigan, and the project was successful from the start. Archbishop Farley opened another church up town and has ever warmly seconded the efforts of the promoters of these Masses, and has frequently congratulated those responsible for their enduring success.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Archbishop O'Connell, of Boston, recently addressed a public meeting of a local branch of the Federated Catholic Societies of his diocese, at Lowell, Mass., on the subject of Loyalty. In regard to Mr. Roosevelt's treatment of the Vatican and his secretary's share therein the Archbishop said:

"And remember I am talking really and truly on principle, not personalities. I am talking as I would to any man. Now, Mr. Roosevelt has always said and has given us to understand that he is very fond of Catholics and he liked them very much. We will let that pass. We suppose it is true. If it were true then, Mr. Roosevelt, why did you dare insult the Holy Father, the Pope? Why did you dare to pass over the common rights of man, to turn down an offer of hospitality from the Holy Father, the head of the great Catholic Church, whom we revere as the Vicar of Christ? Now, Mr. Roosevelt, do you really love us? If so, you have shown your affection for us in a very strange way. The Vatican knew perfectly well that its action would be misrepresented. The Cardinal Secretary of State, Merry del Val, knew perfectly that at once there would be oceans of vilifications heaped against him, and Mr. Roosevelt allowed him to take the blame. The Vatican is loyal, and there is an example of disloyalty in that very incident which stands forever as history.

"It is the case of Mr. John Callan O'Laughlin. Who is he? He says he is a Catholic and boasts of it, and in the same breath he cables all over the world that the head of his Church is wrong and Mr. Roosevelt is the greatest thing in creation. That is the sort of a Catholic that we are ashamed of—Mr. John O'Laughlin, who seems to be looking for a job and is willing to sacrifice the things that man holds most sacred for this particular work, which he hopes may come his way. He will live to see the day that he will regret these words, for there never was a man yet in the history of the world who played the part of Judas that didn't in the end pay for it, and Mr. Callan O'Laughlin, who is insincere, will live on. Mr. Roosevelt is shrewd and knows that that kind of a Catholic is not a Catholic at all, and we know that the Federation will keep out of public office such men as this. If our neighbors wish to honor Catholics by high positions in their gifts, then we insist that they must be real Catholics and not John O'Laughlin's."

"It is well to know," says Il Resegone, a Catholic weekly of Lecco, "that L'Evan-gelista, the Methodist organ in Rome, is notoriously in alliance with L'Asino. Sufficient proof of this is found in one of the latest numbers of Podrecca's filthy sheet, in which there is a statement from L'Evan-gelista to the effect that it is in accord with L'Asino and fully approves of its methods." Podrecca's coarse cartoons of things the most sacred and his violations of public decency have repeatedly brought him before the courts.

The importance of Catholic social activity is once more emphasized in the mid-April number of the Catholic Fortnightly Review. It thus comments on the Washington University Record for March, 1910:

"It offers some excellent suggestions as to the varieties of fruitful social effort, especially in our large cities and among the children of the tenement. We fully agree with the author in his high estimate of work of this kind. 'At the present time,' he says, 'in popular speech social work includes both paid and volunteer work in charitable societies, social settlements, institutional churches, probation offices, compulsory attendance departments of the public schools, playgrounds, welfare work in factories and stores, and state, county, and municipal, charitable and correctional institutions. Though the field here outlined is wide, it includes only a part of the great domain of social service.'

"We think it proper again and again to call the attention of Catholics to these different kinds of social work, because as time goes on the Church and her children will be called upon to take part in these activities, and we have hardly yet begun to realize the necessity of work along these lines.

"Complaints are often made by the pastors of city churches that the 'social settlements' especially are largely engines of sectarian proselytizing. But, as we pointed out already fifteen years ago, the more these complaints are justified, the greater the need for us to learn from the facts of these zealous and mostly well-intentioned social workers whose efforts tend to deprive our children of the faith that is in them. In an article entitled 'Cahenslyism' (Catholic Fortnightly Review, XVI, 13) we showed how social agencies of the kind just referred to are 'systematically undermining the faith of Italian "foreigners" in Chicago.' The same is true of other large cities, notably New York and Philadelphia.

"What importance is attached to this 'social settlement' work may be seen from the following words of the Washington University Record: 'Along with the enlargement of the work done in the social settlements has gone a widening of the interest in this form of social work, even in the churches and the wealthier classes of the community, until now it is probably correct to describe the settlement as a practical expression of the interest of the more favored people of the community in their less favored neighbors.'

"When the writer of the article speaks of the interest for this work among 'the churches,' he lets us understand that he means the Protestant churches. Of course, no one can unreservedly condemn the 'settlement work' of the various denominations, many of which have ample means and an army of willing helpers. But we think it is high time that our Catholic people realize that this particular form of welfare work is being used as a means to rob those of our Catholic brethren who come under its influence of their faith, and that in the course of time this agency in the hands of so-called non-sectarian leaders will become a source of incalculable defections. When we were asked years ago by a Chicago pastor, whose parish was near a famous social settlement: 'What can I do to save these unfortunate Catholic protégés of Hull House?' we knew no other reply than: 'Engage in Catholic settlement work!' We know of no better means to-day."

OBITUARY

Rev. Gaspar Harzheim, S.J., who died April 7, at Florissant, Mo., had an unusually varied career. He was born in the city of Bonn, Rhineland, January 3, 1838. Having finished the course of studies at the Gymnasium, he pursued higher studies at the University of Tübingen, and on April 20, 1860, entered the Novitiate of the Society of Jesus at Gorheim. After the usual studies in the Society he taught the humanities for three years, and in 1869 he was sent to Maria-Laach to pursue the theological course. During the Franco-Prussian War, 1870, he served in the military hospitals; in 1872 he was ordained priest, and two years later he passed through the third probation under Father Meschler. One of his fellow-priests was the present General of the Society. In 1875 he arrived in India, and after a period of teaching in Jesuit colleges there he was engaged for several years in taking care of the poorest caste in the district of Ahmednagar. His broken health forced him to return to Europe in 1883, but in the following year he returned to India, which he was obliged to leave forever in 1886. A few days before his death he wrote to one of his brethren: "I hasten to return your list in order that it may reach the sooner my old dear India. If I were not completely broken, I might offer myself to act as your messenger and to carry it over. Many of those who had to leave India retain some home-sickness for that beautiful but unhappy land. However, my voyage is advanced so far that I see looming up and coming nearer and nearer the coast of another home more beautiful than India and infinitely happy."

In 1887 Father Harzheim arrived in Prairie du Chien, Wis., where he was engaged in teaching the classics to the younger members of his Order for twelve years. He continued the same work at St. Stanislaus, Brooklyn, O., and Florissant, Mo., until the day before his death, April 7, 1910. Father Harzheim was a thorough Latin scholar; nearly every year he wrote a play in classical Latin for the training of his pupils.

Rev. James M. Hayes, S.J., who died in St. Ignatius' College, Chicago, on April 29, was well known as one of the pioneers in the movement to disseminate Catholic reading matter in the form of cheap pamphlets. For nearly half a century he was busily engaged in writing, reproducing and circulating Catholic apologetic literature. Father Hayes passed the eighty-fourth anniversary of his birth only a few days before his death. He entered the Society of Jesus at Florissant, Mo., in 1849, and since that time spent his years without intermission in teaching, giving missions, parish work and directing publications. He was distinguished in Chicago as a temperance worker and organizer of men's total abstinence societies and anti-treating leagues. His work in Chicago for the last thirty years made his gentle and patriarchal figure a familiar one in the streets of Chicago's west side.

A noted attaché of the Vatican passed away on April 29 with the death of Monsignor Agostino Pifferi, titular Bishop of Porphyre, who had been the sacristan of the Pontifical Chapel since the time of Pius IX. He died in the arms of the Holy Father, who had gone to the bedside on learning that the end was near. The Monsignor, who was a Hermit of St. Augustine, had served for fifty years under three Popes. The post has existed for six centuries and is always conferred on an Augustinian.

The death is announced of Mgr. Barbieri, Vicar-Apostolic of Gibraltar. He was a native of Siena, where he was born in 1836. Joining the Benedictines in 1858, he held high office in the Order, and while Abbot of St. Peter, Perugia, he was elected to the Vicariate of Gibraltar in 1901. He was an accomplished man of letters.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

SHOCKING SAMPLES OF VANDALISM.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Vandalism and desecration are at all times causes for regret. When seen where least expected the greater the pang. One surely does not look for such things in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. In the new wing there is a group of statuary representing the Entombment, to which a Catholic at once attaches much significance. To him it has an added meaning. Can you appreciate, then, what one feels when he sees that the centre figure in the group, the figure of Christ, has been scratched and cut with names and French phrases and dates? The dates seem to range from the first to the last of the nineteenth century, the group belonging to the sixteenth century. In the same room is another figure of Christ with similar disfigurements, and we observe, too, that the other figures in the two groups seem to be untouched in this manner. I am interested and beg you kindly to inform me how these groups were obtained from their original settings in blessed chapels.

LOUIS H. CHAZAL.

New York, April 24th.

[The two groups mentioned by our correspondent are chalk-stone figures, an Entombment and a Pietà, the first being inclosed in a Renaissance wood-frame and making an example of the French school of Michael Colomb, about 1510. They came from the chapel of the Chateau de Biron, Perigord, France, and were sold to Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, in 1908, by the Duc de Biron. Mr. Morgan has loaned them, with so many others of his art treasures, to the Museum, where they form a part of the exhibition of the art of the Gothic centuries in the new wing. We strongly urge our readers to visit this recently opened exhibition, which tells graphically one of the many chapters of the fostering care of the Church as the Mother of Art. The story of these two groups of statuary is told in the Museum Bulletin for July, 1908.]

With regard to the defacing of the two figures of the dead Christ it is certainly a very shocking sight to a reverent American, no matter what his religious belief, but Director Robinson, who is the curator of this section, assures AMERICA that the vandalism was all perpetrated before the figures left Biron, and is attributed to casual sight-seeing visitors there. Let us hope that it was also only of the incidental kind common to all public museums. But there is, as our correspondent notes, in the singling out for desecration of the breast of the dead Christ in these groups an appearance of the Satanic hate some degenerate Frenchmen exhibit for sacred things.—ED. AMERICA.]

CHRONICLE

Death of King Edward VII.—The disquieting reports concerning King Edward's health that have been circulating for some weeks had a real foundation, notwithstanding the physicians' reports. He returned from Biarritz with a chronic bronchial affection. To avoid alarming the people he appeared in public, going to the opera and attending to state affairs. At the end of last week he went down to Sandringham, his Norfolk estate, to inspect some work done under his orders. Here he caught fresh cold. He returned to London, however, and attended to his duties as usual. On May 5 it was announced that he was confined to his room, and a second announcement soon followed that his condition was causing grave anxiety. Pneumonia had developed and early on the following afternoon the kingdom and the empire knew that death was impending. He died on Friday, May 6, at a quarter before midnight. The next day the Prince of Wales took the oath before the Privy Council, and was solemnly proclaimed as George V, on May 9.

Sympathy for England's Loss.—As soon as he heard of King Edward's death, the President of the United States sent the following message of sympathy to Queen Alexandra:

"On the sad occasion of the death of King Edward, I offer to your Majesty and to your son, his illustrious successor, the most profound sympathy of the people and of the government of the United States, whose hearts go out to their British kinsmen in this, their national bereavement. To this I add the expression to your Majesty and to the new King of my own personal sympathy and of my appreciation of those high qualities which made the life of the late King so potent an influence toward peace and justice among the nations."

In response to his message of condolence, President Taft received the following message from the Queen Dowager:—

"I am deeply touched by your telegram, and I ask you to convey my heartfelt thanks to the people and government of the United States for their sympathy in my irreparable loss and sorrow."

The first communication from King George V, which was sent to the President of the United States on May 7, was as follows:—

"I am deeply grateful to you, your government and people for your condolences on the death of my beloved father and for your good wishes for my future prosperity."

This message was in reply to the following despatch sent by President Taft:—

"In renewing to your Majesty the condolences of the American government and people upon the death of his late Majesty, I convey to you the heartiest good wishes for the prosperity of your reign."

Prince Tsai Tao in New York.—His Imperial Highness Prince Tsai Tao, chief of the General Staff of the Chinese Military Establishment, brother of the Prince sides his retinue, prominent among whom was Lord Li Regent, and uncle of the child Emperor of China, arrived in New York, on May 1, from Washington. Be-Ching Mai, a son of Li Hung Chang, the Prince was attended by an escort of United States army officers, who joined the party when they came ashore at San Francisco. The Prince is making a tour of the world for the purpose of studying the military systems of the leading Powers. After a visit to West Point and four busy days of sightseeing and entertainment in New York the visitors sailed for Europe on May 5.

Indiana Mines Reopen.—After a strike lasting thirty-three days the labor troubles of the Indiana coal operators were settled temporarily and an order was issued for an immediate reopening of the mines. Eleven thousand mine workers are affected by this action, leaving three thousand still unemployed, pending the settlement. The conference between the representatives of the United Mine Workers and the Indiana Bituminous Coal Operators lasted six days, during which time the prospect of even a temporary agreement seemed remote. The settlement carries the 5 per cent. increase asked by the Cincinnati scale.

New Wage Scale for Trainmen.—A decision was reached in the wage schedule-dispute between the New York Central system and its conductors and trainmen. It is a general compromise of all the points in dispute. The Baltimore and Ohio schedule is granted the men in the case of short hauls. Where the hauls are long and the equipment is of the best, so that the element of danger is eliminated, the differential rate for which the company stood out is approved. The employees of the Delaware and Hudson and of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western systems and the managers of those two companies had previously agreed to abide by the decision for the New York Central, thus ending all likelihood of a strike for wages on Eastern railways.

Canada's Governor-General.—The feature of the prorogation of the Canadian Parliament on the 4th inst. was the farewell to Earl Grey, who has been for the last six years Governor-General of Canada. The gubernatorial term, which is usually five years, was in his case extended one year and will end in October next, before Parliament meets again. Before voting a farewell address the Premier, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, praised His Excellency for having identified himself with Canadian interests. Then the leader of the Opposition, Mr. R. L. Borden, said Lord Grey had come to Canada as one of the truest Imperialists in the Empire, and when he went away he would be known as one of the truest Canadians in the Dominion. The address, which was read in English by the Speaker of the Senate, Hon. J. J. Kerr, and in French by the Speaker of the House, Hon. Charles Maril, developed the same ideas and expressed great regret at Earl Grey's departure. The latter replied in eloquent praise of Canada's strenuous spirit, bracing climate and unlimited natural resources. He said that if Canadians "keep true to the highest ideals of duty and disinterested service, nothing can prevent them from becoming, and perhaps before the close of the present century, not only the granary, but the heart and soul and rudder of the Empire." When expressing his sorrow at having to leave the country and the people "whom he had learned to love so well," he spoke of his "deep affection for our Canadian home."

British Political Situation.—The by-election for South Edinburgh resulted in favor of the Liberals, leaving parties unchanged. Their majority was 2,327, only 7 less than that of the general election. But as the total vote was only 15,000, while that of the general election was 18,000, the majority, if it does not indicate a gain in Liberal sentiment, certainly gives no sign of a Conservative reaction in Scotland. At Crewe, however, the Liberal majority of 2,300 was reduced by over 700 votes. Sir Christopher Furness, Liberal, has been unseated at Hartlepool for the unlawful acts of his election agents. Messrs. Ramsay Ferguson and Keir Hardie defended openly in the House of Commons the Indian agitators.—One of the last official acts of King Edward was to confer the field marshal's baton on Lord Kitchener.—The Lady Mayoress closed her Fund for God's poor with the opening of spring. Altogether she distributed £3,600.—Mr. Balfour in addressing the Primrose League declared the country to be face to face with revolution.

Irish News.—Most Rev. Archbishop Walsh, Chancellor, presided at the first meeting of Convocation of the National University, April 29, some 200 members attending. Dr. M. F. Cox was elected Chairman of Convocation. It was agreed that Convocation had a right to meet at any time on the requisition of twenty members, suggest appointments to vacancies and discuss and submit proposals on any matter concerning the University. The result of the meeting was to strengthen the influence of the graduate body. Mr. T. O'Donnell, M. P., in presenting the protest against the discrimination exercised by the Intermediate Education Board on the Irish language, showed that an equal award was made for 300 entries in German as for 4,000 in Gaelic. Mr. Birrell practically declined to interfere with the action of the Board. Replying to Mr. Hugh Barrie, M. P., in regard to religious pictures in Irish National Schools, Mr. Birrell said the commissioners sanctioned pictures on Scriptural subjects. Recently the managers of a few schools had introduced religious pictures, and the commissioners had decided that the introduction of statues or pictures of a religious character into any National school should be expressly forbidden. At a meeting in Kilkenny of the Joint Technical Instruction Committee, it was resolved that the Model schools established by the National education board as undemoninational, having been practically closed to Catholics, should be made denominational so that the largest section of the population could avail of them. Mr. T. M. Healy, M. P., presiding at the National Roads Congress in Dublin, showed that the Irish County Councils had made good use of their too limited opportunities and claimed that only a National Parliament in Dublin, endowed with sufficient powers, could make Ireland the beauty spot that nature had intended.

Australian Immigration.—The state of Victoria has sent a special agent to England to seek agricultural immigrants to whom it offers freehold farms on very favorable terms. Among other advantages offered to immigrants approved by the agent is this, that he is authorized to advance eighty per cent. of their passage-money.

French Elections.—So far as the result of the second ballot elections last Sunday in France is known, 222 districts, out of the 231 which required second ballots, give the following results: One hundred Socialist-Radicals, seventeen Socialists, forty-six United Socialists, twenty-one Progressives, eleven Reactionaries, five Nationalists and twenty-two Republicans of the Left. Count Boni de Castellane was defeated by M. Perchod, a Radical Republican; M. Jaurès was reelected. Among the successful candidates are: M. Millerand, Minister of Public Works; M. Henri Brisson, President of the Chamber; M. Jules Siegfried, Professor Paul Painlevé and Abbé Jules Lemire. Among the defeated ones are M. Paul Doumer and M. Ferdinand Dubief, the former a Republican Radical and the latter a Radical Socialist. The Government has lost fourteen seats and the Socialists have gained fourteen. The situation of the other parties has not been changed by this second ballot.

May Day in Europe—a Review.—The General Federation of Labor having announced that they would make revolutionary demonstrations on the First of May, the French government ordered twenty-five thousand soldiers to patrol the Bois de Boulogne, where Parisians congregate on Sunday. Hearing of this on Saturday night the General Federation warned the syndicalists not to go to the Bois and advised them to assemble in the larger boulevards. Then the troops closed in on the boulevards, and the syndicalists realized that they were outmaneuvered and that revolutionary demonstrations were impossible. The President of the Council had published a notice informing Parisian workmen that no procession would be tolerated in the Paris streets and that any disorderly manifestation would be stopped immediately. This show of force sufficed to intimidate the revolutionists and the services of the troops were not required. May Day passed off in unexpected quiet.—Similar precautions had been taken by the Italian government in Rome, where great disturbances were feared but did not take place, and where torrential rains driving the crowds to shelter helped the cause of peace.—There was no disorder in Switzerland, except at Geneva, where a party of Anarchists came into collision with the police, several were injured on each side, and three Anarchists were arrested.—In Portugal there were processions but no disturbance.—In Berlin, where open-air assemblies had been vetoed by the authorities, labor organizations gathered in the halls of the city and listened to speeches denouncing the government's electoral reform measure. The day passed off with no unruly demonstrations. The same was true throughout the empire generally.—In Spain the labor men, though orderly, had at Madrid a big parade with placards proclaiming some demands of the Labor party: an eight-hour day, liberation of political prisoners, reopening of lay schools and exemption of meat and cod-fish from customs duties.

Protestantizing Poland a Failure.—Prussia's attempt to Germanize Poland by planting it with German settlers after the manner of James I's "settlement" of Ireland, has made slight progress in a quarter of a century. The colonization of Posen and West Prussia has cost the Prussian Diet over $100,000,000 net between 1886 and 1909. Of the 900,000 acres that the Colonization Commission has acquired, 70 per cent. was purchased from Germans, with the effect of replacing one set of Germans by another. Moreover, the purchase price is now five times higher than it was in 1886, and in 1909 the land purchased from Poles was one-sixth of the whole. The expropriation—corresponding to King James' "extirpation"—of the natives, which the Prussian Diet deemed essential two years ago, has not yet been attempted, and the reason is not far to seek. The German Government is largely dependent on the Centre Party, which rightly regards colonization and expropriation as attempts to Protestantize rather than Germanize the Polish provinces. The Poles have nothing to fear. Their unalterable attachment to land and faith and tongue has overcome Prussian aggression, and the Catholics of Germany will continue to see to it that the law to expropriate Catholic Poles will remain a dead letter.

Austria.—A new emigration law has been proclaimed, whose provisions are recognized as directed against the Italian Steamship lines. The competition of the latter has affected the Austrian companies' business in a marked degree of late. To favor the home companies the law enacts that permission to enter the traffic must hereafter be had from the Austrian authorities and passage rates must be approved by them.—Last week Dr. Joseph Neumayer, who early in April was chosen to succeed the lamented Lueger in the office of Bürgermeister of Vienna, was inducted into his charge with imposing ceremony.—The Emperor received in audience during the week the late Minister of Finance of Hungary, Dr. von Lukacs, and Dr. von Tomasitch, the Banus of Bosnia. They had been invited by His Majesty for a conference on electoral reform in Croatia, a subject that is to come up in the Hungarian parliament in connection with the question of reform for Hungary.

Hungary.—The campaign being waged by the different parties and factions in preparation for the parliamentary elections in June next is a very heated one. Rough tactics are common and serious disturbances have marked meetings held in several districts. The Nationalists and the Laborites are particularly bitter in their mutual attacks. For the 413 seats to be filled 950 candidates are already in the field.

Notable Warning from the Kaiser.—In a communication to a son of Professor Ebhardt, a freshman of Freiburg university, Emperor William earnestly warned the young man that the beer-drinking habit was seriously damaging not only individual students but the German nation. He claimed that both were falling behind foreigners, particularly the Americans and English, who, in consequence of their more sensible ideas regarding drinking by youths, showed in later years much greater powers of resistance in the battle of life. His Majesty pointed out that Germans, with their increasing world enterprises, would be more called upon to live and work in tropical latitudes, where the climate was exceedingly dangerous to men who in their youth had been addicted to alcohol. The emperor's attitude is commended by thoughtful people, including many students, but is condemned by those who stand for old student traditions.

Riots in China.—The disturbances which occurred lately at Changsha were quite serious. Out of nine missions six were burned, including the Catholic mission. The storehouses and warehouses of the foreign merchants and all the foreign Consulates, the British excepted, were destroyed. There appears to have been no loss of life in the actual uprising, but unfortunately the British gunboat Thistle on the way to protect foreign residents, ran down a junk filled with refugees, and three Spanish Augustinians, Mgr. Perez, the Bishop, and Fathers Gonzalez and de la Paz were drowned. Changsha is the capital of the Province of Hunan, and is situated on the River Siangkiang, fifty miles south of Lake Tungtinghu. It communicates with the sea through the Yangtze-kiang. The cause of the outbreak seems to have been the undue exportation of rice in the face of threatening scarcity.—The Pekin Gazette announces plans prepared by the Government for the building of a new navy. The initial expenditure agreed upon is $10,750,000, and an annual expenditure of $1,100,000 will follow for an indefinite term of years. Of the initial expenditure $90,000 will be used for a naval college and the improvement of existing docks and workshops. The plans call also for the purchase of one battleship, three second and third class cruisers, two training ships and two torpedo destroyers, payment for the same to be distributed over four years. The cost of the program has been proportioned already among the provinces which are urged to raise promptly the respective sums required of them.

Spain.—His Eminence Cardinal Aguirre, Primate of Spain, in the name of the entire Spanish hierarchy, some time since addressed a letter to his Eminence Cardinal Luçon, Archbishop of Rheims, and to the bishops of France, encouraging them to continue their brave stand in defence of the Church and congratulating them for their heroism and declaring it worthy of the early heroes of Christianity. In replying to this message of affection and encouragement the French bishops take occasion to warn the bishops south of the Pyrenees that the French hierarchy is but bearing the first attack of a religious war planned to invade Spain and other nations strong in Catholic faith. "It is no political battle we are sustaining in France; it is a religious war which is being waged against us, not by means of bloody violence as in the revolution at the end of the eighteenth century, but it is war carried on with violence concealed under a false legality. Back of it all, what is sought is the annihilation of the Church, of Religion, and of God Himself."

Earthquake in Costa Rica.—More than one thousand dead were taken from the ruins of the houses which were overthrown in the earthquake at Cartago last week. At present writing the estimate of the dead places the number at one thousand five hundred. A great part of the city is in ruins and the terrified people are in a pitiful state of suffering and destitution. The number of sick and injured cannot be ascertained, as many of them have been hurriedly removed to adjoining towns and villages. The ceremony attending the inauguration of Ricardo Jimenez as President of Costa Rica took place on Sunday on one of the plazas in San José, owing to the fact that the people feared to enter the government building.

Argentina's Centenary.—King Alfonso, to show the cordial relations existing between Spain and Argentina, issued, on April 12, this Royal Decree: "Desirous of testifying My royal regard and that of the Spanish nation for the Argentine Republic and in general for its sister Hispano-American republics; considering the august and exalted qualities which are united in My very dear aunt, her Royal Highness, the Most Serene Lady, Princess of the Blood, Doña Isabel Francisca; with the advice of My Council of Ministers, I have resolved: That in her high personal rank as Infanta of Spain, and attended by such persons as I shall designate, she shall proceed to Buenos Aires on an extraordinary mission and shall assist at the festivities in an official character and represent Me in the exercises that will take place on the occasion of the first centenary of the independence of the aforementioned Argentine Republic."

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Sociological Charity

*"Crouched on the pavement, close by Belgrave Square,
A tramp I saw, ill, moody, and tongue-tied.
A babe was in her arms, and at her side
A girl; their clothes were rags, their feet were bare.*

*"Some laboring men, whose work lay somewhere there,
Passed opposite; she touched her girl, who hied
Across, and begged, and came back satisfied.
The rich she had let pass with frozen stare.*

*"Thought I; 'Above her state this spirit towers;
She will not ask of aliens, but of friends,
Of sharers in a common human fate.'"*

Robert Louis Stevenson could have used these verses of Matthew Arnold as a text for his essay on "Beggars." Not that he needed it, for Stevenson, thanks to a roving habit and a curious temperament, had more first-hand knowledge of the subject than the carefully conventional English scholar and poet. In a letter written in 1892 he refers to his qualifications as an authority on beggary. "I cannot fairly say," he writes, "that I have ever been poor or known what it was to want a meal. I have been reduced, however, to a very small sum of money, with no apparent prospect of increasing it; and at that time I reduced myself to practically one meal a day, with the most disgusting consequences to my health. At this time I lodged in the house of a workingman, and associated much with others. At the same time, from my youth up, I have always been a good deal and rather intimately thrown among the working-classes, partly as a civil engineer in out-of-the-way places, partly from a strong and, I hope, not ill-favored sentiment of curiosity. . . . I made it my business to inquire, and in the stories which I am very fond of hearing from all sorts and conditions of men, learned that in the time of their distress it was always from the poor they sought assistance and almost always from the poor they got it."

Here, then, is an expert witness, and he puts down the following question and answer in his characteristic discourse on beggars: "Are there, then, we may ask no genuine beggars? And the answer is, Not one. . . . There is a true poverty, which no one sees: a false and merely mimetic poverty, which usurps its place and dress, and lives and above all drinks, on the fruits of the usurpation. The true poverty does not go into the streets; the banker may rest assured, he has never put a penny in its hand. The self-respecting poor beg from each other; never from the rich." The essayist then proceeds to offer an explanation of this singular fact. He declares that the gratitude, which is not the fruit of friendship, is impossible. To give a favor and so burden another with an obligation, is a delicate matter to be transacted only between friends and equals. For a stranger to confer a benefit and thus impose an obligation is a hateful thing to the beneficiary, and, if he has self-respect, chokes him with a sense of intolerable degradation.

Stevenson later on admits exceptions to the general rule which he lays down so forcibly, and we think very few will be found to disagree with him in the main. It is a hard saying. Our heart goes out to the beggars we have met, and we take no special pleasure in doing anything which may prevent the usual small coins going out to them in the future. They have their good points. They generally take a refusal cheerfully, which in itself is an arduous virtue to better respected persons. If our incredulity or our principle has been wrecked by a harrowing tale of hunger, the fact that we have been fooled is a negligible affair. If St. Martin of Tours had given half his cloak to an imposter, his action would not have been less intrinsically beautiful. The impostor would have hated the saint and got a new grudge against society; but none of the poison in the act of charity would have been distilled into the soul of the giver.

But the general law as observed by Stevenson and Arnold is not widely recognized, although no one may deny its importance. It explains why it is that, with our elaborate schemes of state and municipal charities and "settlement" houses and interest in the slums and Salvation Army hotels and all similar philanthropies, the rift between the poor and the rest of society seems to be widening. We do not look askance at such institutions. They embody in noble fashion a large measure of human pity and sympathy, and they are relieving large burdens of distress. If our vote were asked we should say, multiply them a hundred-fold. They may not be able to excite gratitude or brotherly love or to blend discordant elements in society, but they give expression to and encourage the growth of Christian charity, and they serve actual needs that clamor for immediate attention regardless of possible sequences. They bless them that give, and in a limited measure, them that receive. Because they cannot go so far as we should desire is no reason for closing our eyes to the mercies which within a restricted sphere they are wont to dispense whenever their purpose is single and purely philanthropic.

But charity which cannot command gratitude can never be a great social force for good. And if modern modes of charity leave the recipient without his self-respect, they give him an additional grievance against the society which binds his sores. Modern charity smells too much of sociology. It tends to become a clinic for scientific and impersonal investigators. It labels individuals with numbers and knows them simply as "cases." And when the scientific character of the charity is absent, there is too often a stooping and nauseous and prying graciousness about it, which must be extremely repulsive to poor persons even when they do not read its insulting exploitation in the newspapers and magazines.

We recommend this side of the problem to modern sociology. If charity towards the poor has its greatest coefficient of benefit only when ministered by the poor, it stands to reason that the representatives of bountiful wealth are called upon to sink fame and fortune, even leave home and kindred, if they wish to bring comfort to the comfortless and to be a stay to the poverty-stricken.

They must make some drastic sacrifice like that of the seventeenth century Jesuit missionary in India who became a member of an exclusive caste and was obliged to pass his brethren on the highways without even a nod of recognition. They must sunder all binding cables and burn all bridges in the rear and become poor with the poor in order to be able to aid them. "Here, then, is the pitiful fix of the rich man," Stevenson reflects; "here is that needle's eye in which he stuck already in the days of Christ, and still sticks to-day, firmer, if possible than ever: that he has the money and lacks the love which should make his money acceptable. . . . His friends are not poor, they do not want; the poor are not his friends, they will not take." The rich man cannot reach the "deserving" poor through hired clerks and superintendents and doctrinaire ladies who give lectures and write articles. The poor form a society into which a rich man cannot buy his way and remain a rich man.

We respectfully direct the attention of sociological students, to whom this obstinate peculiarity of the poor may become a source of bewilderment, to certain Catholic charities like that of the Little Sisters of the Poor. There is a whole volume in that name, to start with. Who are these "little sisters of the poor?" They are women who are poor by choice. They belonged to that class of young girls whom the world—especially the Protestant world—has always found fault with for their spiritual selfishness in denying the claims of family affection and in burying themselves within a convent while the sinful world outside needs them so badly. They have taken a vow not to be or become individual owners of property. Their rules forbid the acceptance of self-supporting foundations and oblige them to beg as well as to take care of the poorest and weakest and least attractive of the poor. They live with the poor, work with the poor, pray with them, eat with them. No, they do not eat with them. Their rules oblige them to eat after them, and their meal is the leavings of the food which they have begged and laid before their aged pensioners.

We doubt whether this solution of a very difficult problem is within the reach of modern sociology. But we should like very much to see what sociology has to say about it. The Little Sisters of the Poor do not propound theories and indite learned papers and send their autobiographies to popular magazines; and for that reason we cannot complain if social theorists have never given the subject much attention. But it seems to us there is a large store of fresh and unworked material here for the sociological professor. We hear of him taking his university pupils—girls principally—into the overcrowded purlieus of narrow streets and high-storied tenements where human nature wallows in all the helpless frankness of penury and elemental needs; and sometimes he leads them into police courts to see crime in its nakedness and its shame. What his purpose is we do not pretend to know. But in behalf of a growing and ambitious young science we suggest similar trips to the "homes" of the poor's consecrate "little sisters." They would be safer at least and probably more inspiring.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

An Anglican Clergyman in Spain

I

Having had reason lately to pass some days among the Spanish books both in the New York and the Boston libraries, I have noticed that the shelves of our American libraries are well provided with those Spanish writers who are hostile to the Cosas de España, but not the same space is given to her defenders, such as the erudite Don Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo, considered one of the first of living savants. Accounts of Spain by the average non-Spanish writers show a suppression of proven facts, or a curious obscuring of them so that the result is false suggestions as to causes and consequences of events. Not infrequently some one idea, the child of bitter prejudice, is worked out through chapter after chapter, with every deed twisted to accord with the pet theory. Thus, not long ago, the great Isabella was presented as a fanatic, unnatural mother, who for politic reasons spread the report of her daughter's insanity, the poor Joana la Loca, whose own recorded words clearly tell the modern mentalist of her clouded intelligence.

If historians fail so egregiously toward Spain, minor writers of travel are as signal offenders. Thus, not to speak of the late John Hay's notorious "Castilian Days," we have Edward Everett Hale (whose own sketches show an absence of all power to comprehend the race) writing an introduction to some lady's book, purporting to be Spain as presented by her novelists. It is a gathering of extracts worthy to have been translated by the Methodist propaganda of Rome. Would it be just to print in one volume—say, for instance, the suicide of Mrs. Wharton's heroine in the "House of Mirth," Hawthorne's grim "Scarlet Letter" scandal, a dreary boarding house scene of Howell's, a morbid case by Mary E. Wilkins, Mrs. Harris' picture of New York society, as seen by the convent-bred girl in "Tents of Wickedness," and to call this a fair representation of our American life?

In the midst of books that misrepresent Spain and her ways it is refreshing to find some few that show culture and sympathy sufficient to grasp the spirit of that democratic ardently religious people. Such a book is Have-lock Ellis' "The Soul of Spain," and a still more recent work, on architecture, by Royal Tyler, which succeeds in keeping close to its subject-matter without the traditional digressions to right and left, to rail at the Inquisition and the expulsion of the Moors.

I stumbled happily on a far older writer, the Rev. Joseph Townsend, A. M., Rector of Pewsey, Wilts.; late Fellow of Clare Hall, Cambridge, who wrote three copious volumes, "A Journey Through Spain in the Years 1786 and 1787, with particular attention to the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, population, taxes and revenues of that country. Printed for C. Dilly in the Poultry, London, 1791." And strange to say these old yellow pages, where every s is an f, though they show little love for the Pope, and have mild diatribes against a celibate clergy and the giving of bread at convent doors as fostering beggary, yet as a whole are so fair-minded and present so different an aspect of the Peninsula from that given by Richard Ford forty years later, that they are well worth lingering over. His pet dislike, the "lazy immoral monks," this old traveler would have replaced by the Oratorians of St. Philip Neri. Surely not very radical for a Protestant.

Rev. Joseph Townsend was a thoughtful, well-read man, a geologist, a political economist, who traveled with an open mind. He entered by Cataluña, by the southern frontier pass, and at once he noticed that the limestone on the French side of the Pyrenees gave place on the Spanish slopes to granite, whose disintegration is not good for vegetation: "All through Catalonia, you admire at every step the industry of the inhabitants, who, working early and late, give fertility to a soil, which naturally except for vines, is most unproductive."

He hastened to reach Barcelona for the Holy Week ceremonies which he describes well. As it was Lent he suffered in diet, for the traveler "must live during these forty days of abstinence on fish and vegetables, because, although in Spain they now have four days in the week in which by special dispensation they may eat flesh, few people are inclined to use this privilege."

Visiting the institutions he wrote: "They have in this city an academy for the noble arts, open to all the world, in which all who attend are freely taught drawing, architecture and sculpture. . . . The academy is well attended. I counted one night upwards of five hundred boys, mostly apprentices to trades. One of the seven spacious halls is fitted up as a nautical school. . . . They have sent out more than five hundred pilots, qualified to navigate a vessel to any quarter of the globe." He found the museum of natural history, the four public libraries, the library of the Dominicans "most worthy of attention.

"No hospital that I have seen upon the continent is so well administered as the general hospital of this city. It is peculiar in its attention to convalescents, for whom a separate habitation is provided that after they are dismissed from the sick wards they may have time to recover their strength. The number they received here in 1785 was 9,299."

He wrote of the hospicio or workhouse, originated in 1582. "No paupers can be better fed, better clad, better attended or better lodged, or can meet with greater tenderness when they are ill." They were tended by the tertiaries of St. Francis, in whose habit Cervantes died. And does not the following give a pleasing glimpse of by-gone ways passed completely in the Old World too:

"In botany I received much assistance from Don Ignacio Ameller, an apothecary whose library would do honor to the first botanist in Europe. To him I frequently referred, and found him conversant with the best authors who have written on this subject. There is also a young man whose employment is to collect medical plants for the apothecaries; in him I found an excellent disciple of Linnaeus."

Leaving Barcelona, our traveler went north into Aragon to Zaragoza, where he had letters of introduction to its Governor, General O'Neill. He visited the University, with its two thousand students, and leaving the city he stopped to examine the Aragon canal works: "I must confess that I never saw any so beautiful and so perfect as these locks and wharfs, nor did I ever see men work with better spirit." He paused at Alcalá to see the University founded by Cardinal Ximenez:

"The library is well furnished; the books are excellent and well arranged. Among them the original Complutensian Bible must command forever the grateful remembrance of the Christian world. In this apartment are preserved his (the Cardinal's) letters, his ring, his bust and his picture; but these faultily express the greatness of his mind and the goodness of his heart."

At Madrid he had an introduction to a Don Casimir Ortega, professor of botany, whose lectures in the Botanic Garden he attended, acknowledging that his method of investigation was superior to the one he had learnt in England. On every side our kindly traveler met courtesy; it is easy to read from the invitations given him by strangers who merely chatted with him at first in Church or street, that the Rev. Joseph Townsend was what is called simpático. The Valasquez pictures were in his day still housed in the royal palace, and as yet undiscovered by the art public. Of the equestrian portraits he exclaimed with admiration: "I doubt whether five such horses, so perfect and so full of animation, were ever seen together."

Traveling slowly north to the Asturias, the cradle of Spanish nationality, he stopped for the night here and there in the villages. In one "the good Padre Cura gave me a most hospitable reception. The following day was Friday but the young priest was so attentive as to produce a fowl," which he insisted on his English visitors eating, as well as a fine trout, since he was not under their obligation to abstain from fish at the same meal with flesh.

In the ninth century Cámara Santa of Oviedo Cathedral, the relics and the indulgences attached to them called forth this statement: "All the bishops and (Catholic) men of learning with whom I have had the honor to converse, have solemnly assured me that without repentance and a firm belief in the atonement, no power on earth can absolve the guilty. When the points of difference between Protestant and Catholic shall be fairly and distinctly stated, they will have the better chance of coming to agreement."

A Noble Family

The mere mention of the name of Ellenborough, Lord Chief Justice of England, calls up before one the violent, opinionated man, hating our Catholic faith with all his soul and believing equally in the British constitution as the acme of perfection attainable by human wisdom; yet, for all his limitations, loving justice and loathing iniquity with no less thoroughness. The last man one would expect to be the father of saints, he has given us some of the brightest ornaments of the revived Catholic religion in his country. A profounder consideration of the matter may perhaps explain the paradox. The love of right and hatred of wrong, undisciplined in him but taking on a due restraint in his youngest son, was the natural element in the Law character on which grace built up the sanctity of some of his immediate descendants.

This youngest son, the Hon. William Towry Law, entered the army in early manhood. But falling in love in 1832, without finding in his profession the means to marry, he listened to his uncle, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who offered to provide for him in the Church. He therefore took orders in the Church of England, and for nearly twenty years lived the pleasant life of a country rector and Cathedral dignitary with good preferment. His own piety was sincere, while his wife, who died in 1844, was one of those admirable women who, innocent of formal heresy and corresponding to God's holy inspirations, form themselves by prayer and good works to a life of high Christian conduct. Their family, therefore, was brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord, so that when the great year of 1851 came with the Gorham Judgment and the consequent conversion of Archdeacon Manning, Mr. Law too renounced position and prospects to obey the divine call, and it was only to be expected that his children generally would follow him.

This they did. Not only did they, with one exception follow him into the Church, but some of them emulated the sanctity their father set before himself as his ideal. Religious life claimed some. The eldest, Augustus Henry, threw up his commission in the Royal Navy to enter the Society of Jesus, and to perish later in the wilds of Southern Africa, worn out with the privations and labors of the first mission to the Zambesi, a martyr to the Gospel, a victim of his zeal for Christ's Kingdom and the salvation of the heathen, and, alas! a victim of his charity for his own brother who, having received the sacred priesthood, had abandoned his faith and his vocation for the fleeting things of this world.

Thirty years have gone since Augustus Law left earth for heaven in his prime. The Matabele to whom he announced the Gospel no longer hold the land. The railway is there and the gold-miner and the herdsman, and cities are springing up in the solitudes he traversed with his companions. His father survived him but a short time, dying full of years and ripe in merits in 1886. The brother for whom he laid down his life—we may not fathom the mystery of Providence—died, apparently unrepentant, only the other day; and now the Church in England is the poorer by the loss of Major-General Victor Law, the youngest of the sons of William Towry Law and Augusta-Champagne Graves. Born in 1842, he was only two years old when he was carried to his mother's bedside to receive her dying blessing; and, unconscious of the tremendous meaning of death, he seems to have thought she was about to make an ordinary journey; for, we are told, he cried cheerily: "'Bye mamma! 'Bye mamma!" Perhaps this is but another example of the revelation of things hidden to the little ones, a presage of his future life which was to end in the reunion of mother and son forever in the company of the Blessed.

Victor Law was sent betimes to Oscott and at seventeen entered the Madras Cavalry with which he served thirteen years. During this time his wife, Mary Bowden, died, leaving him an only daughter, who entered the Visitation Order and is now Superior of the Convent at Harrow. In 1872 he passed into the Indian Political Department and was Agent or Resident with several native princes. In these offices he displayed a gentle charity which made him dear to all natives. He studied their character and, having a perfect knowledge of their language, heard their grievances patiently and sympathetically. He was, besides the constant friend and supporter of our missions and many a missionary to-day remembers him before God for his bounty. His model Christian life was an example to all, as every one who in any way came in contact with him acknowledged. Retiring with the rank of Major-General in 1898, he settled down in England, having married in 1875 his second wife, the daughter of the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, the Hon. John Crawford. In 1907 he was stricken with heart disease but lingered on for three years and more full of Christian courage and resignation. His thoughts were fixed on God and he was unceasing in prayer. The things of the world were forgotten. Sometimes an amusing book was offered him to relieve the tedium of sickness, but it had no attraction for a heart that was already in heaven. Frequent Communion was his delight and the Holy Mass. He had a singular devotion to the Mother of God and was generous in his alms for the souls in Purgatory. With regard to death he had made his own St. Augustine's words: "Where Thou wilt, when Thou wilt, as Thou wilt." He passed to his reward on Friday, April 15, 1910. Pope Leo XIII, in consideration of his many services to religion, honored him with the Knighthood of St. Gregory the Great.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Citizens and Voters

These terms are neither synonymous nor interchangeable, for one who is not a citizen may be qualified to vote, and a citizen may be denied that power. Any person born in the United States is a citizen of the United States. By a fiction of the law the residence of a foreign ambassador or minister at Washington is peculiarly under the protection of the flag of the country that he represents and is exempt from certain police regulations. It is so near to being foreign soil that if the ambassador or minister becomes a father, the child, though born in the United States, is not a citizen because he is born under a foreign flag.

Though subject to the United States, the people of Porto Rico and the Philippines are not citizens, because the rights of citizens have not been extended to them. The Constitution does not follow the flag. There is now under discussion a measure for conferring citizenship upon Porto Ricans who meet certain designated requirements, but it includes only a small fraction of the island's one million inhabitants. The Mexicans residing in the territory ceded to the United States at the end of the Mexican war were secured in their United States citizenship by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in 1848.

Aliens may obtain citizenship in virtue of the naturalization laws, which have lately been made somewhat more rigorous. The period of residence which was exacted in colonial days was only two years, but at the time of the Federalist ascendancy in the administration of President John Adams it was arbitrarily and unreasonably extended to fifteen years with the consequent effect of driving aliens into the Jefferson Republican party.

The Federal Government has solely the power to confer citizenship, but it leaves it to the several States to fix the qualifications of voters. In Arizona, for example, the citizens have no vote in Congress and no voice in a presidential election, and in the District of Columbia they are never called to the polls.

Since it rests with the different States to determine the qualifications of voters, we find considerable diversity of practice. As a matter of abstract power it is within the competency of New York to grant the suffrage, say, to married men to the exclusion of all others with the exception of only one class, or it could confine the suffrage, always with that one exception, to married women and spinsters, excluding all men. The exception which we have been careful to note is based on the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution, adopted in 1870, whereby the Congress and the States are denied the power to disfranchise a man on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. James G. Blaine and John Sherman are among the Republican leaders who regarded the Amendment as an unwise measure, but there it stands to-day, a part of the supreme law of the land.

No State grants manhood suffrage. Connecticut, Massachusetts and Wyoming fix an educational qualification; Tennessee exacts payment of poll tax; Ohio denies the suffrage to United States soldiers and sailors on duty in the State, and paupers are very generally excluded. Female citizens are on a level with male citizens in the four States of Colorado, Idaho, Wyoming and Utah. Although conviction of felony is the commonest cause for withholding the suffrage, New Hampshire does not exclude from the polls for that reason, and the convicts of a New York reformatory are not disqualified even though they may have been convicted of grave crimes. In some States, as, for example, Kansas and Missouri, citizenship is not demanded of the voter.

Foreign birth is not, in itself, a bar to any Federal office under the Constitution. Thus, had Albert Gallatin, a Swiss by birth, who was nominated for Vice-President in 1824, been elected and had President John Quincy Adams died in office, a naturalized citizen would have been our seventh President. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution, a foreign-born citizen who was thirty-five years of age and had spent twelve years in the country, was as eligible for the Presidency as any native son, but time has removed all such from the field of politics.

As the Constitution was originally framed, three-fifths of the slave population were counted in determining a State's representation in the popular branch of Congress, thus giving to a slave State a decided advantage over a free State in which there might be many more qualified voters. With the exception noted in the Fifteenth Amendment, the several States, therefore, are wholly unhampered by the Constitution or the Federal laws in determining who shall vote or not vote within their respective jurisdictions.

It is well understood that a State's representation in Congress determines its number of votes in the electoral college. In the first election, Virginia had ten votes to New York's eight; when the Old Dominion rose to twenty-one votes, the Empire State had but twelve. In 1908, New York cast thirty-nine votes for Taft, while Virginia gave all she had, namely twelve, to Bryan.

If New York should tire of her pre-eminence in the electoral college, section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution furnishes a simple and painless way of retiring to the class of Delaware and Wyoming: "When the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

But, as every State is eager for all possible influence in the electoral college, where a single vote may determine an election, as happened in 1876, it follows that no State is desirous of lessening its delegation in Congress. Any steps, therefore, that may be taken to restrict the suffrage are carefully studied out with one eye on the Constitution and the other on Congress, although this body has not thus far shown any serious purpose to use the power with which it is vested in the premises.

As the Organic Law now stands, infants, idiots and felons are an element of strength to a State in a Presidential election, as were the slaves in ante-bellum days. Our preference is for a House of Representatives whose membership shall be based upon the State's actual number of votes cast by bona fide citizens whether they be many or few. The State remaining free to restrict or to extend the suffrage, could, to the satisfaction of those most intimately concerned, frame election laws capable of enforcement without recourse to unworthy subterfuges.

The Church and Modern Literature

Under this title Father Baumgartner, in two splendid articles in the Stimmen aus Maria-Laach, comments on the unfortunate fact that literature, especially the Drama and the Novel, has in recent times more and more severed its connection with the Church.

Hence the fear that the Church might entirely lose its influence on the intellectual life of the nations. It has become fashionable in a certain camp of German Catholics to bewail our inferiority and to engage in a nervous activity for the reconquest of what are considered lost positions. This it is thought will be accomplished by getting into closer touch, on the field of literature, with the separated detachments of other religious denominations. But is it not much better to appreciate more fully and utilize more resolutely our own inexhaustible resources instead of going forth, with drums beating and colors flying, to pay homage to litterateurs by whom we are only despised and treated as pariahs?

Our Church has ever been in the fullest sense of the word a loving mother to civilization and belles-lettres. It is the Church that saved for us the books of the Old and New Testament, by which not only Dante, Calderon and Racine were educated, but Milton and Goethe as well. By creating the Missal and Breviary she has given to the world a permanent treasury of prose and poetry. It was the Church that kept alive the languages and literature of the Greeks and Romans, after the Greek and Roman world had gone to pieces, and assisted and directed the rebirth of the classical spirit, which had never died out in her bosom. Even the national poetry and folklore of the European races was saved only through her missionaries and was mostly written down for the first time by them.

For the thoroughgoing Protestant, light, civilization and literature begin in the sixteenth century—by the light of the burning monasteries which had been the planters of civilization on the whole continent, by the flames of libraries which represented the labor of centuries of book lovers, and by the destruction of millions of the rarest works of art. What could be expected of such a beginning? National literature in Protestant countries on the Continent came to a standstill, while Catholic Italy, France, and especially Spain, undisturbed by religious agitation, quietly pursued the course of their literary development and saw their literature enriched with invaluable productions. And what about the few Protestant authors of the same time and those of later centuries?

The Protestant theologians never succeeded in thoroughly converting the artists and poets, who always harbored a secret inclination to the old Church. The old house was so much grander and nobler, so much more beautiful, artistic and spacious. Shakespeare's poetry was Catholic, Van den Vondel, the founder of Dutch poetry, became a Catholic, Schiller in his best years looked into Catholic lands and Catholic history for the subject of his dramatic art. Uhland, the troubadour of medieval chivalry, gives full vent to his homesickness for the old Church. And what would Longfellow and Milton be if Catholic traditions were left out of their works? Goethe was right when he said: "You can't improve on Christianity."

The Church has indeed never allowed to poetry anything like a divine position; poetry is not the end of man, not even for this world. Yet no higher aim for poetry will ever be found than the share which it is accorded in the worship of the Most High, nor can more truly poetical and pure enjoyment be offered to the people than many of our readers have experienced when witnessing the Passion Play of Oberammergau. The Ages of Faith were also ages of unrestrained but innocent gayety and an exuberant and buoyant secular poetry. The Church has done infinitely more positively to support and encourage literature than to censure its transgressions.

There is the prejudice that the Church narrows our appreciation for nature and consequently restricts the limits of poetry. "How often," says Father Baumgartner, "did I meet with this charge in my studies on Goethe, as if before Goethe nobody had ever known anything of nature at all. I had to reassure myself by looking up Aristotle, Albertus Magnus, St. Thomas. And yet it is simply impossible to build upon Goethe either a system of natural science or a philosophy of nature. The poetry of the Middle Ages, above all that of the typical Catholic saint, Francis of Assisi, is full of the tenderest love for nature."

"But Faith mars the pleasures of life." No, it is sin that mars the pleasures of human existence. The Church, not having made sin, cannot do away with it. But she is commissioned to tell us how we may change the bitterness of our sorrows and death into glory and bliss. Goethe, when already afflicted with all the ills of old age, would at the sight of pagan sculptures dream of eternal beauty for the human body. What good can that do to the millions who are spending their lives in want and misery? The Church alone can change the dissonance of the creation into eternal harmony, because she alone possesses Him who holds the key to the mystery of suffering, who has conquered sin and death.

The world has undergone a great metamorphosis which is still in progress. It would be labor lost to lament the change. Modern achievements offer great scope for an energizing universal Church. But literature now suffers from evils formerly unknown. Legions of semi-educated men and women are wielding the pen, and many who never knew their catechism write about all the religions of the globe. Worse than this, Spinozism, Kantianism, Pantheism, French Positivism and German pessimism have permeated all the belles-lettres of the age. The calumnies of the so-called Reformers and the French Encyclopedists still dominate the historic novel: the Church is a failure, Christ Himself is little less than a failure. There is finally a boundless immorality; the poet of our days imagines he must pluck every flower that grows on the swamp of human passion, and our literature has gotten farther and farther out upon the swamp. But the swamp is declared nature, and on its muddy waters modern literature now floats about to its heart's content.

The growth of evils has kept pace with the gradual exclusion of the Church from public life. She alone has saved the sublime ideas and ideals which, like sunlit mountain peaks, rise above the swamps and lowlands of the modern world. No greater benefit can be bestowed on our national literature than the fidelity of Catholic writers to keep themselves within the full glare of her eternal brightness.

Our National Book Store

In our national capital there is a book store of which some of us know little, and some of us know less. It has no attractive show window display. It is perched above the madding crowd and each book is wrapped, ready for mailing at a moment's notice. Hundreds of books go forth daily to greedy purchasers. Ask the farmer of the Far West, he will tell you where it is. Ask the busy lawyer, he knows. As for the thousands of libraries from Alaska's icy mountains to Hawaii's foreign strand, why they could not get along without it. Ask the post-office clerk who handles the tons of registered mail which yearly go forth to be scattered broadcast; he, too, knows. They will all tell you that Uncle Sam's big book store is the Public Documents Office, now happily located in the Annex, the long, narrow seven-story red brick building on H street, just back of the old and original Government Printing Office building, its former home.

The Government Printing Office prints Uncle Sam's literature—and what a universal literature it is! Books about bugs and flowers, gold and silver, lead and tin, soldiers and sailors, middies and admirals, wars and rumors of wars, peace and her victories, history and mystery, technicalities and simplicities, engineering and farming; yea, and housekeeping, for is not every newspaper telling us even now about "Uncle Sam's cook books," one of which is known to the profession as "Farmers' Bulletin 391" and which, like the other 390 Farmers' Bulletins, goes to the most remote of Uncle Sam's purchasers for the cost price, one nickel. The special topic of this Bulletin 391 is the "Economical Use of Meat in the Home," and 1,000,000 copies of it have been printed by order of Congress.

As to pictures, why if there is anything from a patent dish-pan to a model capitol building not pictured in Uncle Sam's own books, then indeed it must be invisible even to the X-rays. If it appeared in America, whether a thing in the earth, on the earth, or above the earth, it has been mapped, or sketched or planned or photographed or engraved and is ready to satisfy your search to-day somewhere in that Documents Library, where solar eclipses, fossils, birds, fishes, fowls and all creation, animate and inanimate, are caught sooner or later by Uncle Sam's investigators and "done brown" in monotype, linotype, copper, stone, electroplate, or some other device of the printers' art. From an Indian grammar to a Presidential Proclamation, from Amerigo's map of the world to the latest reprint of L'Enfant's plan of Washington, from ancient history to the latest thing in tariffs, that Public Documents Library has it in black and white, and some of it in every color of the rainbow.

In the Congressional set alone (now referred to as "the late unlamented sheep set," from its troublesome features to librarians) there are private pension bills with tales pathetic; in the eulogies of our dead Congressmen are life stories told with purest eloquence and patriotic fire. Humor, pathos, logic, science in its most abstract, and again in its most poetic plays, all run between the lines of those books and pamphlets which have been turned out since our national history began and which so many regard as of interest to lawyer and statesmen alone.

But to the reader who is not content to take things at second-hand these varied documents prove a fund of educational matter. There we find whence come the various statues that ornament our capital; there we learn when each great department of the government took its rise, and when sprouted forth each distinct bureau in the great organization. There we find the speeches of Calhoun, Webster and Clay, to say nothing of those of our contemporary orators. Many letters come daily to this great field of original information, and many a farmer, scientist and historian sends in his cash, happy thereby to become the possessor of a document which is Uncle Sam's authority on the matter of vital importance to him.

If there is in this broad land a man who owns a horse and who doesn't yet possess a copy of what is known as the "Horse Book," the clerks of the Documents Office are not aware of his existence. The prodigious title of the book is "Special Report on Diseases of Horse; by Drs. Pearson, Michener, Law, Harbaugh, Trumbower, Liautard, Holcombe, Huidekoper, Stiles, Mohler and Adams. Revised edition. 1907. 608 p. 18 il. 41 pl. Price, Cloth, .65." The "Pub. Docs." Office sold edition after edition of this work as demand was unlimited.

And so in every line Uncle Sam seems to have made one or more "hits" in the book line. Certain Chemistry Bulletins go like the proverbial hot cakes, so do certain Geological Survey Bulletins; and the "Use Book" of the Forestry Service had made Pinchot's name a household word long before the Ballinger-Pinchot war.

Every governmental publishing office issues something which the people want and want right off. Some of these publications are worth their weight in gold to the buyer and he knows it. In his hurry, the new customer may send the convenient postage stamps in payment, but they soon find their way back to the sender for Uncle Sam wants cold cash for his books. The customer soon learns his lesson and next time sends his nickel or dime in the hollow of a piece of pasteboard which he has cut out for the purpose of expediting his purchase, and upon its receipt at the "Docs. Office," off goes the book by registered mail.

Uncle Sam likes to cater to the searching public, so he says to them through the Superintendent of Documents: "Tell me what you are interested in and I will send you a price list of what we have on the subject." Now that is just what we want. We like to see our own hobbies in print. We want to know just what Uncle Sam's boys have written about our favorite subjects, and so we get a dainty leaflet telling just that and no more.

The reading public is glad to-day that the inventory of public documents taken some fifteen years ago as so many cords of unassorted reading matter, has been transformed by classification genius into a systematized literature of universal scope, properly catalogued and listed, for reference and for sale. And now, instead of mouldering with age, the public documents of to-day, as well as of the century and a quarter past, are finding their way into every nook and corner of the country. Uncle Sam's book store has brilliantly established its mission as a medium between the government and the governed and may it live long to send the life-blood of the nation's history and research into the everyday life of the people.

CORRESPONDENCE

Some Priest-Novelists

LONDON, April 23, 1910.

A novel by Father Robert Hugh Benson—who has just been paying a brief visit to your Boston circles of culture—is now looked forward to as a regular feature of each London publishing season, and is assured of immediate notice in the press and a large circulation not only through lending libraries where people go to borrow books, but also in the shops where they buy them, and for a novel to be largely bought means that it is generally considered worth more than one rapid reading. There was a time, and not many years ago, when distinctly Catholic novels were hardly read by any non-Catholics. Thus the late Lady Georgiana Fullerton's stories, excellent as they were in point of construction and literary workmanship, were issued by a Catholic firm and found but few Catholic readers. Catholic novelists of that very recent time, if they wished for a large sale, and had to depend on their work for a livelihood, had to be content to keep distinctly Catholic topics out of their books, or in the background, and to be content to write as Catholics only in so far as there was a Catholic spirit in their work and their view of human life. But now novels dealing boldly with Catholic life find a large circle of readers in the general public, and amongst our Catholic novelists who thus successfully appeal to the great mass of the people Father Benson holds undoubtedly the foremost place.

Last year he dealt with the Catholic view of Spiritism in his story of "The Necromancers." This year in "A Winnowing" he makes another bold venture into the border land of the unseen, and the central idea of his plot is daringly original. It is indeed so bold that in less skilful hands it might easily destroy all illusion of reality. The "winnowing" is the separation of the chaff from the wheat in human life and conduct by an objective realization of the issues that depend upon it in the life to come. The hero of the story is a British squire, a wealthy, highly respectable and respected man, with a keenness for honest sport, a good fellow all round as men go, and moreover a Catholic, but one who takes his religion as one and not the greatest factor in his life, without any particular zeal for it. He is an every-day man whose enthusiasm finds other outlets. There is nothing bad about him, but much that is respectably commonplace.

He is taken ill and dies—or at least he is to all appearance dead—dead so far that the doctors are ready to certify the fact and preparations are in progress to close his earthly record with a highly respectable funeral. His wife is praying frantically that he may be given back to her, feeling all the while she is asking for the impossible, but the impossible, or the apparently impossible, happens. He comes back to life.

"Suspended animation," say the doctors, happy in finding a formula that will serve as an explanation. But it has been more than a mere trance or fit or coma. The seemingly dead man has had a vision of the unseen world. He is like one come back from the dead. And all that follows shows how, to the no small dismay of his home circle and friends, he lives his new life in the light of what was once a half-realized belief but is now reality known by experience. It is a most suggestive study of imaginary conditions, and at the same time an indirect criticism of the half-hearted profession of their faith, which allows so many to give half-measure of service to God. The novel is a sermon that will have tens of thousands of attentive hearers.

A novelist cannot be said to have achieved thorough popularity until his books have reached the sixpenny edition stage—the cheap issue that runs into tens of thousands. One of Father Benson's books has just been republished in this form, and it is remarkable that the novel in question is "The Conventionalists," the story of a young man's conversion and vocation to the contemplative life of the Carthusians, a book that brings prominently forward aspects of Catholic life the least understood by, and sometimes the most repellent to, the average non-Catholic. It is difficult to overestimate the good such a book may do, when thus largely circulated, as a means of breaking down the old Protestant tradition, and removing some at least of the ignorance on which it flourishes.

But Father Benson is not our only popular priest-novelist. One of the successes of the present season is Canon Sheehan's "Blindness of Dr. Gray," a charming story of Irish life reviewed some time ago in AMERICA, with for its central figure the old parish priest, Dr. Gray, whose "blindness" is at first a stern rigidity that warps his views; but it gives way to the underlying kindness and goodness of his heart under the many troubles of which the physical loss of sight is only one.

Then we have in Dr. William Barry a writer of serious fiction that has won for him a widespread popularity, but who also does good service as a critic of current literature and thought in the pages of the Quarterly Review, to which he has been a regular contributor for many years.

Another priest who writes successful novels, hides his identity under the nom-de-guerre of "John Ayscough." Most of those who read his books have no idea that the writer is a Catholic army chaplain. His latest work is a masterly historical novel, telling the story of Celestine V. It presents the abdication in a very different form from that in which Dante viewed the "gran rifiuto," and with a truer vision. Dante, his contemporary, saw in Celestine's abdication only an act of pusillanimity, and places him among the sluggards and cowards on the very margin of hell. "Let us not speak of them, but look and pass them by," says Virgil scornfully as he points to them. But the Church honors the misjudged Pope as a saint, and praises his sublime act of humility in the office of "St. Peter Celestine, Pope and Confessor," and founder of the Celestine order. "John Ayscough" has a striking theme in the story of the gentle hermit torn from his cell, forced against his protests to accept the Triple Crown, and struggling to find his way back to his hermitage.

The work of these four priests is only one of the many welcome indications that Catholics, writing boldly and freely on Catholic topics, can now secure a hearing from the great mass of the British public. Another sign of the great change that is in progress is the fact that Catholic books are no longer issued only by two or three exclusively Catholic houses. Several of the leading non-Catholic publishing firms now include Catholic books in their lists, and the number of important books of the kind issued by the historic firm of Longmans, Green and Co. is so considerable that they now publish a special catalogue of their Catholic books.

The Augsburg "Katholikentag"

AUGSBURG, APRIL 23, 1910.

Among German Catholics attention is beginning to centre at this early date upon the preparations being made for the "Catholic Day" (Katholikentag) to be held in Augsburg, in Bavaria, next August. These annual assemblies mean so much to us. Begun in the revolutionary days of 1848-49, they have been during the past sixty years a principal means of cementing the union of Catholics in Germany and of strengthening their courage and faith. Year after year they have grown in importance and enthusiasm, and the inhabitants of the city of Augsburg are already planning to make the present year's congress surpass all of its predecessors in imposing splendor. Some of the old energy that made Augsburg so great a centre of commerce and art in its days of fame as an imperial free city, lives still in its people and inspires them to fitting effort when the occasion demands. And surely their city will afford worthy setting for the striking scenes that mark the yearly gatherings of representative Catholics from all parts of the Empire.

Augsburg is a city of splendid churches. Most of them are structures dating from the Middle Ages, extended and rebuilt, often with change of style. They abound in fine paintings and sculptures and the masterpieces of the goldsmith's art. And in the most venerable of these, the Catholic Cathedral, a beautiful example of the Gothic architecture of the fourteenth century, the imposing religious services marking the Katholikentag will be celebrated. A feature of the preliminary work, which is especially gratifying, is the alacrity with which our non-Catholic fellow-citizens are joining with the Catholics to assure the needed funds to adorn fittingly the city for the assembly week as well as to provide suitable entertainment for the thousands who are expected to visit Augsburg at the time. A guarantee of 130,000 marks has already been secured by the General Committee in charge with an additional assurance of money to meet any deficit this sum may fail to cover.

A difficulty facing the committee at the beginning has been happily set aside. This was the question of a suitable convention hall in which the vast crowd might assemble to listen to the papers to be read and the discussions which are announced to follow the reading. Happily there is in the beautiful city park a hall used for gatherings of the people and this, with hearty courtesy, the municipal authorities have offered to the committee as a proper place for the public sessions of the Congress. The hall is not large enough for the thousands expected to attend, but it is proposed to add to it an annex of spacious size at an expense of 48,000 marks, of which sum the municipality volunteers to pay 20,000 marks. At the close of the meeting the annex will be turned over to the city as a lasting memorial of the assembly of 1910.

Needless to say there is already prepared a strong program of papers to be read by devoted, able and eloquent leaders who will be present at the Congress from every part of Germany. Only the important, actual questions that touch the life of the people most intimately will be handled by the famous Catholic orators chosen to address the public meetings. The main work of the Congress, as is the usual custom in these assemblies, will be done in committees, where resolutions will be prepared, the new needs of the Catholic body considered, first enterprises planned and the improvements of existing works determined upon. The intervening months will be busy ones for those who must perfect the details of the general plans already mapped out. That their zealous labors shall meet success goes without saying; the spirit that has inspired the work of similar gatherings in the past six decades still lives in the hearts of our German Catholics.

The Irish Capuchins

CORK, April 15.

There has just passed away in Belgium, at an advanced age, a French Capuchin, Very Rev. Father Siméon, who initiated the reconstruction of the Irish Province of his Order and is still well remembered in Cork, the chief centre of his reformatory work. When Father Theobald Mathew, after he left Maynooth in 1808, joined the Capuchin Order it was "the lowliest and least influential of the Regular Orders in Ireland." It is now one of the best organized and most progressive, noted for missionary activity and intellectual culture. This is largely due to Father Siméon. Only those who remember the Order when it was represented in Cork by two solitary priests, the late Rev. D. McLeod and Rev. Lewis Reardon, in the church of the Most Holy Trinity, built by Father Mathew, can fully appreciate the change. This church, the frontage of which was only recently completed, replaced the old friary chapel in Blackmoorlane, in which labored the celebrated Father Arthur O'Leary, whom Henry Grattan described as "poor in everything but genius and philosophy." With him was Father Daniel Donovan, who had a very narrow escape from being guillotined during the Reign of Terror in Paris, where he was chaplain to a French nobleman and was actually being conveyed in a tumbril to the place of execution.

Father McLeod and Father Reardon lived apart in separate houses; there was no community life and for years the habit was not worn by the Irish and Italian Capuchins, who administered the Irish province, until on the arrival of Father Siméon, 1875, the normal régime was restored.

Father Siméon was a native of Mondon in the diocese of Besançon, and was early attracted to the Capuchin Order. One day when in Paris he saw some Capuchins passing and said to himself, "that is the Order for me. That is the Order I will join." He at once offered himself and was accepted. After making his novitiate at Versailles, he pursued his studies at Nîmes under the strict rule of a Prussian Capuchin, a strong disciplinarian, who left the impress of his mind and character upon him.

He was a great advocate and promoter of religious observance, more or less on the primitive model, and for that reason was selected for the work desired to be done in Ireland, where laxity, a consequence of the destructive effect of the Penal Code, had crept in and caused strict observance to fall into disuse. It was his mission to restore it, and he succeeded. After a brief sojourn in Dublin, he was sent as lector in theology to Kilkenny; and when the late Rev. David Albert Mitchell was appointed Custos Provincial, succeeded him as novice-master. The novitiate was subsequently removed to Rochestown, near Cork, where he built the pretty little church adjoining the house, since expanded into a spacious and well-equipped monastery and college. Meanwhile the Province was divided, the Dublin and Kilkenny houses being placed under the jurisdiction of the Rev. D. P.

O'Reilly and Cork and Rochestown under Father Siméon as Commissary-General.

The most noteworthy incident during the latter's tenure of public office was the wearing of the habit in public and the disuse of the ordinary clerical attire; a new departure, or rather a return to old usage, which has since been also adopted by the Irish Friars Minor of the Leonine union. It created something of a sensation in Cork. For the first time, after a long lapse of years, people saw with wonderment Capuchin friars, with the full Capuchin tonsure, bareheaded, habited and sandalled walking along the country roads and through busy city streets. It was like a resurrection of the thirteenth century friars suddenly reappearing in the midst of the nineteenth century.

It was a bold move and gave rise to no little comment, and even some opposition, in clerical and lay circles. But Father Siméon resolutely held his course, fortified by the encouraging approval and sanction of the Bishop of the diocese, the Most Rev. Dr. Delany. It was a courageous proceeding which made tabula rasa of one of the obnoxious clauses or "wings" of the Catholic Emancipation Act, levelled against the Religious Orders, theoretically outlawed in revenge, it has been assumed, for the large share the Augustinian Bishop Doyle, the famous "J. K. L." had in O'Connell's successful agitation.

That particular clause, a concession to the bigotry of past times, had become long obsolete, and any attempt to enforce it—which could only be done by the Attorney General, proprio motu—would have been an absurd anachronism.

The continuous wearing of the habit, besides having an important bearing upon the restoration of conventual usages, was a conspicuous object lesson on the progress of Catholicism, on its rejuvenescence after the great O'Connell had flung off the shackles that had so long bound it. "Resurgam" is writ large on the pages of Irish ecclesiastical as well as civil history. The Irish Capuchins have had their part in it. Now a flourishing province, they have thoroughly identified themselves with the religious and national spirit of the New Ireland in which their lot is cast. Father Siméon led the way in the domain of religious renovation.

Preparatory to this end he built a new convent in Cork, modelled on other houses of the Order and more adapted to the conventual life than the ordinary dwelling which had hitherto housed the community. His zeal for strict observance led him to introduce the midnight office and to revive other long-forgotten usages. When he retired from office, and was replaced by Father Seraphim of Bruges, he received a congratulatory letter from the General, who, in graceful terms, gave him due credit for the restoration of the regular observance in Ireland. After leaving Ireland he lived in Lyons near the celebrated sanctuary of Our Lady at Fourvières until the recent expulsion led to his seeking refuge in Belgium, where he died. He is reverently remembered among all classes in Cork.

Brazil's New President

In my last communication to AMERICA I said that Marshal Hermes da Fonseca was a well-known Freemason; however, justice requires that I should make known his public announcement to the contrary. In an interview, given on Jan. 29, 1910, when questioned by Father Lewis Espechit, the editor of a Catholic weekly of Rio de Janeiro, the marshal vehemently repudiated all feelings of hostility towards Catholics. He claims, that since he discovered Freemasonry was not devoted exclusively to works of benevolence, he has severed all relations with it. After advancing to the eighteenth degree, and seeing that its promises of beneficence were not all fulfilled, he abandoned it. "However," he continues, "on the publication of my candidature for President, some of my friends, thinking to secure to me the votes of the Freemasons, caused me to be elected to the thirty-third degree. I hope it is evident to all that I am not responsible for these zealous endeavors."

When pressed, concerning his proposed election as Grand Master of the Brazilian Freemasons, his Excellency answered: "As I have abandoned Freemasonry entirely, I could not, of course, accept this dignity. Hence, when asked by one of my friends, if I would accept, I promptly replied in the negative." The marshal said further, that he had already given many proofs of his good-will towards the Catholic Church, as for instance, in his having presented it with ground and a building for chapel purposes. On Father Espechit's touching on the question of Religious Orders, his Excellency replied: "I know that the nation is wholly Catholic, and even had I the intention or the will to persecute the religious orders, it would be but to provoke a most unpatriotic struggle. But, why should I persecute them? I acknowledge their great merits and devotedness, and the great good they have done our nation. For years the Orders have maintained here most important establishments. It would be foolish not to acknowledge the good that the Orders have done and are now doing."

Cardinal Fischer on Catholic Action

Our Most Reverend Archbishop, Cardinal Fischer, in his last lenten pastoral touched upon three topics, reference to which will surely prove quite as interesting to you in America as to us here in Germany. The Cardinal has a reputation for plain speaking, which makes his utterances the more valuable. Referring to coeducation he said: "It is surprising as it is saddening to note how Catholics and even Catholic women, are beginning to advocate coeducation especially for the higher schools. It has become the ideal system in the judgment of certain classes of society, just as the so-called sectarian schools are growing in favor among certain Catholics. And yet for a Catholic, the preservation of the purity of morals, to say nothing of other weighty reasons, should prove a decisive argument against coeducation."

"The system can be permitted only in small country districts and even in these its evil effects must be prevented by special watchfulness on the part of teachers, parents and priests. Unfortunately, some of our Catholics are so ensnared by the Zeitgeist that they find specious pretexts to recommend an early freedom of mixing on the part of boys and girls to the detriment of delicacy and in contradiction to the traditions of Catholic training."

The Cardinal has something to say as well of the growing influence of Catholic associations. He gives unstinted praise to the activities of the Catholic Volksverein, whose headquarters are in his own episcopal city, and he is full of encouragement in his reference to other organizations flourishing in his diocese, especially the many Catholic workingmen's associations. Noting the custom prevailing in these societies to have in the weekly or monthly meetings two addresses, one on some social topic, the other on a point of Catholic apologetics, the Cardinal declares: "It occurs to me too much stress is laid on the apologetic element. It is of course necessary to refute current objections against the Church and her doctrines. But positive teaching, the building up of a systematic knowledge of the truths of our Catholic belief should ever occupy the first place in such addresses. Let the grandeur and beauty of our Faith and the glorious achievements of the Catholic past be unfolded before our people to rouse in them an enthusiastic love for our Holy Church. And let our people be urged to nourish this love by the frequent reception of the Sacraments and by assisting at Mass and other ecclesiastical devotions."

The Cardinal in this connection warmly commends the several houses of retreats in his diocese in which Catholic men assemble to follow in solitude the spiritual exercises of St. Ignatius. Finally his Eminence touches upon a topic vastly important in every land to-day. "It is commendable," he writes, "to act in concert with the members of other demoninations to defend in public life what is common to both, for instance the Christian character of the school, or to ward off the attacks of infidels. But this must not lead to a mixing of religions or to a suppressing of Catholic influence where it should exert itself. If religion disappears from public life, indifferentism will shake the Christian foundation of society. Unfortunately it happens that some of our Catholic people, not having clear ideas on this point, advocate an interdenominationalism which leaves no trace at all of real religion. They even go so far as to avoid the name Catholic; and instead of manfully confessing our Holy Catholic faith they speak of 'the Christian view,' thus allowing the impression that the Christian view is not of greater value than e. g. 'the atheistic view.' It is high time that we Catholics be proud to profess our Catholic name, that we sedulously seek the Catholic element in every phase of our lives."

A good piece of advice and, as I said, just as needed with you in America as here among us in Germany.

Loans are much needed in China for railway development. No reliance can be placed on native companies, and they offer few guarantees that they can raise the funds needed. There is, however, much international rivalry, and the activity of wealthy magnates competing for China's favors is an interesting feature of the present hour.

During the past two years trade has been suffering from depression. At present, there is a little improvement, crops have been better and certain conditions in Europe and America give ground for encouragement and a general feeling of hopefulness for the prosperity of 1910.

Despatches from Chile state that the Board of Health of Santiago has asked of the Government a medical commission to devise means for combating the bubonic plague which has obtained a footing in Antiofagasta, Iquique and other towns. Each centre reported ten cases in a week. The contagion has also reached Peru.

King Edward's Death

It is yet far too early to see if the almost sudden death of England's King is one of those dramatic events that change the history of the world. But the general feeling is that his reign of nine years has been so fruitful in the blessings of peace that its untimely ending is universally deplored. He succeeded to the throne of the British Empire after the extraordinarily long and prosperous reign of his wise and revered mother, Queen Victoria. During the almost forty years between his majority and his accession he was known as a prince of admirable tact, combining fearlessness and frankness with the stern power of drawing the line whenever his associates ventured to presume too much on his amiability. These qualities revealed themselves to the public as yet unacquainted with his social gifts when he became king in 1901. He it was who ended the South African war which had hastened his mother's death as the present conduct of the House of Commons has hastened his own. He it was who won the heart of the Irish people more than any of his predecessors, when on the occasion of his visit to the sister kingdom in 1903, he said that Ireland should be governed according to Irish ideas and that it should have a university representing the religious and educational views of its inhabitants.

In foreign affairs the late King achieved a friendly understanding with France, embracing the settlement of differences with Italy and Spain, and brought about a still more definite agreement with Russia, hitherto Great Britain's hereditary foe. So solid were these gains for peace that a distinguished French diplomatist, intimately informed in all French and Russian affairs, predicted that the King would be known in history as "Edward the Peacemaker."

At home, albeit known privately to have Liberal and Home Rule sympathies, he kept strictly aloof from all political parties and was ever loyally a constitutional sovereign as his mother before him. During his reign there has arisen in the United Kingdom a very grave clash of interests and classes, which, especially within the past year, has seemed to urge upon him an exercise of the royal prerogative unknown for nearly two centuries. And just when the arduous and perplexing duty of reconciling the Lords and Commons loomed over against him with insistent clamor and tragic intensity he is cut off by the King of Kings.

Despite the strong self-governing and socialistic tendencies of vast multitudes in the British Isles the people, as a whole, were sincerely attached to their monarch. The expression of popular grief at his death makes one wonder if, were the general election, unavoidable for this summer, to take place immediately, it might not sweep from power the Liberals who have certainly embittered and shortened his last days.

King George V has a terrible situation to face. Time alone can tell if his wisdom equals his outspoken courage. Catholics have always regretted that Edward VII pronounced with his lips those infamous clauses against the Real Presence in the Coronation Oath. Will his son, too, submit to the odious tyranny of such a relic of blind fanaticism?

Mr. Leishman Blamed.

A startling bit of information comes to us from Italy, which throws new light on Mr. Roosevelt's conduct in the Vatican incident, though by no means exonerating him or rendering unmerited the severe criticisms of the American press. The editor of that reliable paper, Rome, informs us that Mr. Roosevelt was led into his deplorable mistake by Mr. Leishman, the American Ambassador. As an answer to the Colonel's request for an audience at the Vatican, Mr. Leishman sent the following communication which he had duly received from the Rector of the American College: "The Holy Father will be delighted to grant an audience to Mr. Roosevelt on April 5, and he hopes nothing will arise to prevent it, such as the much-regretted incident which made the reception of Mr. Fairbanks impossible."

This was the only part of his communication which Mr. Leishman gave to the press. No one ever suspected he had adroitly suppressed a most important addition of his own, which for obvious reasons he did not care to have published. But Mr. Roosevelt has since made good the omission.

"I merely transmit this communication," said Mr. Leishman, "without having committed you in any way to accept the conditions imposed, as the form appears objectionable, clearly indicating that an audience would be cancelled in case you should take any action while here that might be constructed as countenancing the Methodist work here as in the case of Mr. Fairbanks. Although fully aware of your intention to confine your visit to the King and the Pope the covert threat in the Vatican's communication to you is none the less objectionable, and one side or other is sure to make capital out of the action you might take. The press is already preparing for the struggle."

What Mr. Roosevelt would have done, had he been allowed to read and interpret Mgr. Kennedy's message for himself, is now a matter of speculation; he could hardly fail to see the kindly intent. It remained for Mr. Leishman, an ally of continental Freemasons and an enemy of the papacy, to discern a "covert threat" and giving a sinister interpretation to a most courteous and respectful invitation to thrust the same on one lately emerged from the jungle and unacquainted with the happenings in Europe during his protracted expedition. Mr. Leishman should never have taken part in the affair. Mr. Roosevelt, on his own representation, was coming to Rome as a private citizen. The official interference of the Ambassador had the sanction neither of law nor custom. His duty is to keep aloof from all negotiations with the Vatican and to use the influence of his position solely for matters affecting the relations between Washington and the Quirinal.

Every fair-minded reader of this suppressed addition to the message will be filled with indignation at the unwarranted interjection of a hostile commentary and with contempt for the disingenuousness displayed in suppressing it. The Vatican was not informed of Mr. Roosevelt's intention to "confine himself to a visit to the King and the Pope." One may reasonably doubt whether any such intention ever existed, for Mr. Roosevelt received the Freemasons and delivered an address at a public banquet in the Capitol. Mr. Leishman's activity does little credit to himself and is a reflection on the Administration; his officiousness belittles his high office and gives offence to millions of American Catholic citizens and countless others who share their views.

The Press and the Public

In a striking speech at a recent newspaper gathering the press, with one notable exception, was warmly commended by a prominent lay guest, who said that it could do much good and little harm and it generally aimed at doing good. A few days previously an experienced journalist delivered a lecture at a New England University in quite a different vein. Having by his ability and character brought the Charleston News and Courier and the Richmond Times-Dispatch into national repute, Mr. Hemphill was selected to address the University students on "The Press and Public Opinion."

The press, he said, is in the business for the money there is in it. Its most potent factors are beggars at the door of patronage. The most sensational papers make most money and exert most influence. In their hunt for popularity they follow the yellow streak that runs through the people, catering to the worst and most malodorous tendencies of the age. Hence "there has been noted for years the gradual degradation of the American press to the American level," and whereas "its mission ought to be the elevation of the public, it advertises its degradation." Instead of being judge and jury as it ought to be, the newspaper is the swift witness, paid counsellor and partizan advocate in cases on trial before the people.

A practical journalist's indictment has more value in this connection than a mayor's panegyric; it is also more in accord with experience. The papers of widest circulation, as a rule, inflame popular passions in their editorials and feed them in their news columns. They follow when it pays, and lead when they are paid. They have incited to unnecessary war abroad, promoted and embittered dissensions at home and glutted the cravings of the prurient. The "yellow" stigma has ceased to be the peculiar mark of the original exploiters of passion; the journals that stigmatized them at first have generally followed their lead and often in assuming their colors have deepened the tint. The evil has become so widespread that it has ceased to be a stigma and even papers that bar it from their editorials feature it in their news. The following has wide application to the readers as well as the makers of newspapers:

"That newspaper is unworthy, which, for personal profit or political gain for itself or its party, misrepresents the position of a professional or political rival; that follows any particular course because it is popular; that joins in the defamation of any man because there is something to be made out of it, either in the way of increased circulation or adventitious importance."

The remedy lies with the people. When public opinion declines to patronize the rabidly partizan, the sensational and the indecent, the organs of public opinion will cease to supply them; when chastity of heart and mind and honor is respected by the public, it will be respected by the press. It is a hopeful sign that Mr. Hemphill has been able to enhance not only the moral and educational but the commercial value of his paper by a strict adherence to his own principles.

Cremation in the Church of England

The Church of England has no objection to cremation. Individual members may be horrified at it; but the Church as an organization in this, as in everything else, forms its conscience on acts of Parliament and judicial decisions. Chancellor Kempe of the diocese of St. Albans holds the incumbent of a parish to be bound to read the funeral service over a cremated parishioner or to permit it to be read by another clergyman in case he has a difficulty in the matter, and that he may read part before cremation and part after it. His authorities are: "The Queen vs. Price, 1884;" "Chancellor Tristram in re Dixon, 1892," "The Burial Acts," "The Cremation Act, 1902," and not last in his enumeration but certainly least, "Canon 68."

The Specialist as Professor

In the course of a highly appreciative paper on the late Father Tabb, in the Book News Monthly, the writer of the article declares that Father Tabb "was not a specialist; he perhaps omitted much of the minutiae of dates and technique; he had not even the magical 'Ph.D.' appended to his name; but, in spite of these seemingly insurmountable obstacles, he caused his students to feel the beauty of the classics."

We are inclined to believe that the condition of not being a specialist, far from standing as an obstacle in the path of a teacher, is just as often as not a favorable circumstance. The modern idea of scholarship consists in a textual familiarity with a certain author's work, rather than in a sympathetic understanding of the spirit which informs it. How many times does this word or that occur? Is this conjunction or preposition an interpolation? Is that form of the sentence a later emendation? And so on ad nauseam.

Was it for this caterpillar's work of laying bare skeleton structures that the flowers of literature grew up and were preserved through the ages? And yet it is success in propounding and answering such questions that qualifies a man to act as a professor according to modern pedagogical standards. Culture yields to science; literature to philology; and youths with hearts and aspirations turn away yawning and asking, What's the use?

Specialists are good in their own place; but that place ordinarily is not the professor's chair among undergraduates. We admire the specialist as a man who has sacrificed himself for the general good. He has put blinders on himself and settled down to a life-long jog-trot in a narrow groove. His patience and industry carry us over rough spots in the road which we could not pass without his aid. He is infinitely preferable as a type to the shoddy smatterer who laughs at him. But, with all his virtues, he is not fitted by his training and hardly ever by his temperament, to catch the imagination of growing young minds and to lead them onward to that land of enchantment east of the sun and west of the moon.

The press accounts of a celebration held a few days ago in Washington make interesting reading when paralleled with an item regarding Poland in our Chronicle of this week. The contrast in the policy of two great powers in their dealing with the Polish people is a striking one.

On May 11 statues of Generals Thaddeus Kosciuszko and Casimir Pulaski were unveiled in the Capital. The monument to Pulaski has been erected by the Federal Government as a token of the appreciation which is felt for his services under General Washington, while the companion statue is a gift to the people of this country from the Polish National Alliance.

The unveiling was accompanied by elaborate ceremonies in the presence of many thousand Polish-Americans. Bishop Paul Rhode, vicar general of the Chicago Archdiocese, and the only Polish-American member of the hierarchy in the United States, asked the blessing, after which speeches were made by President Taft, the Secretary of War and John Smulski, of Chicago.

Cardinal Gibbons, commenting on the death of King Edward, said: "The death of King Edward is the greatest calamity that could befall England and all her possessions. The news will be received with deep regret by the whole civilized world, for he was a man of peace and eminent tact." The Cardinal's words recall the jingle of the old rhyme that has come down from the days when "Merrie" England was "Our Lady's Dowrie:"

"When Our Lord's Day
Falls in Our Lady's lap
England will meet
With some great mishap."

This year Good-Friday fell on March 25, the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin.

Answering the querulous question why the women of Colorado, where they are on a par with men at the polls, do not cure the political corruption in that State, Judge Ben. B. Lindsey says: "If any one believes that woman's suffrage is a panacea for all the evils of our political life, he does not know what those evils are. The women are as free from the power of the Beast as men are—and no freer. They are bound by the same bread-and-butter considerations as the rest of us. The leaders in politics are politicians; when they get their nominations from the corporation machines, they do the work of the corporations. Women in politics are human beings; they are not 'ministering angels' of an ethereal ideality, and they are unable to free us because they are not free themselves. In all moral issues the women voters make a loyal legion that cannot be betrayed to the forces of evil; and however they are betrayed—as we all are—in campaigns against the Beast, the good that they do in an election is a great gain to a community and a powerful aid to reform."

SPEER'S SLANDERS ONCE MORE

It looks as if the advertising and display agent of the Student Volunteer Movement for enlightening South America has aroused more attention than he cared for or expected. His extraordinary statements in The Literary Digest of February 5, now a number of melancholy celebrity, called forth a letter of inquiry to the editor from a Baltimore lawyer, who like many more of his co-religionists, was not a little astonished at the information on Catholic subjects supplied with such prodigality by the bell-wether of the new apostles.

Now and then we hear of a blackmailing sheet which battens upon the fears, the foibles or the follies of human kind but, as a general rule, newspaper folk, though eager to be in the first rank of their profession, do not sacrifice honor to the idol of enterprise. To some extent, they are creatures of circumstances, even unwilling slaves of the same; yet, if in their praiseworthy desire to serve up the freshest and choicest to their patrons, they are betrayed through human fallibility into some glaring perversion of the truth, they do not hide their heads in the sand and consider themselves secure from observation. There is a straightforward and manly way of admitting a mistake and of righting a wrong.

In due time, our legal friend's request to the Digest for more light elicited the following reply:

EDITORIAL ROOMS OF THE LITERARY DIGEST.

44-60 East 23d Street

New York, April 14, 1910.

Mr. Robert Biggs,
Baltimore, Md.,

Dear Sir:

We have received a letter from Mr. Robert E. Speer, giving his authority for his statements about the clergy of South America. In his reply he says that the pastoral letter of the Archbishop of Venezuela "was printed in full two years ago in 'The Constitutional,' one of the leading daily papers in the city of Caracas," and that the alleged encyclical of Pope Leo to the clergy of Chili was issued in 1897, and "extracts from it have been printed in reliable books." Mr. Speer adds: "I had not heard that its genuineness had been disputed. If it is spurious I trust that this can be shown, and I shall join in preventing its further quotation. The genuineness of the letter of the Archbishop of Venezuela I think is indisputable."

I have employed a man to look through the files of the "Civiltà Cattolica" for the year the alleged encyclical was supposed to have appeared, and for the years before and after that date, without finding the document, so that its authenticity seems to be in considerable doubt.

If we should print Mr. Speer's letter, I think it would merely start up more acrimonious discussion, so that, as we have already presented both sides of the case, I think we had better let it rest as it is for the present.

Very truly,

WM. S. WOODS,
Editor.

But the member of the bar, though duly impressed, we are quite sure, with the foregoing neat little essay on "the whatness of the which," craved for something less fanciful than a rainbow in the clouds. His hunger for facts, stubborn facts, prompted this second letter:

APRIL 18, 1910.

Mr. William S. Woods, Editor, "Literary Digest," 44 E. 23d St., New York,

Dear Sir:

Your favor of the 14th inst., quoting extracts from a statement from Mr. Speer, received.

Mr. Speer is evidently a man of education. Referring to your quotations, he says, "Extracts from the (the alleged encyclical) have been printed in reliable books. . . . I had not heard that its genuineness had been doubted. If it is spurious, I trust that this can be shown, and I shall join in preventing its further publication." It seems almost impossible that a man who lays any claim to fairness and who could have so readily secured access to the encyclical itself, having before him "reliable books," could give such vague references as authority for a paper which he must have known would be regarded as a most serious charge against the church to which so many thousands of his fellow-citizens are adherents.

In following up this matter, I am not inspired by any desire to stir up "acrimonious discussion." As I stated to you in my original letter, I am a Catholic and if such a paper was ever published by anyone in authority, I should like to know it frankly; if such a paper were never published, then it is all-important that Mr. Speer and all others should know that fact, and in fairness to fellow-citizens of Catholic faith, not only discontinue the use of the article, but frankly admit their error.

In conclusion, I wish to say that as a lawyer, I cannot recognize Mr. Speer's statement that it is up to the Catholics "to show" that the publication was spurious. Mr. Speer uses it, and I think it is up to him to show that it is genuine. I shall greatly appreciate it, therefore, if you will ask Mr. Speer to give to me through you, his reference to "the reliable books" in which the extracts he has used were published.

Thanking you in advance, I am,

Yours very truly

ROBERT BIGGS.

If there were no libel laws, a gentleman, out of love for the sacredness of his own honorable name, would not lightly lay grave charges against his neighbor nor would he wittingly give the color of his approval to slanderous accusations. Should he be inveigled into publicly assailing the integrity of a large number of respectable citizens, he would consider it a duty to his own sense of honor to rectify publicly the wrong that he had unwittingly committed.

Silence like unto that of death (for the worm of remorse gnaws not noisily) followed the despatch of this second letter. But on the lofty principle that "while the lamp holds out to burn," etc., a third attempt was made to elicit a sound from the bivalvular stillness:

APRIL 30, 1910.

M. William S. Woods, Editor,
44-60 E. 23d St., New York,

My dear Sir:

On the 18th inst., I wrote a letter to you in which I asked you to obtain from Mr. Speer a reference to the "reliable books" from which he claims to have obtained the extracts from an alleged encyclical which was printed in the Digest on the 5th of February.

I am very much surprised not to have heard from you on the subject. I have always given the Digest credit for being a fair journal and have understood that in making "digest" from publications, its aim was to reflect with perfect fairness the opinions pro and con on the subject under discussion; and I feel that in a matter of so much importance as the one now the subject of correspondence, in which a publication was made offensive to me and, I am sure, to thousands of your Catholic subscribers, some effort should be made on your part to induce Mr. Speer to do the manly thing and the fair thing by giving his authority for the scurrilous letter used by him, or that the Digest should at least, in fairness to the Catholics, see that Mr. Speer is called upon to produce either the alleged encyclical or the "reputable proofs" from which the scurrilous matter was obtained.

I trust, therefore, that you will let me hear promptly on the subject.

Yours very truly,

ROBERT BIGGS.

And here endeth the lesson. The matter does not rest; it still seethes. However, if all these attempts to rescue truth from the roily waters of a propaganda, which is not Christlike because it slanders the absent, shall have the effect of making journalism a trifle more circumspect in spreading broadcast a mass of mendacious assertions, they will have scored a marked triumph. The time and the labor were well spent.

The London Times, of April 11, publishes "from our own correspondent" the following authentic episode: An Italian statesman, whose patriotism may be judged from the fact that he held an important office in the Cabinet responsible for the breach of Porta Pia, met one evening an old woman who had been a servant in his family, as she came out of the Methodist church in the via Venti Settembre. "What!" he exclaimed, "you a Methodist!" "Well, your excellency," replied the woman, "it is like this. It is nice and warm in there. They always give me twenty cents, and it is such a comfortable place to say the rosary in."

More trouble in India. The natives of Chota Nagpur, in Southern Bengal, listening to one claiming to be an incarnation of a god, have risen against the British rule. No violence has taken place, but war-drums are beating at Ranchi, the chief town of the district. Troops have been sent to watch results. The cruiser Philomel has taken 2,000 rifles and 250,000 rounds or ammunition destined for Afghanistan.

LITERATURE

Francia's Masterpiece. An Essay on the Beginnings of the Immaculate Conception in Art. By MONTGOMERY CARMICHAEL. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

For some reason, not altogether inexplicable, the landsman loves to sing of the sea and its ships. While listening as he sings of "A wet sheet and a flowing sea," "Nancy Lee," of the extraordinary person who used to relieve his feelings by shouting "Larboard watch, ahoy!" without regard to time or place, and of the Christian mariner whose practice was ruled rather by theology than sea craft, one cannot help wondering what sailors think of the seamanship and shipboard methods of such songs. Still, there is an excuse for them. Sailors as a rule are not song-writers. Fenimore Cooper, for instance, delightful in ordinary sea-talk of the quarter-deck and of before the mast, and convincing us that in his prose we hear real seamen, is as unreal as the callowest bard when he attempts the ship and the sea in verse. Hence, as the landsman must sing of these things, he is compelled to use the songs provided for him by amateurs in nautical affairs, from Mrs. Southey to Kipling, who, wonderful for his various knowledge of marine technique, is perhaps not altogether beyond criticism when it comes to sailing ships.

For reasons, again not inexplicable, men and women knowing but little about art like to talk of it. To do so they must have some ideas, for which they have recourse to popular writers, even when there is question of religious pictures. They have not the excuse of the singers of sea-songs. Seamen are not bards: there are people of no little piety who understand pictures perfectly.

How far astray one may go in the matter of religious art by trusting to popular works and guide-books, Mr. Carmichael teaches us in his fascinating monograph. The picture discussed is in the Church of San Fridiano, Lucca: the painter was Francesco Raibolini, known as il Francia. It represents the Blessed Virgin crowned and kneeling before the Eternal Father, who touches her head with His sceptre. Below are two bishops and two kings, all holding inscribed scrolls, and in the midst of them a friar on his knees. Art writers and guides have no difficulty in identifying the bishops and the kings, on account of the texts in their scrolls. They are St. Anselm, St. Augustine, David and Solomon. With regard to the subject of the picture and the friar they differ. The former, according to them, sometimes is the Assumption, sometimes the Coronation of the Blessed Virgin; the friar is sometimes a monk and is called, now St. Peter Igneus, now St. Anthony of Padua.

Mr. Carmichael knows better than they. The meaning of a picture is as much a matter of scientific investigation as the veracity of a history, and Mr. Carmichael lays down rules of interpretation none the less sound because they are plain common sense. If the picture be out of its original surroundings, it is necessary to find out whence it came. Was it painted for a cathedral, a collegiate church, a convent or a parish church? From the answer other questions arise. What was the dedication of the church? Who was the first bishop of the diocese? Who was the local patron saint? To what religious order did the church belong? If the picture came from a chapel within a church, who was the chapel's founder? But the question of highest importance is: of what altar was it the altar-piece? for this will give the picture's subject beyond all cavil.

Such ideas are caviare to the art-writers and authors of guide-books. Equally so is the erudition needful for the full interpretation of the subject, the legends of the saints, their ancient offices and Masses, and, when there is question of the Mother of God, the scriptural types of her accepted by the great mystics. How with a fullness of such knowledge Mr. Carmichael recognized this picture as an Immaculate Conception and the kneeling friar as no other than the great doctor of the Seraphic Order, Duns Scotus; how he fixed its date, determined the site in St. Fridiano's of the chapel to which it belonged, now no longer existing, and the founder who commissioned Francia to paint, we leave our readers to learn for themselves, assuring them, nevertheless, of the great enjoyment they will find in so doing.

Mr. Carmichael shows evidently that Francia's masterpiece, despite the art writers and guide-books, is an inspiration of the Franciscan Order. He does not stop here. The picture was an altar-piece and was completed with a predella made up of a series of exquisite little paintings which the art writers and guide-books can admire but not explain. To his erudition they are an easy problem, and he brings out most skilfully their admirable harmony with the subject. A brief account of the iconography of the Immaculate Conception in the introduction, and an appendix on a somewhat similar Immaculate Conception by Pier di Cosimo, showing its relation to Francia's, complete a remarkable book.

Ancient and Modern Imperialism. By the EARL OF CROMER. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

The author of this book is perhaps better known, at least to the older generation, as Sir Evelyn Baring, the reformer of Egyptian finances and administration, to whom together with Lord Kitchener is due the improved condition of modern Egypt. He was educated for the army, which he duly entered. But after some years of service his remarkable administrative capacity led him to abandon the soldier's part in empire-building for the civilian's. Like all successful administrators in the East, he had to take to languages, and he found time, too, to acquire enough of the dead tongues to qualify him for election in 1909, after his return to England, to the presidency of the Classical Association, an office for which his intimate knowledge of the Eastern Mediterranean made him most desirable. Having accepted his election he had to give a presidential address, but not being a classical scholar, he found some difficulty in selecting the subject. Fortunately for us the happy thought struck him to lift this out of the rut and to speak upon his life's work in its relation to similar work in ancient times. He therefore took "Ancient and Modern Imperialism" as his theme, and afterwards expanded his address into the book under review.

There are two kinds of empire: those set up by great conquerors, and those that, so to speak, impose themselves on the dominant race. To the first class belong the empires of Alexander and Napoleon; to the second, the Roman and the British. The scope of the work, then, is to compare these two and to draw from a study of the former profitable lessons for the support of the latter. It must be noted that the author excludes from consideration the British self-governing colonies, because there was nothing analogous to them in the Roman Empire, because, if heads only be counted, they contain an insignificant fraction of the population of the British Empire, because they are practically independent, but chiefly, we suspect, for he does not say as much, because he looks upon them as next door to being absolutely so.

Lord Cromer is a wise man of long and varied experience. His book, therefore, is full of wise and practical remarks. His discussion of India deserves most careful consideration. There have been two views of the Indian question, that of the mere Imperialist, who would hold India for the glory of the empire, and the philanthropic, which looks to elevate and civilize it. According to the former, England must keep India much as she found it and must govern it according to Indian ideas. According to the latter, she must introduce Western education, Western methods of government and Western ways. The former exposed in all its nakedness is contrary not only to the Christian conscience, but even to the civilized. The latter, therefore, won the day, and the native has been taught, by means of English literature and history, to despise all his old ideas of obedience to authority. Hence the present crisis, in which, Lord Cromer tells us, all India is of one mind, differing only as regards the fitting moment to expel the foreigner, an opinion AMERICA has more than once expressed. Perhaps if England had not been so utterly wedded to the notions of parliamentary government, trial by jury, etc., and had understood that any form of government is good if rightly administered, and had set about purifying thoroughly Indian methods, and, at least, had not connived at idolatry, things might have been different. Now the evil that she has wrought in the nations of Europe is coming to her in her own house.

Lord Cromer does not know Latin America as he knows the East, and therefore it is not surprising that most of his statements regarding it are without foundation. This, however, does not affect the general value of his book, which touches the Spanish colonies only rarely and indirectly. He does not draw many definite conclusions from his study, but we judge that, after having lived for his country, deep in his breast lies the conviction that the doom of the British Empire has been pronounced.

The Undesirable Governess. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Illustrated. New York: The Macmillan Company.

This is the second posthumous novel of the late Mr. Crawford. Compared with the bulk of the fiction which bears his name, "The Undesirable Governess" is rather slight in size and material. We suspect the author had it in mind to write a light comedy eventually out of the plot and incidents used in the novel, and that the form of fiction which he uses was merely a preparatory step to dramatization. The ground for our suspicion is the air of unreality in the new novel, looked at as a novel. As a play this unreality would vanish under the artificial exigencies of the theatre. Mr. Crawford was an accomplished artist and knew how to produce just the right atmosphere of illusion required for a novel. His latest novel was obviously keyed to the illisiveness of pasteboard scenery and high lights. Once, however, the reader lends himself to the illisiveness, and takes it for granted that it is a play he is reading and not a novel, he will find in it interest and amusement. We have an English country house, eccentric parents, grown-up sons walking on the edge of romantic adventure, two daughters not grown up, with exciting "juvenile" parts, and the undesirable governess, who is some one else and is in love with the eldest son. There are other characters, of course, who help the action forward, a wild ride in a balloon during a storm, a scene in a lunatic asylum. The author, in an hour of relaxation, allowed his imagination to take its fling; but he succeeds in creating a laugh and bottling a ray of sunshine against the rains.

Those Nerves. By GEORGE LINCOLN WALTON, M.D. Philadelphia and London: J. B. Lippincott Company. Price, $1.00 net.

Seeming to accept the principle that when children are cross they are naughty and that when grown-ups are cross they are "nervous" and may claim commiseration, the author, with many a grateful reference to the renowned Epictetus, leads us through a gallery of human frailties, follies and fancies. Before each picture, and his delineations are true to life, he discusses the subject in a pleasant, chatty way, gives tactful directions for maintaining or regaining mental equipoise, and passes on to the next study. The magnification of the unessential, the determination to accept no favors, and obsessions about food, clothing, fresh air and companionship give a fair notion of the variety and the practical turn of his sensible hints. Technical terms are absent, but the neurologist is ever present. Though the theory laid down in the introductory chapters is nebulous and unsatisfying, the victims of neurosis and their victims will be helped by the author's soothing suggestions.

The Catholic Mission of Southern Burma and the New Cathedral of Rangoon. Edited by a CATHOLIC LAYMAN. London: Burns & Oates. Price, one rupee.

Although the book covers a period of three hundred years, it is so wanting in narrative and description that it is quite a failure as a history of the mission. It is a calendar of events with a list of contributors to an imposing new church.

Compendium of History, Ancient and Modern. By M. J. KERNEY, A.M. Revised and enlarged by CHARLES H. MCCARTHY, Ph. D. Baltimore and New York: John Murphy Company.

Condensation is a difficult art. To comprise the history of the world in a volume of 700 pages demands not only the historian's knowledge but much more, a nice sense of proportion and perspective. Professor McCarthy has brought out a concise, yet complete, history of the world's great events with a philosopher's view of their interdependence and correlation. The work is brought down to January, 1909, and contains the important features of recent times. We are not persuaded of the advisability of placing an orthoepic mark on such words as Ju'no, Ve'nus and Brad'dock. It is misplaced on Bolivar. Five colored maps and an alphabetical index are a valuable addition to the text.

Tales of Bengal. By S. B. BANERJEA. Edited by FRANCIS HENRY SKRINE. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

A series of short stories acquainting us with the domestic customs and social life of the Bengalese. Incidentally, we are led to a better understanding of the influence exercised by Father Lievens, S.J., the apostle of Chota Nagpur, when he championed the cause of the wretched ryots. The editor's introduction shows how "the tight little isle" could obtain and hold the mastery over India's millions.

Children's Gardens for Pleasure, Health and Education. By HENRY G. PARSONS. New York: Sturgis and Walton. Price, $1.00 net.

A venerable priest was wont to say that whoever retains a love for flowers and gardening is not beyond reclamation, for he still has the foundation for a noble moral edifice. What he said has been confirmed again and again by those who have studied the happy effects of gardening upon lives not altogether free from blight. And now comes a dear friend and lover of children, young children who know little of the wide world, with an attractive book whose mission is to train eye and hand and head in the charming mysteries of the sprouting seed, the unfolding bud and the perfected fruit. We have read the book, we have studied the pictures, and we have wondered why forlorn little children should have had to wait so long before the possibilities of a mere city lot were so invitingly set before them. All the details of a pocket handkerchief garden are so carefully given that any child may become a horticulturist. But this is not all. Indirectly, yet interestingly, much sound advice is given on sunlight, fresh air and exercise for bodily health. The children have another benefactor; may his influence spread.

Con los Jesuitas . . . por Castigo. Por PABLO KER. Traducción libre de la 2a edición francesa. Con cuatro grabados. St. Louis: B. Herder. Price, 90 cents net.

This is the story of a boy who was left to "run wild" until the unsatisfactory reports from some neutral school which he attended induced his father to try the Jesuits as a forlorn hope. The tale is told in a series of letters which the boy writes to his chum Luis and to some others. Many of us have known this young Pablo and, in punishment for our sins, we have known his father in several places. The outcome is not always so felicitous as in the present attractive volume. Cleverly disguised in the shape of heart-to-heart letters to a boy friend, the law of conscience and honor, which is supreme in Catholic education, is enlarged upon and emphasized, but none too strongly. The benignant Rector, whose chief office is to appear on great occasions, and the spare Prefect of Discipline, whose firm jaw and compressed lips do not escape our hero's uneasy gaze, are duly passed in review. Then there is another. He does not supervise the establishment; he does not appear, preceded by the mace, to add new rules and regulations; he does not teach, for teaching is incompatible with his office. Yet in him is centred the real power of the institution, in him is personified the distinguishing mark of Catholic education. He is the spiritual father, the chaplain, whose presence is seldom noticed, whose influence is always felt. This is a boy's book which parents of boys ought to study.

Reviews and Magazines

The Lamp for May is a most interesting number. It opens with a dialogue between two Anglicans taken from the Episcopalian paper, the American Catholic, on the Rosary, one of whom uses it and almost persuades the other to do the same. We may note also a letter of Miss Julia Halstead Chadwick to the Living Church, with regard to the church at Garrison and the work in it, which throws a flood of light on the relations of the community there with the Episcopalian authorities, and is a valuable comment on certain letters that have appeared impugning the good faith of Father Paul James Francis. An extensive notice of Father Pascal Robinson's devout and learned life of St. Clare is perhaps the most noticeable feature of the present number. It closes with the desire that this faithful son of the seraphic patriarch would give us the life of his Father, a desire we most cordially reecho.

Rev. John J. Fenlon, D.D., has a timely article in the Catholic World for May on "Methodist Pioneers in Italy." He allows the Methodists interested in their Roman propaganda to tell their own story. A volume entitled "Four and a Half Years in the Italy Mission," by the founder of the mission, Rev. Everett Stackpole, D.D., forms the basis of Dr. Fenlon's paper. It would be amusing to see how the mild and reproachful tones of injured innocence, with which certain Methodists have recently been disowning the violent Mr. Tipple and deprecating the uncompromising policy of the Vatican in their regard, could be squared with official statements of the purpose and methods of the Methodist mission in Rome as contained in this book and in the utterances of Methodist bishops.

A valuable study of the early development of the West is contributed to the May Atlantic, under the title, "On the road to Oregon." The writer, Charles M. Harvey, refers to the work of the early missionaries, Daniel and Jason Lee, sent out by the Methodists; Parker, Whitman and Spalding, the representatives of the Presbyterians, and Peter John De Smet, the Catholic missionary. Of the last-named he says: "A missionary whose name traveled farther even than Whitman's entered on his work in Oregon in 1840. This was the Jesuit Father Peter John De Smet. He established churches and schools among the Flatheads and other Indians of the Northwest until his death in 1872, and wielded an influence among his red constituents such as was not wielded by any other American religious teacher."

In the same number we note a poem, "On a Fly-Leaf of Father Tabb's Lyrics," by Michael Earls, S.J.

LIBRARY NEWS AND NOTES

The following two letters, called forth by articles in AMERICA upon Catholic use of public libraries, have been received, one from the librarian of the Providence Public Library commending the Catholic attitude toward supervision of reading for the young, and the other from a student in a Western Jesuit college, who finds points to criticize in the methods and policy of the Public Library of St. Louis, Missouri. Mr. Foster's letter, which, coming as it does from a non-Catholic librarian, is very gratifying, reads as follows:

Providence Public Library,
Providence, R. I., April 4, 1910.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with great interest the article on "Catholics and Public Libraries," in your issue of March 19. We receive AMERICA regularly at this library, but you were kind enough to send me, besides, a marked copy of this issue.

I am glad to see both of the points emphasized which you have emphasized in this article—the circulation of books from the public library through the Catholic schools, thus giving the teacher the opportunity of having an eye on what the children from Catholic families are reading, and the printing of lists of Catholic books in public libraries through the financial assistance of the local councils of the Knights of Columbus, thus designating the books so as to show their point of view.

This attitude of mind on the part of those who are interested in the bringing up of the children of Catholic families is thoroughly respected and recognized by all the librarians whom I happen to know best. Speaking for myself, as a librarian and as a non-Catholic, I feel especial satisfaction when the circulation of the books is "safeguarded" in these and other ways.

No librarian, as far as my knowledge extends, would deliberately make his library the vehicle for any propaganda against Catholic beliefs, but there is an added gain when even the possibility of an unintended and unperceived influence of this kind is guarded against.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM E. FOSTER, Librarian.

The letter from the university student is written from an entirely different point of view; it brings up a number of points calling for comment as follows:

St. Louis, April 3, 1910.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

For some time past I have been drawing books from the public library. In this way I have come to see a little of the workings of that institution, and so the articles in AMERICA touching the library are of considerable interest to me. This interest has been heightened by the fact that a little Catholic library (free) has been begun on Sixth Street. Some are of the opinion that it would be better to spend the money and energy used in maintaining the Catholic library to put Catholic books on the shelves of the Public Library and get such books into circulation. Another view is to use the Public Library to the utmost and also have these smaller libraries of simple, instructive Catholic literature to circulate among the people, especially among the poorer working classes who do not use the Public Library.

There are several complaints to be made against the St. Louis Public Library (cf. Reports 1907, '08, '09).

(1) The librarians are too much bent on getting readers. It is too much of a business proposition. I do not think it an exaggeration to say that they canvass for readers (p. 82).

(2) The librarians go to so much trouble to care for the public school reading that they might as well be called employees of the School Board as of the Public Library (pp. 82, 83 sq.).

(3) The censorship of lectures and meetings held in the auditorium of branch libraries is very loose. In Cabanné Branch the "Free Thought" Society meets; at the Barr or Crunden Branch it is said that for certain lectures in "Popular Science" Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe" was used as a textbook (pp. 44, 46, etc.).

(4) There is no objective criterion of books to be placed on shelf, even on the "open shelf." The enclosed slip gives you an idea of the books recommended.

The Public Library is becoming a mere tool in the hands of secular, non-religious education. It seems to me Catholics should step in before the library becomes an integral part of the school system. Should the one who is studying the library question care to investigate these points, the Report can be got on application.

Why couldn't we have a Catholic Reading List for the whole country? A special edition could be got out for each city with the books in the public library of the city indicated by a mark (x). People should be urged to read the books already in the library and to recommend those not there. The list could be prepared and sold for a few cents and be in the hands of all Catholics. Librarians will buy the books the people want.

Pardon these jerky items and the boldness of an amateur in the field, but I am interested in the good work and I would have my say even though I said very little.

Wishing every success may come to AMERICA, X.

The questions brought up by the second correspondent are worthy of consideration and they show growing interest in the public library. So far as the conditions which he describes are local, this scarcely seems the occasion to discuss them. But a few words of explanation as to some of the methods alluded to by him may be helpful.

1. It is the duty of a twentieth-century librarian to create an interest in reading and to foster the habit of reading quite as much as it is his duty to serve the needs of those who already are in the habit of reading, and are familiar with the practice of drawing books from the public library for home reading. Many persons would do so were their attention directed to the advantages they possess in a collection of books to be obtained without charge for home reading; in other words, if their interest in books were awakened. This is especially the case with the young. Many are the devices used by public librarians to-day to interest children in books. The "story hour" is one that has been much employed and is growing in popularity, in spite of certain criticisms that have been brought against turning a library into a kindergarten. Folk-tales, romances of chivalry, historical stories are told to groups of children, who are shown at the same time illustrated books relating such tales, and the children are encouraged to take these books home to read. Lectures are given in the library building to attract persons to the library, to make them better acquainted there, and possibly keep them away from undesirable places of amusement. Bulletins and newspaper articles call public attention to the institution and sustain the interest of the taxpayer. Catholics cannot, indeed, send their children to the public library to listen to everybody and anybody. Our correspondent has pointed out one source of danger in that respect. But the effort to attract readers to a library is one that may be conducted under proper auspices quite as readily as it may be under improper ones, and the interest of Catholics in the work is just what will improve it.

2. The relation of the public library to the public school, to which our correspondent refers, is not unnatural, inasmuch as both are institutions supported by public taxation and generally considered as co-ordinate branches of public education. The reasons that prevent Catholics from using the public school need not prevent their deriving benefit from the public library, as we have endeavored to point out in these columns. A Catholic cannot learn the Catholic catechism in the public school, but he may draw a book by a Catholic author from the public library, and that without charge to himself. The work of libraries with schools need not give Catholics concern so long as librarians give parish schools and Catholic colleges the same privileges that they give public schools, and this is just what is being done in those cities of the country where Catholics have waked up to their opportunities and have asked to have books sent to their schools by the public library. Among all the libraries addressed by AMERICA none replied that Catholics were refused this privilege, while in one or two cases the library offered to send books and the offer was declined by the Catholic school.

3. Censorship of books and lectures is a matter ultimately of adjustment. The best way of accomplishing it is by securing the appointment to the board of library directors of a Catholic member, who will safeguard the rights of the Catholic constituency, and in cases of disagreement with his non-Catholic colleagues endeavor to win their support to measures that are not only in accord with Catholic principles but are at the same time conducive to the public welfare.

4. A list of Catholic books, similar to that desired by our correspondent, was compiled by the Jesuits of Canisius College, Buffalo, in 1904; it was designed and arranged to be used for just the purpose he has in mind. We cordially recommend that this list should be revised and brought down to date. The movement to list books by Catholic authors in local libraries is growing by leaps and bounds, thanks to the interest taken in this work by the Knights of Columbus, and a comprehensive list of Catholic books is what is especially needed by the compilers of such lists.

EDUCATION

The militant advocates of woman suffrage neglect no opportunity to urge their favored project. Even in the matter of school administration they find reason of discontent with the existing order. The growing disposition to put an end to coeducation is their latest grievance. They protest that the tendency is prompted by the fear that women, by their ever-increasing numbers in the schools, shall absorb the positions of honor and trust in the country. A recent judgment of President Eugene A. Noble, of the Woman's College of Baltimore, a Methodist-Episcopalian school, may suggest entirely different reasons for the growing opposition to coeducation. Mr. Noble, who has had an experience of twenty-five years as student, teacher or principal in coeducational institutions, thus writes in the Minneapolis School Education:

"I have widely observed, deeply studied, and sympathetically discussed this problem, and have reached a defensible conclusion. That conclusion is that coeducation, as usually known, in the sense of school environment that furnishes equality of opportunity and advantage for girls and boys, young men and women, is always dangerous and often pernicious. It is a menace to scholarship in some grades of school work, and an indefensible process in others. The growing boy and girl become conscious of themselves as beings of a different sort, and without intending any impropriety of sentimental relationships, they become interested in each other. Of course, the school authorities, whether the secondary school is public or private, try to prevent the boys and girls from having much to do with each other, and yet, in spite of the most rigid inspection, the most conscientious oversight, and the most consistent organization, the school authorities are unable to prevent the boys and girls from having sentimental relations, which means a waste of time and a diversion of interests. The best commentary I have ever heard on coeducation in secondary schools is related to a mispronunciation of the word 'coeducation.' It should be spelled, a waggish friend of mine suggested, 'coeducation,' for there is so much dovelike interchange between sentimental boy and sentimental girl that the condition permits the pun. I do not believe that there is ever as good scholarship, in a general way, in a secondary coeducational school as in schools where boys and girls are segregated, and it means economy of efforts on the part of teachers, and economy of expenditure on the part of the students, when they are put in separate schools. I desire to say that I think even in the college grades there is always some unnecessary waste of scholarly ability because of inevitable sentimental relationships. Within the past two years I have made a quiet inspection of several large coeducational universities, and while I do not pronounce condemnation for even a single impropriety in conduct, yet I must say that many evidences have appeared of undesirable intimacies that compel students to waste time. Under the most normal conditions, the temptation to waste time is severe in our colleges, and it is growing more severe instead of less. To put women into the same class as men, to study similar textbooks, to recite in the same way, to follow identical courses in science, in history, and in other subjects; to be compelled to observe the same rules, to have the same enthusiasms, and the same expression for the enthusiasms, is decidedly unfair to the nature of women. And it is just as decidedly unfair to make the nature of the boy submit to some of the restraints and constraints which the presence of the other sex compels, as in the other instance."

Our readers will recall the widespread opposition aroused by President James of the University of Illinois to a proposed bill, introduced in Congress, to include the George Washington University of Washington within the provisions of the Morrill act. The privilege sought would allow the University about $50,000 annually for the use of its agricultural and mechanic arts departments. President James argued that the inclusion would mark undue favoritism to a private corporation, whose material endowment happened to require bolstering. A curious side-light is thrown on the controversy by charges made last week before the House Committee on the District of Columbia regarding the affairs of George Washington University, which, as is known, operates under a Government charter. Dr. Phillips recently dean of the medical school of the University, made the statement that "the Corcoran endowment fund of $200,000, which was a sacred trust, only the interest from which was to be used, had been dissipated in the payment of the University's annual deficit, until but $16,000 remained of the distinguished philanthropist's original bequest. This remaining $16,000 was represented only by a promissory note on some Washington property owned by President Needham of the University, which is valued at $8,000." It was stated, too, that a committee of the alumni, designated a year ago to look into the institution's affairs, had been denied the right to inspect the books of the University. A Congressional investigation of the institution may result.

The commercial value of an educational training is not an argument that appeals particularly to those who plead best and most for the spread of educational opportunity. Mental training and intellectual equipment have a value of their own, even though that value be not stamped with the dollar mark. Still the commercial aspect has its influence with many, and it is not labor lost to quote an occasional proof that may convince these that it is entirely "worth while" to go to school. The Massachusetts State Board of Education recently caused to be prepared a table which averages up the earning power of pupils leaving the public schools of that Commonwealth. Its details are interesting.

Pupils who left school at 14 began work at $4 a week, and by the time they had reached the age of 25, were receiving $12.75 a week. On the other hand, those who went on and completed the high school course began with a wage of $10 a week, and at 25 were receiving $35. It was found that in the twelve years he had been out of school the boy who went to work with only the elementary education had earned but $5,700, whereas the high-school boy had earned in his eight years of labor something over $7,300. It would seem that it is worth while to go to school.

A recent editorial in the Catholic Universe of Cleveland very happily supplements the comments of AMERICA, in its issue of January 22, regarding the plans agreed upon in the meeting of the Moral Education Board in Baltimore, early in the year. As then announced, it was proposed to use the facilities of the Board to teach morals by a series of lectures to be given throughout the country. Cleveland has just had a sample of the work. The children of the public schools had the first lesson in moral instruction in a stereopticon lecture, the subject of which was "What I am going to do when I am grown up." As the Universe says: "To teach morals by lantern slides is something new and something ridiculous. To show the bad boy getting into the circus by crawling under the canvas, and the good boy getting there by hauling water to the elephants, will not of itself stop the easier process of winning one's way into the show." It is a pity that well-meaning men are slow to recognize the folly of their pretentious and costly experiments in so vital a matter. Moral training is grievously needed in our educational system—elementary and secondary and college and university, but it is quite impossible to do effective moral teaching save through the medium of definite religious instruction.

There are 5,212 private schools and colleges in Spain. Of these, 91 are directed by Protestants and 107 are "lay" or "neutral" schools in which no religious instruction is given. These figures, which are from the report of the Minister of Education, prove eloquently what the vast majority of Spanish parents think about divorcing religious instruction from the training given to school children.

The question of admitting women to membership in the French Academy has already been debated by that august body, but on the occasion of the reception of M. René Doumic, April 16, M. Emile Faguet stated it more pointedly when he expressed the regret that Mme de Sévigné was never admitted to the Academy, and he deplored the rule that excludes women. This declaration produced a profound but rather unfavorable impression on the academicians. Many of them said that to touch one of the fundamental rules of the Academy would be a sacrilege, and would prepare the dissolution of that society. They pointed out that Cardinal Richelieu, when founding the French Academy, was not in favor of the admission of women, although at that time there were in France many women of talent. Other "immortals," however, such as M. Brioux and M. Jules Claretie, sided with M. Emile Faguet. Finally, M. Paul Hervieu proposed a middle course which may be accepted. He suggested that there should be in the Institut de France a section reserved to women. This would, he thought, satisfy feminine ambition while respecting established order.

SOCIOLOGY

Pope Leo XIII, in his encyclical on the condition of the working classes, strongly recommends the enactment of laws restricting the employment of women and children in factories. It is gratifying to see that there is a movement on foot in this country to this effect. Bills recently introduced in certain States for the regulation of woman labor were bitterly opposed by the factory owners on the plea that such laws are unconstitutional, as infringing on liberty of contract. But the Supreme Courts of Massachusetts and Oregon have already decided in favor of the laws, and now that of Illinois has handed down a decision of like import.

The report of the Children's Court of New York, First Division, shows that there are two such courts in the city of New York. That of the First Division is at Eleventh street and Third avenue, in the Borough of Manhattan. 10,601 boys and 893 girls passed through it in 1909. Of these 2,110 boys and 242 girls were discharged; 1,353 boys and 439 girls were committed to reformatories and charitable institutions as far as possible those of their own religious faith. The principal causes of commitment were improper guardianship, 806 boys and 418 girls; larceny, 535 boys and 16 girls. The report speaks with high commendation of the fidelity with which a committee of Catholic women, under the direction of Monsignor D. J. McMahon, care for the large number of paroled children, finding them work, educating them in night classes and visiting them in their homes.

We have received the report of St. John's Hospital, Long Island City, under the charge of the Sisters of St. Joseph. During 1909 there were treated 1,188 medical cases, with an average mortality of 7.74 per cent., and 2,314 surgical, with an average mortality of 2.5. The hospital has accommodation for 225 patients, and as it is primarily for the sick poor, none is refused admission through inability to pay. The Sisters' earnest wish is to be able to open this hospital entirely to such, and will be most grateful to all who will help them to do so. $2,500 will establish a free bed, to which the giver will have the right to nominate during his lifetime. $5,000 carries the right of nomination in perpetuity.

The International Seamen's Union of America has sent out a statement regarding the strike which has involved nearly ten thousand sailors, firemen and cooks on the great lakes since May, 1909. It states their grievances to be the organization of ship-owners under the name of the Lake Carriers' Association and the refusal to recognize the Seamen's Union. Secondly, the "welfare plan," which, according to the sailors, seems to be a reproduction of the registration plan attempted by the Krupps in Germany, explained in AMERICA some time ago, and which, it is claimed, under the guise of helping the seamen, puts them in the power of their employers. Thirdly, it is asserted, the shipowners refuse to arbitrate; and fourthly, they are attempting to introduce foreign seamen in contravention of the immigration laws.

ECONOMICS

The soya bean has been widely advertised as "the German coffee berry," which can be ripened even in the Northern States. Whatever may be its merits as a substitute for coffee, it is of recognized value in feeding stock, especially milch cows. It grows about four feet high and yields from ten to twenty tons of green fodder or from twenty to forty bushels of beans to the acre. It is estimated that the crop of this bean in North China will reach 1,000,000 tons. The demand for this cereal is increasing and promises to exceed the supply. This bean is declared to contain no starch, and is favored for diet for invalids suffering from diabetes. The Japanese manufacture a condensed milk and cheese from it. It contains about eighteen per cent. oil superior to the cottonseed oil.

A Japanese mechanic named Hori has invented a hose joint that overcomes all the defects of the screw joint used in connecting up hose for fighting fire. The sections can be connected in about one-tenth of the time hitherto required. A test made at Fukagawa demonstrated that the joint would stand a pressure of 250 pounds. The inventor has been working on this idea for ten years.

The success of the artesian-well boring program under the direction of the Bureau of Public Works in the Philippines so marked the reduction of the mortality list where they have been introduced, that a large number of municipalities are providing funds for the purpose of supplying pure water to the inhabitants from this source. The municipality of Naic recently voted the sum of 2,000 pesos to be expended in boring a well for that town.

Manufactures and manufacturers' materials now form four-fifths of the foreign commerce of the United States, the imports and exports for nine months ended March, 1910, having been 1,967 million dollars out of a total of 2,515 millions. The proportion of imports is decreasing. It was 53 per cent. of total imports in 1870; 44 per cent. in 1890, and 42 per cent. in the period under review. That of exports, on the contrary, is increasing. It was 19 per cent., 21 per cent. and 42 per cent. respectively in the above-mentioned periods.

The Secretary of State at Albany announced on May 4 that the automobile number 100,000 had been given to Lieutenant-Governor Horace White's new motor car. This means that there are now one hundred thousand autos in the State of New York, which is not only a higher figure than any other State can show, but higher than that of all the New England States together. The number of autos in New York State has increased more than 35 per cent. in the last six months, and the chauffeurs are now an army of 57,000.

SCIENCE

Heliometric measurements as well as solar photographs reveal the fact that the sun is undergoing periodic changes in shape. The forms assumed are now an oblate, now a prolate spheroid. The eccentricity is, however, so slight that only the most delicate observations have disclosed it. Surmises that the period of variability is quite the same as that of the sun spots seem quite tenable.

Alaska is to make the first practical application of the Brennan monorail system. Exclusive rights to use his cars have been granted by the inventor to an Alaskan syndicate, represented by a New York banking firm. Having recently succeeded in reproducing objects photographically by means of their reflected ultra-violet rays, Professor R. W. Woods has now begun a series of experiments, using the red end of the spectrum as his source of light. He employs a ray filter made by combining a sheet of very dense cobalt glass with a deep orange aniline dye. This screen absorbs all wave lengths below 6,900. When photographed through such a screen the spectrum of an intense source, such as the sun or an electric arc, narrows down to a band contained between wave-lengths 6,900-7,400. As Hemholtz places the extreme limit of visible light at wave-length 8,120, these rays still lie within the reach of the eye, though they are of little effect in ordinary vision, since the retina is but feebly sensitive to them. Landscapes photographed through this screen have a very singular appearance. Grass and trees take on a snow-whitish hue in full sunlight, whilst the sky becomes black with the blackness of midnight. This singular coloring is due to the fact that the chlorophyl of the former reflects the red rays powerfully, whilst the very opposite is the case with the sky-blue.

Dr. Noordman has redetermined the intrinsic brilliancy of the sun and has changed his figures from 319,000 decimal candles per square centimeter to 100,500 decimal candles. The "decimal candle" is the unit adopted by the International Electrical Congress of 1889, and is represented by the twentieth part of the light emitted by one square centimeter of melted platinum at its solidification temperature.

With the aid of a very sensitive relay, the invention of an English electrician, Sidney Brown, it is now possible to listen to the pulsations of the heart over a distance of 100 miles. The beatings in the test carried on between the Isle of Wight and London were transferred from the heart to the telephone transmitter by a stethoscope used in the ordinary fashion.

J. R. Phillips, a Liverpool engineer, claims to have invented a method of controlling aerostats by wireless transmission. By the manipulation of the keyboard of a transmitter the airship can be made to descend, ascend, drive or stop. Mr. Phillips suggests its practicability in the case of aerial torpedoes.

F. TONDORF, S.J.

The most recent application of electricity to medicine is the so-styled electro-cardiogram, a photograph of the beats of the heart. To obtain this graph the patient plunges his bare arms into two large baths filled with water. Into each of these baths is led an electrode, the human body forming the connecting link between them. A very sensitive galvanometer is placed in the circuit. The movement of the needles follows the varying resistance occasioned by the contraction and expansion of the heart. A light is made to fall upon the needle, which by this means records the movements upon a photographic film revolving slowly beneath it.

Every attempt hitherto made to place in the market an iron, proof against rust, has been in vain. Now, however, metallurgists think they have a solution of the difficulty. Rust is due to the impurities of the metal, they claim; if, therefore, these be removed, corrosion is an impossibility. Tests have shown that iron of the purer type is seven times as effective in resisting corrosive agents as a fair sample of mild steel. It is called ingot iron.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

It was evident from the reports made at the annual meeting of the Marquette League, held in this city on May 4, that the need of more generous assistance for the missions and schools caring for the Indians is becoming better appreciated by the Catholic body. The meeting, which was the most numerously attended in the history of the League, was begun by the reading of a letter from Archbishop Farley, praising the work of the members, and enclosing a subscription of $100. His Grace referred to the treatment of the Indian in Mexico and South America, adding, "Had this same teaching been listened to by those who first came in contact with the Indian in the United States, the sad and shameful story which makes up the history of the relations of the American people with the red man would never be written."

The annual report showed that through the efforts of the Marquette League three chapels had been erected on Indian reservations during the year, making seven in all that it now has to its credit. A number of catechists were secured for work at the missions; five cases of clothing, valued at $600, were distributed, and $3,293 collected and distributed. Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J., who was the principal speaker of the evening, gave a most interesting account of his investigations among the Indians in Canada. Incidentally he drew some very apt conclusions from the recently published book of former Commissioner Leupp, "The Indian and His Problem"—one that was very pertinent for the times—the fact that the academic theory of Socialism is shown to be an utter failure in its practice on the Indian reservations.

Rev. William H. Ketcham, Director of the Catholic Indian Bureau at Washington, also spoke, and heartily thanked the members of the League for the great help their efforts had been to the Bureau. The relations of the Bureau, he said, with the Federal officials were now more cordial than ever, and President Taft had invited him to call to his attention any question needing consideration. Mr. Valentine, the Indian Commissioner, was most impartial and friendly, and Secretary Ballinger also. It was due entirely to Mr. Ballinger, Father Ketcham added, and he should get this special credit, that the new rules have been made for the Indian schools by which Catholic children living there can receive instruction and comply with their religious duties. Mr. Ballinger did this in spite of the utmost pressure brought to bear on him by the intolerant clique of "non-sectarian" ministers, who, as related recently in AMERICA, tried to stop the adoption of these rules guaranteeing to the Indian children their constitutional right to religious freedom.

The Indian mission schools are progressing, in many instances ways being found by which Government aid has been secured for them. "Generally speaking," said Father Ketcham, "the situation is very consoling."

The Catholic University in Washington will open its halls next September to a National Congress of Catholic Charities. The executive committee of the Associated Catholic Charities in New York has completed plans for the congress, at which more than 30,000 branches of Catholic work will be represented. The organization of a National Congress was begun two years ago, under the direction of the Rt. Rev. Mgr. Dennis J. McMahon, and it has assumed a larger scope than was anticipated. Through this extension of its purpose it is hoped to reach all of the organized Catholic philanthropic endeavors in the United States. The charitable work done by the organized bodies of the laity, men and women, and religious orders, will be discussed. To each of these classes a separate section will be devoted, so that the fields of activity appropriate to each may be studied to the fullest. One of the aims of the Congress will be to urge national legislation on the question of employers' liabilities in case of the injury or death of their workmen. Special consideration will be given to charitable and correctional work among immigrants who are Catholics. The St. Vincent de Paul Society, which has a membership of 800,000 in this country, will be especially represented, as will also its Women's Auxiliary, which though of only comparatively recent organization has already done extensive work. One of the chief endeavors of this branch of the organization this year will be the betterment of the tubercular work and the development of fresh air conditions for children. A plan is being formed for a national sanatorium under the auspices of the St. Vincent de Paul Society.

The New York State Federation of German Catholic Societies will hold its annual convention in Kingston, May 29, 30 and 31. Three hundred delegates, representing a membership of over 20,000 men, will attend the sessions. The Federation is composed of Catholic fraternal, benevolent and social organizations throughout the State, which have joined forces for more effective promotion of the religious, educational and charitable interests of the Church. As in the gatherings of the National Federation of Catholic Societies, partisan politics are excluded from the annual meetings, but questions affecting public morality and social well-being are studied with a view to the practical cooperation of Catholic bodies in the work of social reform. The convention will open with solemn religious services in St. Peter's Church, Sunday, May 29, at which Archbishop Farley will preside. Details can be had from H. A. Winkopp, 287 Broadway.

There still exists in Brunswick a law forbidding priests to administer the Sacraments, unless authorized by the Government, in districts where there are no parishes. On January 29 last the parish priest of Heiningen (Prussia) asked permission to administer the Sacraments once in January and again at a later date to a parishioner, eighty-seven years old, who had moved into the neighboring district of Seinstedt (Brunswick). Permission was refused.

The fire which swept through the city of Lake Charles, La., April 23, destroyed nearly all the property of the Catholic church. The Catholic church and rectory, the Marianite Convent, academy and parochial schools were all burned to the ground. The only Catholic institution that escaped was St. Patrick's Sanitarium. Here the Sisters of the Incarnate Word sheltered the Holy Cross Sisters and their boarders. The pastor and trustees of the Baptist church placed their buildings at the disposal of the Catholic congregation, but it was not found necessary to accept the generous offer. The Auditorium Theatre is being used as a temporary Catholic school. At their first meeting after the fire $7,000 were subscribed to the Catholic building fund, under the presidency of the Rector, Very Rev. Henry Cramers.

The Rt. Rev. Bishop Shaw, recently consecrated Coadjutor-Bishop of San Antonio, celebrated his first pontifical Mass and administered Confirmation in the Cathedral church of his native parish, of which he had been Rector until his elevation to the episcopate. On May 11 Bishop Shaw was formally received by Bishop Forest, at the San Antonio Cathedral.

The Rt. Rev. Mgr. Henry A. Brann, D.D., returned on Sunday from his trip abroad. Many of his friends were at the pier to welcome him, and the children of the parish and their parents crowded the street in front of St. Agnes' Church, of which he is pastor, to offer their greetings and receive his blessing. The readers of AMERICA were treated to a series of entertaining and instructive letters from his pen, written during his travels.

Mother Cecilia Northall, of the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, celebrated recently the golden jubilee of her profession at the convent of the Sacred Heart, Manhattanville, N. Y. Among the messages of congratulation received by the venerable jubilarian was one from the Sovereign Pontiff imparting his apostolic blessing.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Addressing a large gathering of non-Catholics at a banquet recently held at St. Albans, Vermont, the Rev. John M. Thomas, D.D., President of Middlebury College, spoke on the topic, "Clean Speech." In the course of a plain and direct handling of a very common defect, Dr. Thomas thus referred to a Society of which Catholics have right to be proud:

"I have in my hand a little manual of the Holy Name Society, an organization of the Roman Catholic Church, whose special object is to discourage profanity. The rule which this organization enjoins upon its members includes the following principles:

"Never to pronounce the name of God without respect.

"To avoid blasphemy, perjury and immoral language.

"To induce their neighbor to abstain from all outrages against God or His Saints.

"To praise God in their hearts by the words, 'Praise be to God,' or 'Praise be to Jesus Christ,' wherever they hear anyone blaspheme."

"This organization has 600,000 members in the United States, all men, and all pledged to abstain from foul language: It is not an uncommon sight in one of our large cities to see 5,000 men in a parade under the banners of this organization. The Catholic Church deserves great credit for this movement, and I am glad to note that this organization has some branches in Vermont."

In its issue of April 8, the Southern Cross of Buenos Aires, Argentina, presents its contribution to the garland of dubious glory to which the Rev. Dr. R. E. Speer may lay claim for his tirade against the clergy and laity of South America:

"In another column, under the heading 'Dark South America,' we publish an article from an exchange referring to the saved saints who shed crocodile tears at the thought of the iniquity of South American Catholics. 'The Student Volunteer Movement' seems to be a movement organized for the purpose of, amongst other things, snatching idolatrous Catholics from the brink of the Burning Pit. In other words, it is a great proselyting movement under whose elevating aegis the enterprising Yankee 'volunteers' in foreign countries, including the group in dark South America, will supplement their diplomatic, consular, civil, military and naval duties, and commercial and industrial services as well, by devoting themselves to the complex task of preaching their sectarian creed to non-believers. If this idea were to materialize, the foreign consular, diplomatic and commercial representation of the United States would be composed of an invading army of swaddling preachers. The euphemistic 'Student Volunteer Movement' does not call this work proselytism. Oh, no! That would be too commonplace. What the saintly propaganda is called is 'Christianizing the impact of Christendom on the non-Christian world.' Now in the Argentine Republic there is no religious persecution; all religions are free, and we do not for a moment deny the right of Messrs. Speer, Turner & Co. to preach as much as they like in these Catholic countries. What we object to is the campaign of falsehood that is being carried on incessantly against the national Church and priesthood of South America. Those apostles of calumny have been challenged in various parts of the world and they have never yet been able to sustain their inculpations. We also object to the ignorance which calls South America 'a country.' Why not call Europe a country? Besides, it is immensely rich to see North American evangelists setting out on the Holy Grail with the sublime objective of Christianizing the impact of Christianity on the non-Christian world in South America. Where is their patriotism? Why not stay at home to do battle with race hatred, Lynch Law, political corruption and the poisoned fumes of the Divorce Court?"

Hon. John Barrett, former Minister to Argentina and at present head of the Bureau of American Republics at Washington, has written a letter to a committee of students of the Ohio State University. In it he throws more light on the Speer screed which has made the perpetrator so malodorously famous in the recent statement in the Literary Digest touching the morality of Latin-American students. Mr. Barrett says:

"Probably no one in this country is better acquainted with the standard and quality of Latin-American students all over Latin America than myself and a number of members of our staff. We entirely, absolutely and unqualifiedly disagree with any statement to the effect that 'those (Latin-American students) who live a moral life can be counted on the fingers.' I cannot understand how any intelligent man could make a statement of this character. I fear that you may have misunderstood him. If he did say this he did it without any serious thought of the truth of his utterance."

It is noted as a very significant sign of the times that, in that one-time Puritan stronghold, the State of Connecticut, nine of the leading cities now have Catholics holding the office of Mayor.

OBITUARY

From India comes the announcement of the death of the Rt. Rev. Abbondio Cavadini, S.J., Bishop of Mangalore. The deceased prelate was born at Calcinat, in the diocese of Bergamo, Italy, February 5, 1846. From the diocesan seminary he entered as a subdeacon the Society of Jesus in the Tyrol, and later taught the physical sciences at Aux-Alleux, near Laval, in France. Ordained to the priesthood in 1876, Father Cavadini three years later obtained the favor he had long been soliciting from the Rev. Father-General to be sent on the foreign missions. He left for India in December, 1879, and landed at Mangalore before the close of the following month.

To Mangalore the best part of his life was given. During the thirty years of his Indian career he filled the responsible offices of Rector, Superior of the Mission and Bishop. His consecration took place on June 25, 1896. The work nearest his heart was the education of youth. As Rector of the College of Mangalore he guided the destinies of that institution with rare wisdom. It was during this time that the college was affiliated to the Madras University. The interest he took in the college no way abated when he rose successively to be Superior of the Mission and Bishop. He was always ready to help deserving students and spent yearly large sums of money on their advancement. The diocesan seminary, St. Ann's Convent and High School remain as monuments of his zeal.

His Lordship passed away peacefully on Holy Saturday. His mortal remains were laid to rest in the sanctuary of the Cathedral at Mangalore.

Last week's Catholic papers supply a remarkable list, when put together, of nuns who have died recently at an advanced age. Sister Eutropia Follan, the oldest nun in Colorado, died in Denver, aged eighty years. She was a native of Ireland and in her youth had crossed the plains by ox team to Denver, where she established St. Mary's Academy.

The St. Louis papers chronicle the death in that city of Mother Ursula McCoy, an Ursuline. She, too, was born in Ireland, and had she lived until August next would have celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of her religious profession. She had reached the age of seventy.

Sister Theresa, a nun for over half a century, died at Loretto Convent, Santa Fé, N. M., having passed the age of seventy.

The Rev. Mother Sister Mary Cecilia, of the Congregation of Notre Dame, died in Waterbury, Conn., aged seventy-five years, forty-eight of which had been spent in religion.

Sister M. Stanislaus Scott, who died at the home of her Order in Evanston, Ill., had been a Visitandine for fifty-five years. She was born in 1830, in Washington, D.C., and was graduated at the Visitation Academy of Georgetown, at the age of eighteen.

Major-General Victor Edward Law died in England, April 15. He was the youngest son of the Hon. William Towry Law, who, having taken orders in the Church of England, entered the Catholic Church in 1851, and grandson of the first Lord Ellenborough. Born in 1842, he joined the 1st Madras Cavalry in 1859, and in 1872 was appointed to the Indian Foreign Department. In 1897 he retired and returned to England. His eldest brother was the well-known Father Augustus Henry Law, S.J., sent with the first missionary band to the Zambesi. His only daughter is Mother Superior of the Visitation Convent, Harrow-on-the-Hill. He was a Knight of the Order of St. Gregory the Great.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An incident that occurred on Tuesday, when Prince Tsai Tao and his staff visited the Metropolitan Museum of Art will be of interest to the readers of AMERICA. The Chinese prince had viewed the copy of the Nestorian stone and proceeded to one of the lower floors. With Lord Li Ching Mai acting as interpreter, the whole party drew up in front of the Gothic sculptures and spent some little time in gazing at the Entombment of Christ, which comes from the De Biron Château in France.

Lord Li studied the panels and the figures for some time, and he may have read the card on the platform describing where the group came from, and the fact that it was loaned by J. Pierpont Morgan.

Prince Tao, however, looked intensely at the reclining figure of Christ about to be placed in the tomb, and it was clear that something puzzled him. Suddenly he spoke in Chinese in a low tone to Lord Li, and going over to the figure of Christ, placed his finger on the open wound made by the Roman soldier.

Lord Li evidently could not answer the question put to him by the prince, and the former in English asked: "He wants to know what's that for?" pointing to the wound in Christ's side.

Nobody in the party for a moment replied to the question, but finally Lord Li was informed that the group represented a fundamental mystery in the teachings of the Christian religion.

It is said that until a few months ago the prince, who is about twenty-four years old, never saw the outside of the walls of Pekin.

CHRONICLE

President Appoints Roosevelt.—Colonel Roosevelt was appointed by President Taft a special ambassador to represent the United States at the funeral of King Edward VII in London, May 20. King George has designated Lord Dundonald and Commander Charles E. F. Cunninghame Graham as aides-de-camp to attend upon the Ambassador during his stay in London. Lord Dundonald was commander of the Canadian militia in the Boer War and is Colonel of the Second Life Guards. Graham was made a commander on the emergency list in 1903, and is a groom-in-waiting to the king.

Freight Rate War Declared.—The Pennsylvania Railroad has proclaimed a rate war against the New England roads in defense of Philadelphia's differential. The fight is between Philadelphia and Boston. The Pennsylvania Railroad makes good its promise of several months ago that it would cut rates indefinitely, if forced to do so to maintain Philadelphia's differential over Boston. The reduction, which will go into effect on June 11, will be not less than six cents nor more than eight cents per hundred pounds on commodity freight of the first class to Chicago. Baltimore differential rate of two cents under Philadelphia will be maintained so that at no time while the fight is on shall the Maryland's seaport differential be disturbed. The general feeling is that something may turn up between now and June 10 to avert the freight war and adjust the rate differences on a basis satisfactory to all parties concerned.

Friar Lands Sale.—The House passed three resolutions, favorably reported by the committee on insular affairs, bearing on the acquisition by the sugar trust of Friar lands in the Philippines. One of the resolutions calls for the original letter written by the Secretary of War to the Attorney-General asking the latter's opinion as to whether Friar lands were protected by the limitations of the organic law of the Philippine Islands, together with all data submitted to the Secretary of War by counsel for Horace Havemeyer and other purchasers of the Friar lands and transmitted to the Attorney-General. These resolutions were originally introduced by Representative Martin (Democrat) of Colorado.

Timbered Areas Afire.—Vast tracts of the forest region in Minnesota and Wisconsin have been swept by flames. The densest pall of smoke seen in a score of years was reported hanging over Lake Superior and fires appeared to be burning in all directions. The fires have been raging for several days along the lines of the Northern Pacific and Great Northern. For several weeks there has been no rain in the copper country.

Public Domain Increase.—In accordance with the agreement recently made between the departments of the Interior and Agriculture, the President signed eight more proclamations restoring to the public domain 177,246 acres from the forests of Washington, Idaho and Colorado. According to the estimate of the Forest Service, this agreement will result finally in the restoration to the public domain of 4,000,000 acres.

General News Items.—The battleship Florida, the largest in the American navy, was launched at the Brooklyn Navy-yard.—Later accounts indicate that the recent earthquake in Costa Rica was more destructive than was first reported, the dead now being estimated at more than 2,000.—The Senate committee on naval affairs increased the naval appropriation authorized by the House to $130,770,934, providing for two battleships, six torpedo destroyers and one submarine.—For the first time during this session of Congress, the House Republicans stood together and voted solidly for the railroad bill. The measure passed by a vote of 200 to 126. Ten Democrats were recorded in the affirmative.

Mexico.—Chile.—Cuba.—Under a suspension of rules the Mexican Congress has voted 25,000 pesos for the relief of the Cartago earthquake sufferers.—Government examiners of the oil wells of Carelmapú near the Chiloe islands in the southern part of Chile report vast deposits of petroleum which will prove a source of wealth for that country.—Statistics published by Cuba's Department of Immigration show that the population of the island has been increased by over 25,000 males and 4,000 females, eighty per cent. of the number of immigrants coming from Spain.

Reconcentrados in Nicaragua.—A private letter gives the information that General Irias, as delegate of President Madriz, has ordered the inhabitants of the district between Granada and Ochomogo to abandon their holdings without leaving even a caretaker and assemble near Granada. The Madriz troops are engaged in cutting down the growing crops that the poor people have been forced to abandon. Carlos Marengo, the proprietor of a plantation near Ochomogo, received a preparatory flogging, 150 blows in all, and was led off to jail, though hardly able to walk, where it was hoped that valuable information about the Estrada forces might be extorted from him.

Missionaries in Paraguay.—Three priests and four lay brothers of the Society of the Divine Word, whose American headquarters are at Techny, Illinois, have undertaken to reopen the world-famous "reductions" among the Guarani Indians which were so successful in the eighteenth century.

Catholic University in Argentina.—From a Catholic viewpoint, one of the most important events in commemoration of the centenary of Argentine independence was the inauguration on April 15 of the Catholic University of Buenos Aires, under the patronage of the Immaculate Conception. The most Rev. Archbishop Mariano A. Espinosa officiated. The first Rector is Mgr. Luis Duprat.

Canada.—Generals French and Henderson sailed from England for Quebec on May 12. General Sir John Denton Pinkstone French, K.C.M.G., is coming to Canada in a semi-official capacity, and will conduct an inspection of the Canadian forces at the principal points throughout the Dominion. It was thought that the death of the King might interfere with his plans, but it is evident that this was found not to be the case. He is due to arrive in Quebec on the 20th, and the inspection of the militia of the Montreal district is fixed for May 28. General French first entered the navy, but, not liking the sea, was afterward transferred to the army and became famous as a cavalry officer. He had great fighting experience in the Soudan and South Africa and made a remarkable escape from Ladysmith with important despatches on the eve of its investment by the Boers. He has been Inspector-General of the British forces since 1907, when he was promoted General.—A despatch to the Montreal Star, dated Winnipeg, May 13, says that the outstanding feature of the University of Manitoba examinations, the results of which were announced on that day, is the large proportion of failures and partial failures in the first, second and third years. Of 134 first-year students in the Arts course, 34 were total failures, and no less than 58 will require to take supplementary examinations in September, only 42 passing clear. So remarkable is this that Dr. Sparling, principal of Wesley College, predicts a commission to inquire if some of the rejected students do not deserve to pass. The students claim that the standard is too high and that the work was never before so difficult. It is said that some of the professors agree.

Great Britain.—The Bill based on the Government's House of Lords' resolution and to be introduced when Parliament reassembles, has been printed. Its preamble states the intention of changing the House of Lords into a popular chamber and that, as this change cannot be made at once, it is necessary to regulate the relations between the two Houses. The regulations provided are: that a money Bill not passed by the Lords in a month after its receipt is to be presented to the king for assent; the Lords may not amend a money Bill; a Bill passed in three successive sessions of the same or successive parliaments and rejected by the Lords, is to go to the king in the way prescribed for a money Bill; amendments insisted upon by the Lords and rejected by the Commons are equivalent to a rejection of the Bill; a Bill held up by the Lords is not to be deemed changed if the Commons make additions to it necessary on account of changed circumstances; the Speaker is constituted judge of the necessity of such changes and of what constitutes a money Bill. Conservative journals point out that though the measure is ostensibly temporary, there is nothing to prevent its being permanent. On the contrary, as it is virtually the abolition of the House of Lords by the destruction of all its legislative powers, those who seek the absolute supremacy of the Commons will use every pretext to postpone the constitution of the new second chamber. Moreover, the new powers to be given to the Speaker will change his relations with the House and will be a strong motive for the election of a strong partizan by the majority. Mr. Keir Hardie disapproves of the Bill as a step to a written constitution which, he points out, has in other countries been made an instrument of tyranny. He would prefer resolutions only to arrange the difficulties between the two Houses.—Mr. Joseph Fels, an American citizen, is taking an active part in the Committee for the Taxation of Land Values, organized to propagate Mr. Lloyd-George's views, and has subscribed to its funds £5,000. Unionists take exceptions to this, asking what would happen if a British subject were to interfere in the same way with domestic politics in the United States.—Captain Frederick Guest, Liberal member for East Dorset, has been unseated for corrupt practices during the last elections.—The Contemporary Review published in its May number an article reflecting very severely on the late King, blaming his failure to prevent the rejection of the Budget by the Peers, and asserting not only the House of Lords but also the Monarchy to be on trial. The article roused such indignation amongst many of the newspapers to which advance copies had been sent, that the number was withdrawn as far as possible from circulation.—Mr. Keir Hardie, in a public speech declared loyalty to the throne to be a great superstition advantageous to kings and nobles, but blinding the people to their own interests.—Justice, a Socialist organ, states that its party does not want a good king any more than it wants good peers or good capitalists. It simply wants to get rid of them all.—A refusal of buyers to pay the prices asked at the weekly rubber sales brought on a flurry in the shares of the new rubber companies, and many private persons speculating in them lost heavily.

Ireland.—A letter of Mr. Redmond's to Mr. Asquith, which, immediately following the announcement of King Edward's death, called attention to the phrases in the King's inaugural oath that were offensive and insulting to Catholics and demanded their removal, was a feature of the renewed discussion regarding the King's oath. The Catholic Disabilities Bill, covering this and other anti-Catholic discriminations, was introduced last year by Mr. Wm. Redmond, M.P., and obtained a majority in the House of Commons, but was shelved, ostensibly on the grounds that the Lords would reject it.—The silver jubilee of the establishment of the Irish Industries Association, under the auspices of Lady Aberdeen, disclosed the fact that Irish cottage and other industries are largely patronized in England and America and have increased fourfold within the period. Mr. T. W. Russell said that it had cost the Department of Agriculture $20,000, and private enterprises a larger amount, to prosecute English companies who advertised and sold their wares as Irish. Eggs, bacon, butter, serge, lace, linen and other articles of an inferior quality originating from Russia, Denmark, France, Britain and even Styria, were sold as Irish, thereby depreciating the reputation while paying tribute to the superiority of Irish goods. Convictions were secured in all cases, but the penalty was slight.—The fourteenth annual Feis Ceoil (Gaelic literary and musical competition) lasted six days and in the number and quality of entries surpassed all previous records.

How France Voted.—Although La Croix is pleased with the result of the first ballot on April 24, because it shows that the onward march of the bloc has been checked, yet it may be well to set down the official figures for that election, so that Catholics may not be too sanguine of a speedy escape from anticlerical tyranny. No doubt these official figures, depending as they do on the honesty and veracity of men who flout honesty and veracity, are not precisely trustworthy; but they may be considered a remote approximation to the reality on the principle that a liar must be plausible if he hopes to be believed. These, then, are the numbers of votes in the general elections of April 24, according to official returns: Republicans, represented by M. Briand, and comprising Radicals and Radical-Socialists, Republicans of the Left, Republicans (pure and simple), Independent Socialists and Independent Radicals, 4,909,347; Opposition, headed by M. Piou, the Catholic leader, and comprising Conservatives and Liberals, 1,516,308; Socialists, unified, and revolutionary, led by M. Guesde, 1,094,837; Progressists, represented by M. Aynard, 787,006; Nationalists, represented by M. Barrès, 149,564; sundry voters, 72,566; blank or spoiled ballots, 34,088; total of voters, 8,563,716. Even professedly Republican papers admit that the prevailing tone of the two balloting makes for moderation and that in particular the proposed educational monopoly will not be insisted on, because it met with great opposition in all the country districts. Two elections which are, on the avowal of Government organs, a discredit to French electors are those of ex-Professor Thalamas, the insulter of Jeanne d'Arc, who was elected Deputy for Seine-et-Oise, on May 8, the feast of the heroine, and of M. Goude, the revolutionist, against whom were arrayed all the partisans of order, but who was elected by a formal mandate of M. Combes obliging his followers to vote for this antipatriotic candidate rather than for a moderate one.

Emperor Francis Joseph in Hungary.—The Emperor, known as King when he visits his Hungarian dominions, was welcomed with unbounded enthusiasm by the Magyars on his entrance into Budapest last week. The present visit of Francis Joseph, occurring as it does in the midst of a heated election campaign such as Hungary has never before experienced, is accepted by all as a political move of the greatest importance.

The Hungarian Elections.—What is to be the result of the June elections? General indications seem to point to a result which will take the kingdom out of the slough of parliamentary unrest in which Hungary has been for years to her own great loss. The Premier, Graf Khuen, is doing valiant service and proving himself a man of determined policy. Advices coming to us regret the fact that the elections were not held shortly after the outrageous attack on the Premier and Minister of Agriculture Serenyi, chronicled in this column some weeks ago. Had they been, the Hungarian electors would undoubtedly have made clear their disgust with the tactics of the Justh group. Meanwhile the government party and the newly-organized Christian Socialist party, working together, are making strenuous efforts to assure a majority in the new house which will permit that peaceful despatch of parliamentary business which the present condition of Hungary makes imperative.

Charges Germany with Unfairness.—What appears to be a condemnation by the Ministry of War of the Zeppelin airships for military purposes has been the cause of much ill-feeling between the supporters of the inventor and those of the Government. Count Zeppelin voiced his personal indignation at a dinner in his honor, at which many leading politicians were present. He complained that the ministry had put difficulties in his way and he feared the Kaiser had been influenced to look upon the Zeppelin type of airship as worthless. The count did not hesitate to threaten a public appeal to the Reichstag in case the attacks did not cease. Count Zeppelin's outburst aroused a sensation among the people, the majority of whom look upon him as a national hero.

Americans Win in Potash Fight.—Ambassador Hill notified the State Department in Washington that as a result of protestations made by it to Germany, American manufacturers and users of potash fertilizers have gained a victory in the struggle that has been going on before the German Reichstag over the export of potash from the Government-controlled mines. The United States draws practically all of its muriate of potash from Germany and imports annually 200,000 tons, valued at $7,000,000. A bill which the Reichstag proposed to pass, would abrogate all contracts which American importers had made with German miners and so restrict exportation that American fertilizers would be immediately forced up in price. In the form in which the bill has passed, the Government retains authority to fix the price of potash within certain limits. It will then rest with the discretion of the German executive officers to determine whether the American trade shall be heavily taxed for the benefit of the German treasury.

Second Century of the Berlin "Charite."—An interesting celebration of last week was that of the two-hundredth anniversary of the royal "Charité" foundation. The Charité is Berlin's most noted hospital and its history makes it famous beyond Germany's limits. Its beginning dates from 1710, a year of dread pestilence in Central Europe. Frederick I caused to be erected a pest-house in the suburbs of his capital to prepare for the coming plague. The city was spared its ravages and the pest-house became instead a hospital and workhouse. In the year 1726 Frederic William I, by royal foundation, converted it into a municipal hospital and medical school. The old plant, rebuilt, renewed and finally greatly enlarged in 1901, serves to-day the clinic departments of twelve universities as well as that of the noted Pathological Institute opened in 1899 in connection with the Virchow Museum.

German Pilgrims Received by the Pope.—Visiting Rome en route home from Jerusalem, after assisting at the dedication of the imposing national foundation on Mount Sion, the German pilgrimage was received in special audience by Pius X. In an address to the Holy Father, Cardinal Fischer recounted the story of the foundation, erected by the generous gifts of the Catholics of the Empire following the suggestion of the Society for the Protection of the Holy Places. He recalled the sympathy with the work shown by Emperor William, who contributed a princely donation to further the enterprise, and he used the opportunity to solemnly proclaim the grateful loyalty of the German Catholics to Emperor and Fatherland. Responding to the Cardinal's address His Holiness expressed his gratification over the success which had marked every detail of the solemn dedication on Mount Sion, the chronicle of which in the newspapers, he said, he had followed with deepest interest. He made appreciative mention of the action of the Emperor in sending his son to represent him at the ceremony, and of the similar thoughtfulness of the Prince Regent of Bavaria, who had delegated two princes of the royal house to be present. At the close of the audience the Apostolic blessing was solemnly given to the pilgrims.

Models for Germans.—The Prussian Minister of Instruction caused a sensation by quoting American liberality towards educational institutions as a model for Prussian millionaires. In a speech in the House of Deputies he enumerated the greatest of the donations of the last years, stating that such gifts to Prussian institutions of learning were almost unheard of.

Freemasonry and the Young Turks.—The London Times has an illuminating communication from its Constantinople correspondent. Like every other modern revolutionary movement in Europe, Young Turkey is identified with Freemasonry. The revolt against Abdul Hamid was planned in the Jewish Lodges of Salonica. Many Turks were brought into the Lodges on the plea that Masonry is a British institution and much stress was laid on the fact that the late King Edward had been, while Prince of Wales, its Grand Master. The frequent occurrence in internal politics of the masonic catchwords, clerical and reactionary, shows the influence of the organization.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Corpus Christi

The institution of the Feast of Corpus Christi in the thirteenth century illustrates two phases of the Church's life: her more explicit definition of doctrine in rebuttal of insurgent heresy, and her method of controlling private revelations. Until Berengarius, who died in 1088 and retracted his errors before death, the doctrine of the Real Presence had remained in undisputed possession for more than ten centuries. Even with regard to Berengarius it is not absolutely certain that he denied the Real Presence, though he certainly held false views concerning it. But there is no doubt that he denied that substantial transformation of the elements into the Body and Blood of Christ which has since been technically termed Transubstantiation. The errors of Berengarius, as has happened so often with other heresies, led to a more precise formulation of the Catholic doctrine about the Blessed Eucharist. Some expressions, used by the adversaries of Berengarian error, were corrected.

It was Hildebert of Lavardin, Bishop of Le Mans and afterwards Archbishop of Tours, a contemporary if not a pupil of Berengarius, who first used the word "transubstantiation." The Council of Rome in 1079, when condemning Berengarius, expresses, more clearly than any document before it, the nature of this substantial change; and St. Thomas Aquinas, in his definition of Transubstantiation, uses almost the same terms as the council. Though the feast of Corpus Christi was not officially established till the second half of the thirteenth century, its institution was probably influenced by these eucharistic controversies. Although, apart from Eusebius Bruno, who, at least for a time, supported Berengarius, no theologian of importance systematically defended his heresy, yet his influence was considered sufficiently dangerous to warrant a condemnation of Berengarius by the Council of Piacenza in Italy in 1095, seven years after his death, and his teachings favored to some extent the various, though not influential, heresies of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries about the Blessed Eucharist. Hence it was felt that the time had come for a more solemn affirmation of Catholic belief in this central dogma.

Then, in conformity with the needs of the Middle Ages and in preparation for the far greater conflicts of the sixteenth century, came a private revelation made, as frequently is the case, to a woman. The instrument of Divine Providence was Blessed Juliana of Mont Cornillon. She was born in 1193 at Retinnes near Liège. Orphaned at five years of age, she was educated by the Augustinian nuns of Mont Cornillon. The Roman Breviary tells us that, with the help of the Holy Ghost, she made such progress that she seemed to have reached the perfection of all virtues, and, when she had become a professed religious in that monastery and afterward its superior, she drew all eyes to her by her austere and holy life. Wonderful was her love of God and of her neighbor, her humility, obedience, piety, abstinence, zeal for mental prayer, and her special supernatural gifts. From her early youth Juliana had a great veneration and love for the Blessed Sacrament. In her more mature years she used her influence to exhort others to this devotion, and God, who has chosen the weak things of this world, inspired this humble virgin to promote the worship of the Most Holy Eucharist. While "prostrate before the august Sacrament, she received a divine illumination to the effect that there should be instituted in the Church a special solemnity of the Body of Christ."

She made known her revelation to Robert de Thorete, then Bishop of Liège, to the learned Dominican Hugh, later cardinal-legate in the Netherlands, and to Jacques Pantaléon, at that time Archdeacon of Liège, afterward Bishop of Verdun, Patriarch of Jerusalem, and finally Pope as Urban IV. Here comes in the Church's way of dealing with private revelations. Their possibility is, of course, admitted; but, contrary to what occurs in the irresponsible Protestant world, ever eager to welcome the marvellous direct intercourse between the Creator and His creature without controlling either fact or doctrine, the Church examines carefully and dispassionately into both. Is it a fact that this person has received a divine revelation? Although the fact of a private revelation, outside of the Scripture record, has never been the object of an infallible pronouncement by the Church, its high probability may be gathered from the heroic degree of virtue to which the alleged recipient of this favor has undoubtedly attained. A profoundly humble person would not be likely to mistake imagination for objective reality, nor to seek notoriety by falsehood. Hence it is that the Breviary insists so much on the great virtue of Juliana.

But, even if the fact of obvious sincerity and evident absence of hallucination be admitted, there remains the supreme test of doctrine. No private revelation that goes counter to the received teaching of the Church can be true. This test was most triumphantly applied to Juliana's case. Nothing could be more conformable to the mind of the Church than the institution of a special feast to commemorate exclusively the Real Presence of the Body of Christ in His Church. No doubt Maundy Thursday does commemorate this great gift; but, as it occurs in Holy Week, a season of gloom and sorrow, during which the faithful are absorbed in thoughts of Our Lord's Passion; and, as so many other functions take place on this eve of Good Friday, the institution of the Blessed Eucharist cannot then receive all the attention and devotion it deserves. This is mentioned, in the Bull "Transiturus" as the chief reason for the introduction of the new feast.

But we must not anticipate. Bishop Robert de Thorete was favorably impressed, and as bishops at that time still had the right of ordering feasts for their dioceses, he called a synod in 1246 and ordered the celebration to be held in the following year. Though he did not live to witness the carrying out of his order, for he died on October 16, 1246, the feast was duly celebrated the next year for the first time by the canons of St. Martin at Liège.

Blessed Juliana lived eleven years after this first fulfillment of her lifelong desire, and died April 5, 1258. A little more than three years later, on August 29, 1261, Jacques Pantaléon became Pope. A recluse named Eve, with whom Juliana had spent some time, and who was also a fervent adorer of the Blessed Sacrament, now urged Henry of Guelders, then Bishop of Liège, to beg the Pope to extend the celebration to the entire world. Urban IV, who, it will be remembered, was one of the three to whom Juliana communicated her revelation, and who had always admired the feast, published on September 8, 1264, the Bull "Transiturus," in which, after extolling the love of Our Saviour as shown in the Blessed Eucharist, he ordered the annual celebration of Corpus Christi on the Thursday following Trinity Sunday, granting at the same time many indulgences to the faithful for attendance at Mass and at the Office.

This Mass and Office, composed at the Pope's request by the Angelic Doctor St. Thomas Aquinas, is a masterful combination of doctrinal exactness and poetic beauty. The death of Pope Urban IV, on October 2, 1264, shortly after the publication of the decree, somewhat impeded the spread of the festival. Clement V again took the matter in hand, and at the General Council of Vienne, in 1311, once more ordered the adoption of the feast. He published a new decree which embodied that of Urban IV. John XXII, successor of Clement V, urged its observance. Neither decree mentions the procession as a feature of the celebration. This procession, in which the Sacred Host is borne with great solemnity, was already held in some places, and was enriched with indulgences by Popes Martin V and Eugenius IV. The feast had been accepted in 1306 at Cologne; Worms adopted it in 1315; Strasburg in 1316. In England it was introduced from Belgium between 1320 and 1325. After that it spread quickly throughout the whole Catholic world.

The splendor and devotion of Corpus Christi processions in Catholic countries, such as Austria and Spain, and, not so long ago, France, now crushed under the heel of the persecutor, need not be dwelt upon here. But we may well carry our thoughts a few months forward to the solemn procession of the Blessed Sacrament which will close the Eucharistic Congress of Montreal in the early afternoon of Sunday, September 11. There, as in this country, Corpus Christi is solemnized on the Sunday after Trinity. "Procession Sunday," as it is there called by non-Catholics, is respected by them and looked forward to with interest.

But, of course, its spirit of faith, love and triumph is the secret of the faithful, and it is, whenever the weather is fine on that day, a most impressive sight. However, the annual Fête-Dieu procession of Montreal will—of course if the weather permits—be eclipsed this year by the unparalleled external homage which all the Catholics of Montreal and all the Catholic visitors to the Congress will render to their Sacramental King. To adopt some burning words of Father Faber's, it will be "a day of triumph rather even than of joy, a day of power, of fearlessness, of public profession of faith, of the heavenly insult of truth over doubt."

LEWIS DRUMMOND, S.J.

Mr. Roosevelt vs. M. Briand

The French elections, as everyone who was acquainted with the situation foreknew, resulted in the return of the Radical-Socialist bloc in about the same numbers as before. It was all prettily arranged; the active minority were well drilled and the majority were too supine or indifferent to make even an attempt to upset the arrangements. There were just 20 free and independent voters in the commune of Blanchefontaine. Of these 19 were disqualified for various reasons, and one solitary elector sent a deputy to the Chamber to decide the fate of the nation—and, of course, to support the Government. The occurrence has illustrative value, for the voter of Blanchefontaine was apparently representative of the average French citizen. There was no protest. There never is, Max O'Rell tells us, unless against the government in power when a bad harvest or something similar occurs. This elector and his deputy give point to Mr. Roosevelt's declaration a few days before: "The main source of national power and national greatness is to be found in the average citizenship of a nation." The average Frenchman's pride in his country's honor seems lost in his greed for personal aggrandizement and he no longer possesses the will or the energy to restore it by breaking up the combination of unprincipled politicians who have been for generations sapping the foundations of the national character.

Another of Mr. Roosevelt's utterances hits both the average citizen and the average French politician: "Probably the best test of true love of liberty in any country is the way in which minorities are treated in that country. Not only should there be complete liberty in matters of religion and opinion but complete liberty for each man to lead his life as he desires, provided only that in doing so he does not wrong his neighbor. Persecution is bad because it is persecution and without reference to which side happens at the moment to be the persecutor and which the persecuted." It required daring to pronounce such a dictum before the political caucus that is now exploiting France. A few days before M. Briand had defined the true Republican as a man who not only would never turn his back on the work of secularization which had been accomplished—by means that are now notorious—during the last ten years, but "who, desiring fresh progress, upholds this work and intends to defend it." That is, the policy of wholesale confiscation of your opponents' property and the denial to them of their natural and religious rights must be maintained, strengthened and made permanent.

And these gentlemen, who have made politics a trade in principle and an art in practice, seem quite able to uphold their system. M. Léon Bourgeois, one of their ablest and most prominent representatives, after making, in the Revue de Paris, the usual platitudinous pleas for parliamentary and social reform and against centralization, reveals unwittingly the secret of the corruptionists' power in France. Proportional representation, he says, will be no remedy for the evils of the electoral system, since already the spirit of initiative and personal enterprise has fallen asleep in the fetters of administrative control. This unnatural slumber has been effected by the continuous administration of drugs to the body politic in well-selected doses of promise and performance.

The judicious use of public money, the ready pledge to effect social reforms or any other reforms that will gratify the turbulent, the multiplication of offices for the convenience of active and influential voters and their friends, and indiscriminate appeals to every local passion of the hour have combined to demoralize the public life of France. It has produced a docile, unprincipled, active and ever-increasing minority whose thorough organization has rendered the listless and drooping majority impotent and made the dominant government clique omnipotent. And the thing has been so well done, the drugs have been administered so long and so effectively that the devisers and executors of the system boldly insist that it must now be continued to the end, for, however reprehensible it may be intrinsically, their subjects have become so inured to it, so besotted by its influence, that there is no hope of a cure. Parliamentary reform and proportional representation, it is claimed, will not make the average citizen better; they will only serve to represent him better and apparently he is either unwilling to be represented at all or incapable of presenting a good appearance.

"The State is left to decide too many points" (says M. Bourgeois), "and, above all, the peace and quiet of State employment is preferred to the risks of trade and business. And the habits of the Chamber merely reflect the habits of the people."

This is another way of putting the fundamental axiom—the stream will not permanently rise higher than the main source—on which the Paris lecture on the duties of citizenship was built, but the inferences therefrom of the French politician and the American statesman are absolutely contradictory. Mr. Roosevelt draws the obvious conclusion: "The average citizen must be a good citizen if our Republics are to succeed." M. Bourgeois virtually admits that his average citizen, the one who is desirous to vote and whose vote is desirable, is not a good citizen, that the Republic must succeed without his becoming so, and that the success of himself and his clique is the all-important consideration.

The American lecturer would certainly not approve that type of citizenship which prefers "peace and quiet," not only to the strenuous life, but to the mere risks of ordinary commercial pursuits. But when the citizen's ideal is, to receive safe and permanent harborage in a snug government berth, and the government abundantly provides and multiplies berths with lavish prodigality in order to secure him the realization of his ideal, it is evident that the stream exhibits no tendency either to rise higher than its source or to purify the fountain, if indeed "the habits of the Chamber merely reflect the habits of the people."

The statement is quite true, at least of that portion of the people who, in constituencies sedulously nursed and at elections dexterously managed, supply the Chamber with Radical-Socialist deputies. For decades the ruling spirits of the anticlerical group have been carefully moulding the habits of the people, and now, when they have succeeded in habituating to corruption a number sufficient to ensure them control, they put up the ingenuous plea that the corrupt and tyrannical habits of the Chamber are merely a reflection of the sovereign and uncontrolled electorate.

While thoughtful Frenchmen are lamenting that all this vicious fostering of corruption by political tricksters and self-seekers is undermining and cankering the national character which in past centuries glorified the name of France, is crushing the spirit of enterprise and initiative and feeding the vices that are literally sucking her life-blood and leaving her cradles untenanted, the French Premier, having gathered in a crop of deputies according to his sowing, is devoting his attention, not to stanching the blood and binding the wounds, but to intensifying further the strife that was and is the most potent factor in national decay. The overthrow of religion, to which he and his party have been bending their energies, regardless of national interests and honor, has not been sufficiently complete. Religion and morality, the only efficient builders of character, must be utterly wiped out, State paganism must inspire the schools and, if possible, infest the churches, and then when the source is thoroughly polluted, the stream of government will flow serenely through the pleasant fields of Communism or Collectivism, and all will be well with France.

Mr. Roosevelt, speaking from the American idea of a republican form of government, told the doctors and doctrinaires of the Sorbonne, that the citizens of a successful Republic must learn to combine intensity of individual conviction with a broad tolerance of the equally strong convictions of their fellow citizens. M. Briand laid it down as essential to good citizenship and loyalty to republican principles that all voters must accept the convictions of the party in power, override the convictions of their opponents and persecute them out of existence.

Apart from the impossibility of a war upon conscience and inalienable and insuppressible natural rights obtaining permanent success, there are numerous signs that the anticlerical deputies who have been ground out from the government machine do not truly represent the French nation, and that its salvation will be wrought on the lines laid down by the ex-President of the United States rather than on the partizan and persecuting program of the present Premier of France. M. KENNY, S.J.

A Lesson from Statistics

Germans are credited with a genius for organization, and the remarkable development of the German nation since the war of 1870 offers fair proof that the compliment is not ill-deserved. Carlyle tells us that genius "means the transcendent capacity of taking trouble," an explanation which preeminently describes the genius of the Germans. They are unsurpassed as organizers, because they never grow weary in their absorbing attention to details.

An illuminating evidence is offered in the huge volumes which issue from the office of the statistician of the empire year after year. Reports full, accurate and, in striking contrast to the product of similar officials nearer home, always timely, contain the last word on almost every conceivable interest touching the life of the people. An illustration of the effectiveness of the use made of these reports will prove of interest, since it furnishes an admirable example of the thoroughness with which vital facts are submitted to the consideration of the people. Like ourselves the Germans are giving much heed just now to the problem of reform in living conditions. Unlike ourselves, however, they are not running after reform in haphazard fashion, touching now this and now that, with scarcely a suggestion of methodical and practical search for what is immediately attainable.

There has come to AMERICA a copy of a leaflet developed from information on one simple topic contained in volume 200 of the "Statistics of the German Empire" recently published. This volume presents the new longevity tables which are to be authoritative in Germany wherever question may arise regarding the average life of man. Based on the census returns of the decade, 1891-1900, the tables show a notable decrease in the rate of mortality for the empire during the last thirty years of the nineteenth century. During that period the "probable length of life" has risen for males from 38.1 years to 48.25 years, and for females from 42.5 to 54.9 years. The manifest betterment of mortality conditions is naturally affirmed to give evidence of improved social conditions, taking that much-used term in its wider significance.

We are accustomed here in America to have information of this sort thrust upon us by the Census Bureau in Washington, but how rarely does the benevolence of that bureau continue beyond the expensive gathering of the information. Not so in Germany. Hardly had the volume mentioned made its appearance when the genius of the German organizer woke to activity. A series of popular tracts was immediately prepared and these were scattered broadcast. The underlying cause of the reduced mortality was traced to the social reforms introduced of late years, and the happy result thus achieved was used as a motive to renewed efforts for wider reform.

The new longevity tables, it was argued, showing as they do, better health conditions in the nation and in consequence an advance in developmental capacity, offer an excellent proof of the beneficial results brought about through recent legislation. The laws enacted in favor of better hygiene conditions in factories, protection of labor, old-age pensions and insurance, as well as those leading to systematic self-aid on the part of working people are measures indicating a growing appreciation by governments, parliaments and municipalities that man is the most valuable asset of kingdom and state and city. No wonder, then, that his life and well-being are to be safeguarded with solicitous care. This sentiment has already wrought to such excellent purpose in Germany that the death rate has fallen from 31 in every thousand adults in the year 1871 to 19 in every thousand in the opening year of the present century. Much, however, remains yet to be done. The present records show that among children the mortality is still deplorably high. Of 10,000 male infants born in the empire, 520, and of a like number of females, 489 die in their first year; while in the second year, 211 males and 201 females swell the number. The figures are of themselves a mighty argument to arouse the people to a realization of the sweeping social betterment yet to be worked out in their country.

But the story told in these statistics allows still another development. Someone had noted in its telling how manifestly disproportionate a part of the army and navy forces of the empire is drawn from among the country-born and bred. Fully 75 per cent. of the non-commissioned officers and men in service December 1, 1906, had come from country hamlets, from the small villages and from towns whose population does not exceed five thousand. As imperial regulations are rigidly severe in enforcing military service upon all German youth capable of bearing arms the overwhelming strength of country-bred soldiers and sailors in the army and navy argues a remarkable unpreparedness for military service on the part of those who have spent their youth in the unwholesome surroundings of the larger cities. As a matter of fact these cities regularly average only about 65 per cent. of the recruits naturally expected from their population. At once the "tracts for the people" drive home the moral: "If the defensive strength of our nation is to be safeguarded, it is evident that we are not to rest content with legislation which looks only to the improvement of living conditions in the great populous centres which the commercial and industrial life of to-day have brought into existence. We must learn the lessons our own records inculcate and secure as large a population in our agricultural districts as the lands will bear and the welfare of the nation demands." It is quite a startling development of the "Back to the Land" cry that we hear now and then in America.

Nevertheless the writer of the leaflets is in nowise blind to expediency. While he urges wide colonization of agricultural districts, he recognizes the stubborn truth that Germany's trend to-day lies in the direction of commercial and industrial development. Most of those who make up the annual increase of population, now close to 900,000 in the empire, will unquestionably turn cityward to follow the tendency. Therefore, the lesson runs, whilst colonizing the farm lands, make the living conditions in crowded cities such as to put an end to the decadence of manly vigor which present statistics confirm. The reforms imperative to this end are sanitary regulations in the housing of the poor, better light and air facilities in homes and workshops, the conservation of forests and woodlands, more careful supervision of the public health, more drastic enactments for the protection of our workmen, a closer supervision of woman and child labor, the lessening of danger in all industrial occupations, the rational shortening of working hours—in a word, a general improvement of the material and spiritual condition of the struggling poor.

All of which sounds very like a socialistic plan of battle, many may say. It is not. As was affirmed in a recent article in AMERICA, "these and kindred reforms are quite compatible with the existing social order; some of them exist under it and Socialism has no right to claim as its own whatever aims at the improvement of social conditions." It is a plan mapped out by Christian leaders, Catholic and non-Catholic alike, of a people the great majority of whom are too drenched with common sense, too loyal to moral principle to be affected by vain dreamings. And it is all evolved from the "genius" which finds inspiration in the dry statistics underlying the publication of longevity tables! M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

Masons and Methodists in Rome

While in Rome, Mr. Roosevelt committed another blunder which has escaped with little comment by the Catholic press, that is, his fraternizing with the local Masonic body. Even if there were some persons disposed to find an excuse for our impulsive ex-President for other mistakes, from Protestants as well as Catholics not a word is heard except that of strong condemnation and even indignation at his cordial, brotherly welcome of the notorious Freemasons of Rome. All the world knows well what a wholly different class of men many of the Masons are in England and America from those on the Continent of Europe. Many English Masons in Rome are careful to conceal the fact, for here the body is allied with the most outspoken enemies of law, order, good government and all religion. After his affront to all Catholics by his discourtesy to their Supreme Head, why did Mr. Roosevelt choose the Eternal City as the only capital on the Continent to fraternize with the Masons and all that is thus implied? Professions of sympathy with and appreciation of Catholics stand for little in the face of an open act of hostility to the Catholic world and to the Sovereign Pontiff.

Probably even now there are some Americans at home wondering why the Methodist body in Rome is treated as of so much importance, while there is no feeling of animosity towards the other Protestant sects. The Methodists from the United States came here with a plainly avowed purpose, to which they have adhered tenaciously ever since—that of fighting the Papacy by every means possible, and of enticing from the Catholic Faith the Italian people, old and young. No methods seem too vile if they serve this purpose. They are supplied abundantly with funds from home, and have a large building on the Quirinal Hill admirably equipped to lure the poor Italian. Gymnasium, swimming baths, and schools of various sorts, industrial and otherwise, and the inevitable "chapel," though this is a small one. It is like the old case of "soupers" in Ireland. Money is given with lavish hand, and much material aid of other sorts.

Their printing press is active and they publish in their weekly newspaper, the Evangelista, vile misrepresentations of Catholic teaching and wicked slanders of her clergy. They spread broadcast leaflets written in Italian posing as exponents of Catholic belief but which are in truth amazing and impudent travesties of the Faith.

Another favorite scheme of these Methodists is to get in touch with any priest who has fallen from grace: no matter how evil his life has been, he is taken to their hearts, made much of, and used in their unholy propaganda. They make great capital out of these defections from the Faith, but as far as actual facts can be got at, there seem to be only two authentic cases, and these were men already in disgrace in the Church.

If the old adage holds true that a man is known by the company he keeps, let that be applied to this aggressive body in Rome. There is a scurrilous newspaper published here, the Asino, appealing to the public with blasphemous caricatures of the Pope and the Church. The editor, Podrecca, is a member of the House of Deputies. The Methodists are hand in glove with this man and his publication. A few specimens of his caricatures will serve to show the sort of pabulum that he offers the public. In one, the Pope is represented as a drunken old man with a pigeon on his head, this in ridicule of the Holy Ghost. The seven Sacraments are jeered at in a most indecent manner. In another caricature, a young woman is depicted as going to Confession while a priest is leering at her. A favorite illustration is that of our good Holy Father—so well known the world over as the reverse of this—as perpetually counting over piles of gold. Again they dare to represent the figure of Our Lord on a donkey with Podrecca at his side holding a copy of the Asino in his hand, while the Pope, with tiara on his head, points at them saying: "These are my enemies." The professed purpose of this scandalous newspaper is "to expose the immorality of the Vatican and the Church of Rome." Is it to be wondered at that the Methodist body here is viewed in an entirely different light from all other Protestant sects?

What inroads have they succeeded in making into the faith of this Catholic people? A good deal of mischief has been done, of course, but from all trustworthy sources, the actual number of sincere conversions seems small. They have destroyed the faith of some weak Catholics, but without succeeding in making Methodists of them. Young and old flock to their meetings, some to be taught and others to be amused, for the Italian folk are eager for both. Then, too, they are lavish with their money and as many of the Roman people are sadly handicapped by their poverty, the chance to get on in life is often too tempting to be refused. Many are the backsliders, however, after the food has been eaten and the lessons learned.

Now what are Catholics doing here to combat this? The contrast between the amount of money on hand in the two bodies is very marked. The Methodists are very rich, and the Fairbanks and Roosevelt affairs have served to swell their bank account. Catholics are working zealously, though under a terrible disadvantage from lack of the pecuniary resources to carry out all that they would so willingly do for the cause. If only friends in America would send out generous contributions, it would indeed be furthering work for God.

"The Catholic Free Night School for Foreign Languages" was started fifteen years, with a capital of one hundred francs on hand, by the Rev. De Mandato, S.J., who came to Rome for the special purpose of counteracting the Methodist educational methods. Whenever possible a Catholic school was opened in the near neighborhood of one taught by the Methodists. That has succeeded admirably in drawing away pupils from the latter. The Chief Councillor of this school is Archbishop Stonor, of Trebizond, the Director, the Very Rev. Mgr. Nardone, and the second Councillor and most active worker is Mr. W. Osborne Christmas, an Englishman, long resident in Rome, and private chamberlain to His Holiness. Mr. Christmas has taught untiring in the evening school for fifteen years, and now averages about twenty-six lessons a week.

The object of the school is to give young men unable to pay for tuition, an opportunity to learn foreign languages, in order to obtain lucrative situations. Three years ago the school was consolidated with the "Riunione Romana dei Giovani Studenti." The present need of this institution is a large building with gymnasium, etc.

When schools were started by Catholics the outcry was raised that good Catholics were the enemies of Italy, and Nasi, the Minister of Public Instruction, tried to close their schools by saying they were political. At first there was no direct religious teaching in the school though the sessions were opened and closed with prayer. The religious influence was there but might be called negative. Two years ago, a change was made for the higher class of students, and religious instruction twice a week became obligatory, while for those who worked at a trade during the day, having thus less time, once a week was the rule. This change of plan has brought down the number of pupils from four hundred to two hundred, but it is hoped that the defection is only temporary.

The club for boys in Trastevere, for which Cardinal Merry del Val worked so faithfully for years before his arduous duties as Secretary of State made his frequent personal attendance impossible, has been consolidated with that of the Christian Brothers.

A body of Christian Brothers from Ireland has a fine building with a roomy playground and garden and a prosperous school in a populous quarter in what is practically a new part of Rome—the Prati—where new streets have been laid out and blocks of houses built since the occupation of Rome in 1870. Their day pupils number two hundred and they receive definite religious instruction. They conduct night schools also for lads working in the daytime, and in these the atmosphere is Catholic, and the meetings opened and closed with prayer, though there is no direct religious teaching: but they always make an annual retreat, and prepare for their Easter duty.

Last year at the Holy Father's Jubilee, a Boys' Club was founded in Rome called the "Circolo Pio Dieci," and the Pope's motto, "Instaurare omnia in Christo," was inscribed on their banner and blessed by His Holiness. These youths average from sixteen to twenty years of age. Many sorts of games are provided for them as well as lectures given and lessons in foreign languages.

This is necessarily an inadequate report of the work done here. Women of Religious Orders are also trying to do their share, aided, too, by lay workers, to teach working women useful trades, dressmaking and otherwise, and training for domestic service.

A mischievous suggestion urged lately by the Methodists upon the government here is that the people should choose their own pastors, an insidious way of doing away with the bishops. Luzzatti, the present Prime Minister, wrote formerly for the Evangelista, though he is a Jew. The Methodists are now calling upon him to put in practice what he teaches, and they have thus forced him to come out with an anticlerical declaration. In fact the Methodists are making their headquarters a centre of political intrigue.

Two other movements freighted with danger to the Faith in Italy are directly traceable to the Methodist body here. An excellent work had been set on foot to bring Catholic influences to bear upon the men in the army, to visit them and to encourage them to fulfil their religious duties, and to instruct them in the Faith. The Methodists set up the hue and cry that this was an anti-patriotic movement, and succeeded in inducing the Minister of War to put a stop to this, so that the soldiers are now forbidden even to visit the house of any Religious body.

Almost more insidious yet is the sapping of the Faith at the foundations among boys and girls who have been convicted of misdemeanors or petty crimes. The Methodists have formed a society to visit these children in the jails and to take them in charge on their release, hoping to make Methodists of them. They have succeeded in winning over the judge of the court where they are tried, Majetti by name, and he is now a member of their society which has ramifications all over Italy.

Ex-President Roosevelt, on leaving Italy, sent a telegram to Prime Minister Luzzatti, expressing in most effusive terms, that the most delightful moments that he had spent in Italy were those passed in his society. He has thus shown plainly what company he prefers.

An Anglican Clergyman in Spain

II

In Oviedo Mr. Townsend visited the Benedictine house to honor that remarkable man of the eighteenth century in Spain, Padre Feijóo, who passed fifty years in these cloisters combating ignorance and exposing pseudo-miracles—and this in the age of the Inquisition. Indeed, the reports of this Anglican clergyman on the Inquisitors whom he met in various parts of Spain, present a disconcerting picture to the prejudiced reader. At Gijón he was entertained by a captain of marine, Don Francisco Jovellanos, of the same family as the well-known statesman: "An old officer in every country is a pleasant companion, and in no country more so than Spain. In this gentleman I found all that a foreigner can wish for, good sense, politeness, and great information."

At Salamanca: "I ventured to present myself to Dr. Curtis, president of the Irish College, who received me with politeness, took me under his protection, and during my ten days in Salamanca considered me as part of his household. . . . Their method of giving lectures is perhaps peculiar to themselves, but worthy to be followed in our universities. The students have questions prepared for their discussion twice every day, and on these they are informed what books to read, then supposing the subject to admit of a dispute, it is carried on by two of them under the direction of a moderator who guides them to the truth. . . . Dr. Curtis lives with his pupils like a father with his children. . . . It is to be lamented that he and they should be reduced to the necessity of seeking that protection in a foreign country to which they are entitled in their own. This kind of persecution is neither politic nor just. Would you conciliate the affections of those who differ from you in their religious creed? No longer persecute. . . . The education of Catholics in Ireland for the purpose of their ministry should meet with all possible encouragement." Wildly liberal ideas, these, for his day!

It was in Salamanca that Mr. Townsend met an Augustinian monk named Diaz (and we must not forget that Spain's best poet, Louis de León, was also an Augustinian of this city) who "for learning, good sense, and liberality of sentiment would be an ornament to any country." He gives some enlightening data of the formerly prosperous cloth trade of Segovia, which in 1620 had employed thirty-five thousand weavers; and then goes into the causes of Spain's depopulation and hence her decay. He starts with the plague of 1347, which reduced the Peninsula to one-third of its population, and with the epidemic of 1649, when more than 200,000 perished. The seven hundred years' crusade war (714 to 1492) against the Moslem invader prevented settled trade and its result of an increased birth rate. After 1492 the too sudden and too copious emigrations to the New World drained the land of its agriculturalists. And following swift on this came two centuries of war, started by that most un-Spanish king, Charles V, who poured out, all over Europe, the best blood and treasure of his distant inheritance. The expulsion of 200,000 Jews, and later, in 1613, of half a million Moriscos, the constant insecurity of property along the southern coasts from African pirates, were added causes; but they were comparatively minor disasters from which Spain could have recovered.

Other countries, prosperous to-day, were then groaning under worse evils. The result of the tyrannic trampling out of the national parliament, the Cortes, by the Hapsburg rulers cannot be exaggerated. To meet the wars of their selfish kings, the people were burdened by a ruinous system of finance. A tax of 14 per cent. on all commodities can soon kill commerce. Philip II imposed a fixed market, which is bad for trade; there were no agrarian laws, no yeomanry, too much land was in pasturage, the private estates were too large; thus three nobles, the Dukes of Osuna, Alba, and Medina Coeli, owned all Andalucia.

Mr. Townsend gives a host of lesser reasons, such as the ill-effect on trade which royal monopolies have (the Spanish kings had the sole right to tobacco, brandy, lead, swords, pottery, glass, cloth, etc.); the influx of American gold from adventuring not from solid work, and the national prejudice against trade. "A Spaniard may possibly grow rich in trade, he may make progress in the sciences, but were he left to follow his natural inclinations he would certainly betake himself to a military life, and for that if generosity, if patience and fortitude, if a spirit of enterprise are requisite, in all these the true Spaniard will excel." As we read these thoughtful, economic causes of Spain's decay, the question naturally arises why partisan historians have passed them over so lightly, to dwell solely on the expulsion of the Jews and Moriscos and the Inquisition?

Going south to Seville our old traveler writes: "The morning of my arrival I examined my letters; among the persons of authority to whom I was recommended, I judge, as an ecclesiastic, my first attention to be due to the archbishop, and therefore I hastened to his palace. . . . After some conversation he desired to see the address of my other letters, and calling a page, he ordered that a coach should be got ready and that one of his chaplains should attend me, to deliver my letters, and to show me everything worthy of attention in the city. When I left him, he desired me to come back to dinner, telling me that during my stay that coach would be wholly at my service. Agreeable to this invitation, I returned, and not only dined with him that day, but almost every day during a fortnight's residence in Seville.

"Among all the hospitals I was most pleased with that of La Sangre. . . . The wards are spacious and the whole is remarkable for neatness."

At Cádiz, he wrote: "The most interesting establishment in Cádiz and the best conducted of its kind in Spain is the hospicio or general work-house (due to the loved governor of the province, Count Alexander O'Reilly). This building is large and handsome. In it are received the poor of every nation who are unable to maintain themselves, orphans, deserted children, the aged, the blind, the lame, aged priests reduced to poverty, even strangers passing through the city may be entertained two days. Neatness universally prevails, and all who are received are clean and well clothed, and have plenty of the best provisions. Care is taken to instruct them in the Christian doctrines and every six months the young people are publicly examined. Their education is to read, to write, to cast accounts, and such as manifest abilities are not only instructed in the principles of geometry, but if they are so inclined, are taught to draw. The boys are trained to weaving and to various crafts, the girls spin flax, cotton, wool, knit, make lace or are employed in plain work. There were 834 paupers the time of my visit, March 20, 1787. To encourage industry an account is kept of each individual wherein he is made debtor to the house at the rate of seven pence a day, and has credit given him for all the work he does, and should the balance be, as often happens, in his favor, it is paid him."

Self chastisement, the use of the discipline, which he still found a practice in many Spanish cities, was ever a stumbling block to this kindly man. Thus: "The Bishop (of Malaga) although distinguished for his benevolence and piety, and in the opinion of mankind free from every stain, yet is said to practise the discipline with more severity than the most zealous of the monks." I do not think any Catholic will grumble at carping such as this! Of the Bishop of Granada he writes that the wonder is that his income can suffice for his lavish charities: "Besides private pensions to families, he provides nurses in the country for 440 orphans, he sends poor patients to the hot baths at the distance of eight leagues beyond Granada, where he actually maintains four score, and he daily distributes bread to all the poor who assemble at his door." To this custom our political economist is sternly opposed and sees in it the cause of the swarms of beggars. However, he continues: "One article of his expenditure deserves the highest commendation. It is for free schools established in every part of his diocese."

On his return to Barcelona, along the southern fertile fringe of Spain, having had such pleasant encounters with the ecclesiastics all over the country, he determined to meet the bishop of that city. He "had been represented as a bigot whose sole employment was to count his beads. My friends assured me that as a Protestant I had no chance of being well received. . . . I not only found him easy of access and more than common conversable, but so far removed from bigotry that before I quitted him he pressed me to return and to stay some days with him. . . . He is placid and grave, yet pleasant and agreeable and peculiarly distinguished for benevolence; fond of retirement and much attached to books. . . . The Bishop of Gerona (on a visit to assist at a church dedication) although advanced in years, is full of wit and humor. . . . The meeting of two prelates is a phenomenon in Spain, because the moment a minister of the altar accepts a mitre, he devotes his life wholly to the duties of his office, confines himself altogether to his diocese, and is lost to his friends and to his family."

Mr. Townsend quitted Barcelona and took the same route out by which he had entered Spain two years before. One final quotation:

"Arriving at the summit of the Pyrenees, I cast one longing, lingering look behind, and quitted with regret a country, where, independent of multiplied civilities for which I felt myself indebted to my friends, I had been led so often to admire the boundless generosity of the inhabitants. To express all that I feel would appear like adulation; but I may venture at least to say, that simplicity, sincerity, generosity, a high sense of dignity, and strong principles of honor are the most prominent and striking features of the Spanish character. . . . Considering the similarity of character between the two nations, the Spanish and the English, I cannot but lament sincerely that a better understanding should not subsist between them."

O'R.

It is understood that the Imperial Ministry of Home Affairs is preparing the bill soon to be presented to the Reichstag formulating the proposed constitution for Alsace-Lorraine. The dispositions of the new measure will be in harmony with the promise recently made by the Chancellor to the parliament: that Alsace-Lorraine shall be allowed a large measure of home rule. State Secretary Delbrück of the Home Department is soon to visit the Reichsland in order to confer with influential persons there regarding the measure.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Press of Madrid and Barcelona

The past year's experience with Spanish news has undoubtedly caused American Catholic editors and readers no end of perplexities. What news was reliable? What information was false? The American and English press reports of the July disorders in Cataluña and of the execution of Ferrer have shown the intelligent Catholic readers that little credence can be placed in telegraphic information in regard to Spain. That false Spanish news appeared in the columns of the American and English press caused no surprise to those in Spain familiar with the methods of the Continental news agencies. The only surprise came from the fact that in face of repeated and convincing contradictory evidence these false statements continued to appear and assumed even more extraordinary proportions. That the Havas, Fournier, Nordica Continental, Stéfani, and the Wolff news agencies were dominated by Freemasonry was known; the July disorders and the Ferrer case only confirmed what had been pointed out by Catholic editors in the Congress of the Spanish Catholic Press, held in Zaragoza in the autumn of 1908. This fact was then used as an argument for establishing under Catholic direction a telegraphic news agency of national and foreign news in order to resist the evil influences of the anti-Catholic Continental agencies. These agencies, it was pointed out, are ever ready to color and change their news to meet the purposes of Latin Freemasonry in its war against the Church. It is the writer's opinion that the responsibility for most of the false statements in the American and English press in regard to affairs in Spain may be laid at the door of the Fabra News Agency. This agency is associated with Reuter and with the Havas agency of the Jew, Grosser.

The Fabra Agency in Spain is dominated by the anti-clerical trust papers of Madrid and by the Liberal and atheistical Republican dailies. Even in Spain itself the Fabra Agency seldom if ever furnishes news favorable to the Church. If Catholic news is furnished it is sent in such a way that it appears to be of little or no importance. A case in point is the present Catholic movement against the neutral schools. Monster mass meetings have been held in almost every city and town of Spain to protest against the action of the Liberal ministry in permitting the reopening of these irreligious schools. These monster meetings mark the most widespread and significant manifestation of Catholic sentiment that has been witnessed in Spain in many a year. In comparison to this great Catholic movement the dozen counter-demonstrations of the turbulent Republican and Socialist forces sink into insignificance. Yet strange to say telegraphic reports of Fabra would lead one to believe that the anti-Catholic meetings of a noisy minority represent the spirit and sentiment of Spain.

There is another source of information which supplies news and views to France and England and thence by cable or mail to the United States. I refer to the anti-clerical trust papers of Madrid. These papers are frequently quoted in the Paris and London press as unbiased witnesses of affairs in Spain. These anti-Catholic quotations quickly find their way to the United States. In view of this no unfrequent occurrence it may be useful to American and English Catholic readers to know what Spanish papers are reliable when there is question of obtaining the truth in regard to affairs in Spain. We will limit our review with one exception to the principle dailies of Madrid and Barcelona, both of which cities possess an abundant and varied supply of newspapers. In using the term Catholic we will include only those papers which admit ecclesiastical censorship, namely, correction of previously published articles, which through haste or error, may contain some statement against faith or morals.

The most important Catholic daily of Madrid is El Universo. Its circulation is large; its news and reviews are reliable. While it upholds the present dynasty, it strives to remain impartial in matters of Catholic politics. American Catholic editors and readers may take El Universo as a safe guide. El Correo Español is the principal paper of the Carlists. It is staunchly Catholic; its news is reliable. Its political articles defend the claims of Don Jaime. El Siglo Futuro is the Catholic daily of the Integrists, formerly members of the Catholic party, but now willing to aid any dynasty which will keep Spain free from Liberalism. It is a fervently Catholic paper, sincere in the presentation of its news. Its political articles suppose a knowledge of Spanish affairs, and consequently may confuse American readers not familiar with the history of complicated Catholic politics in Spain.

Passing to the secular journals, we meet A. B. C., an independent daily, whose news and views find a large class of readers. A few years ago this paper was in bad repute among Catholics; at present, however, it has undergone a change and shows more conservative tendencies. La Epoca and La Correspondencia are the principle dailies of the Conservative party. As this party is formed from Catholics and Moderate Liberals, the political editorials of both these important dailies may at times sound a note which may not ring true to a well-trained Catholic editor. Barring an occasional touch of moderate Liberalism their news items and general view of affairs in Spain may be accepted as reliable. The same cannot be said of the extensively circulated trust papers, namely, El Liberal, El Imparcial and Heraldo de Madrid. These papers, as we have already stated, are frequently quoted by the French and English press. They are brazenly unscrupulous when there is an opportunity to misrepresent Catholic affairs in Spain. Their ideals are French, and their editorials and news items show the strong influence of French Freemasonry. El Imparcial may be classed as Liberal and anti-clerical, while El Liberal and Heraldo de Madrid add Republican tendencies to the anti-clericalism. The Republican dailies El País, El Motin and El Radical, the organ of Lerroux, are violently irreligious and teem with foul calumnies and slanders against the Church and the clergy. Their circulation is found chiefly among the slums and taverns of Madrid.

In Barcelona two papers, El Correo Catalan and Diario de Barcelona, may be classed under our definition of Catholic. The former is the daily of the Carlists. Its news is accurate; in politics it supports the claims of Don Jaime against the reigning royal family. Diario de Barcelona, more familiarly known as "El Brusi," has an extensive circulation and is the oldest of the Barcelona newspapers. It dates back to the year 1792. Some few years ago it was not in good repute among Barcelona Catholics, because of touches of Liberalism; but now it is of the type of El Universo of Madrid, with tendencies, however, towards the Conservative party.

The leading secular daily of Barcelona is La Vanguardia.

dia. It has a numerous class of readers; its news and views are usually reliable. It is classed as politically independent. El Liberal, the daily of the Liberals, may be dismissed as anti-clerical and unreliable in its views. El Noticiero Universal and Las Noticias, while supposed to be politically independent, show Liberal tendencies. La Tribuna also poses as independent, but should be classed with El Liberal. The Republican dailies El Diluvio, La Publicidad and El Progreso cater to the varied groups of Atheistical Radicals, who were responsible for the violence of the "Red Week" in Barcelona. Like the Republican journals of Madrid their columns reek with vulgar calumnies against the Church. El Progreso is probably the most violent of the three. It is the official organ in Barcelona of the revolutionist Lerroux (see AMERICA, Oct., 1909, p. 5).

For those readers of AMERICA familiar with the Spanish language and desirous of keeping in touch with affairs in Spain I would recommend a modest Catholic weekly published in Madrid, La Lectura Dominical. It gives an interesting weekly summary of the political situation in Spain. Its editorial offices are in Calle de San Bernardo, num. 7, Madrid. Its foreign subscription is ten pesetas ($2.00) a year.

King Edward's Recent Visit to Lourdes

The death of King Edward VII, coming close after his recent visit to Biarritz and Pau for the recovery of his health, gives interest to certain details of his stay, published in La Semaine Religieuse of Toulouse before the news of his serious illness was announced:

On Saturday, April 9, 1910, the King of England, who had been at Biarritz for some weeks, visited the Convent of Our Lady at Anglet. He remained there from 3.30 P. M. till 5 P. M. inspecting the various objects of interest. He showed special admiration for the beautiful embroideries executed by the Sisters, among them certain pieces wrought after a design by his own mother, Queen Victoria, who had also visited the convent. The King gave the Sisters information as to how they could make the skins of the white rabbits, which are numerous in the Convent grounds, a source of revenue to the institution. Later he visited the orphanage, which is under the care of the Sisters, and was visibly affected on beholding there a picture presented by his mother.

From the orphanage he went on foot to the Convent of the Bernardines, about 600 yards distant, inquiring on the way thither how these contemplatives differed from the Trappistines, with whose rule he was acquainted. On arriving at the Chapel of St. Bernard, the chaplain showed him the spot where the late Queen Victoria had knelt in prayer, and his eyes rested with emotion on the tablet in the wall commemorative of the Queen's visit. When he had read the inscription he remained silent for a while, as if in prayer, and manifested a desire that his visit be commemorated by a similar tablet.

As a procession of the Bernardine nuns passed before him, Father Etchebarne, the chaplain, explained their rule of perpetual silence, and then the silent figures heard the voice of their head chaplain break the stillness: "My dear children, he who visits you to-day is the King of England; do not forget to pray for him and for his family." At once the Sisters fell on their knees, and kissed the earth, the action prescribed by their rule when they take leave of a superior who has spoken to them. This act of profound humility visibly affected the King.

He next visited the cemetery of the monastery, where long lines of black crosses are the only sign of the bodies buried beneath. On his way from Pau to Cauterets, on April 21, the King passed by Lourdes. On his return to Pau he visited the Grotto of Our Lady, the renowned Basilica, the Church of the Rosary, and was present with uncovered head when a procession of pilgrims passed by. In an interview with Bishop Schoepfer of Tarbes, King Edward showed a lively interest in the shrine, and on his return to Pau expressed the great satisfaction he had derived from his experience at Lourdes.

Honoring the Memory of Pope St. Marcellus

ROME, April 28.

Rome has been commemorating with becoming pomp and magnificence, as well as with great devotion and loyalty, during the past week, the sixteen hundredth anniversary of her great Pope and martyr, Saint Marcellus, the last in the long line of pontiffs to die for the Faith.

The celebration opened appropriately on April 17 with a lecture by the well-known Roman archeologist, Signor Romolo Ducci, in the Circus Maximus, where on the same day of the month in the year 304 A. D., a great demonstration was made against the Christians. On April 19, a lecture was given on "Pagan Persecutions and Christian Victories," by Cavaliere Cremonese. Two days later a new altar of the Crucifixion was consecrated in the Church of San Marcello al Corso by His Grace Archbishop Pellegrino Stagni of Aquila. This church of St. Marcellus in Rome is built on the spot where he himself consecrated a chapel in the house of the noble lady Lucina, who had offered him this place of refuge when persecuted by the Emperor Maxentius, into which later, by order of the Emperor, the animals of the public stables were driven, and where the saint soon died among the beasts of burden.

The solemn triduum was begun on April 22 by the celebration of a pontifical high Mass by his Eminence Cardinal Respighi, Vicar of His Holiness. Pontifical Vespers were celebrated by Archbishop Seton of Heliopolis; the panegyric pronounced by Mgr. Niccolo Marini, Secretary of the "Suprema Segnatura Apostolica," and Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament given by a Cardinal. Solemn services of the same order were held on the two following days, Cardinal Martinelli pontificating at high Mass on the first.

On April 26, the feast of St. Marcellinus, the predecessor in the papacy of St. Marcellus, there was a commemoration of him in the catacombs of St. Priscilla on the Via Salaria outside the walls of Rome, where he was buried, and where the body of St. Marcellus rested till removed to the church built in his honor, where it was placed in a basalt urn under the high altar. There was an address by Commendatore Marucchi, the first living authority on the history of the Catacombs.

On the first of May is planned a commemoration of May 1, 305, the day of the decisive defeat of paganism in Rome and the West, and the victory of our glorious Saint and Martyr, Pope Marcellus. Signor Romolo Ducci will conduct a party through the Circus Maximus, then to the Porta Capena, the Via Appia, and to the church where tradition places the scene of "Quo Vadis," and the Church of St. Sebastian, recounting on the spot some of the incidents in the last great persecution of the Christians in Rome.

Some New French Books

MAY 6, 1910.

A novel by René Bazin is always welcome; he has the merit of combining a thoroughly healthy tone with much literary skill, descriptive charm and subtle power of analysis. All his books have a leading idea, religious or social, around which he weaves a fictitious element, graceful and interesting, conveying a useful lesson, while awakening the reader's interest, absorbing his attention and pleasing his taste. In his last book, "La Barrière," he treats of the religious topics that, at the present moment, are perhaps more to the front in France than elsewhere. While the Government is busy un-Christianizing the country, the rising generation is grappling with a thousand religious, moral and social problems, at the expense of its respect for authority.

It would seem as if the spiritual anxieties of the younger Frenchmen had increased in proportion as their hold on old-fashioned ideals of respect and submission had loosened, hence the conflicting opinions, the wild theories that must exist wherever the infallible Catholic Church no longer controls mental activities.

As a contrast to the young Parisian who has lost his childhood faith, M. Bazin introduced an Anglo-Saxon, Reginald Breynolds, who, at the cost of much mental suffering and heavy material losses, becomes a Catholic; in both men, religious anxieties are busy, with very different results. M. Bazin successfully unravels the intricate workings of his hero's mind, but, as is natural, he is perhaps more lifelike when he describes the emotional man of his own race. He makes the Englishman somewhat more communicative than is the wont of his compatriots, in whom anxiety and pain generally produce extra reticence.

M. Bazin is at his best in describing the religious and charitable works that are quietly and steadily holding their own in Paris against the powers of evil. This side of Paris life is comparatively unknown to the passing stranger, but to those who are acquainted with its mysteries it is full of marvellous interest. How many Catholic tourists are aware that every night a number of men of all classes, millionaires and beggars, nobles and plebeians, keep a holy vigil in the votive Basilica of Montmartre and pray before the Blessed Sacrament? M. Bazin's foreign reader will share the enthusiasm of his English hero on discovering the better side of Paris life.

Another recent novel "Le Trust," by Paul Adam, a writer of rare power, has excited some attention. He deals with the struggle for life that is daily becoming more intense in the whole world. According to M. Hanotaux, an able critic, it represents "one of the widest and most estimable efforts made in modern French literature." It cost its author five years of hard work; it describes man's struggle with the forces of nature and his final victory, and presents splendid descriptions of the almost superhuman efforts of the pioneers of civilization. Paul Adam has undoubted talent. He is full of ideas; but his form, strong and somewhat crude, makes harder reading than René Bazin's polished language.

It is always interesting to note the evolution of a writer of talent towards a higher and healthier ideal. Paul Margueritte is among the most successful modern French writers and his last novel "La Faiblesse Humaine," is written with his accustomed charm. In some of his former works, M. Margueritte was a passionate advocate of divorce. The tone of this book is different, its heroine rejects the possibility of breaking her marriage tie, however unworthy her husband has proved himself. She is a noble and charming woman, although alas utterly devoid of any religious convictions. She acts for the sake of her children and from an innate feeling that divorce is dangerous and immoral.

"Vie Privée de Talleyrand," by Bernard de Lacombe, is compiled from the valuable papers that were bequeathed by Mgr. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orléans, to the author's father, himself a well-known Catholic writer. It deals with Talleyrand's life in England and America, during his exile, with his marriage and his death-bed conversion, a conversion which was brought about by means of the old statesman's niece and grand-niece, the Duchess de Dino and her daughter Pauline. By Talleyrand's own desire Mgr. Dupanloup, then a priest in Paris, was chosen to receive the dying man's solemn retraction. The reader's impression, after perusing M. de Lacombe's account of the scene is that Talleyrand was thoroughly sincere in this last act of his long life. The man, who, in turn, had served the Revolution, the Empire, the Government of Louis XVIII and that of Louis Philippe, whose political principles changed like the winds, probably never lost the Faith, although during nearly half a century he violated the laws of the Church with apparent unconcern. His death-bed conversion was carefully thought out and prepared and there seems no reason to doubt its sincerity.

Although Talleyrand's attitude as a priest and as a politician cannot be excused, it may be said, in his defence, that his call to the priesthood was the result of his parent's arrangements, rather than of any personal vocation; he was the younger son of a noble family and lame into the bargain. Hence, according to the custom of his time and caste, he was from boyhood destined to an ecclesiastical career without his inclinations having been consulted. Few men have been so much discussed and disliked during their lifetime, and it is all the more curious to observe the charm that he exercised upon all about him. The journal of his niece, the Duchess de Dino, née Princess de Courland, has lately been published in four large volumes by her granddaughter, the Princess Radziwill. It is interesting, as the Duchess was closely connected with French politics during her uncle's lifetime. She enjoyed his affection and confidence, to which she responded with the warmest admiration. His influence moulded her mind, while his subtle wit, keen perception of men and things, and unabated interest in public affairs made any other companionship devoid of charm.

The Marquis de Ségur's new book "Au Couchant de la Monarchie," touches on wider topics. It is a masterly sketch of the reign of Louis XVI, during the years that immediately preceded the Revolution. The King's well-meaning efforts to bring about the necessary reforms are worthy of esteem, but his weakness of purpose, his hesitations and lack of energy make the reader feel that he was not a leader of men. M. de Ségur's complete mastery of his subject and his vigorous and picturesque style make his books deeply interesting.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

Denial by the Apostolic Delegate

APOSTOLIC DELEGATION, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 11th, 1910.

To the Editor of AMERICA:—

In a cablegram dated Rome, April 12th, in regard to the visit paid to Mr. Roosevelt when in Rome by Abbot Janssens, it was added:

"It [the Vatican] did not wish Mr. Roosevelt to bracket the Pope with other more or less royal personages he will boast of having hunted in Europe after his African hunt."

I am authorized to state that this portion of the cablegram did not come from the Vatican and consequently is repudiated as a mere invention.

Fools' Caps and Felons' Stripes

In what old fogies call the good old times the fool's cap was a regular instrument of teaching. In any village school might have been seen an urchin standing on a stool and wearing the conical headpiece which marked him out as the dunce. Obviously dunces are of various kinds. There is the dunce who is not a dunce, but who somehow has been put higher than his partially developed faculties warrant. At multiplication and words of two syllables he would shine: in fractions and syntax he is an egregious failure. Then there is the dunce who is trying not to be a dunce. It is hard work. Too often his efforts seem fruitless; but with encouragement he will succeed more or less. There is, too, the dunce by nature, a hopeless case, and there is the dunce by choice who could learn but won't.

Once, seized by the spirit of reform, the men of a certain village abolished the fool's cap. The old dame had misgivings such as all old fogies have. Still she had to confess that the change appeared to work well. The children showed gratitude and their conduct for a day or two was all that could be desired. Soon, however, there was a difference in this. The dunce who was not a dunce and the dunce trying not to be a dunce, delivered from unmerited disgrace, worked with light hearts and produced unhopd-for results. The dunce by nature, no longer in fear of the ignominious emblem, waited patiently until accruing strength of body should free him for the plough, the sickle and the flail. But the dunce by choice grew daily more confirmed in his evil state, loving it with all his heart, for he had hated only its outward sign, and refusing to acknowledge his degradation. Wherefore the wise fathers of the village restored the cap for him alone as due to a dunce by choice, and as the best means of convincing him of his shame.

A short time ago stripes were abolished in the penitentiaries of one of the States. According to report the prisoners' conduct improved wonderfully on the day this was announced. The reason of stripes is two-fold. They are a practical means of preventing escape; but they are also part of the prisoners' punishment, of which the ends are, to satisfy justice, to amend the guilty and to deter others from crime. They are a mark of degradation and therefore should be used as a penalty only in the case of one wilfully degraded. As in the village school dunces were various, so in our jails are the prisoners. There is the criminal who is not a criminal, whom circumstances betrayed, so to speak, into his single offence. There is the criminal who is trying not to be a criminal by working earnestly for his reformation. There is the criminal who has had from childhood his sense of right and wrong dulled through vicious surroundings. But we have too the criminal of free choice refusing to recognize his inward degradation yet resisting more than many of the others the imposition of its outward marks. Among the worst of such is the banker who for years has robbed the poor, the politician who has corrupted his fellow citizens; and these brazen out their guilt. They move heaven and earth to frustrate the course of justice, appeal through many channels for executive clemency; and when all their efforts to keep out of prison have proved vain they go thither in a Pullman or an automobile. Once in jail they claim all sorts of exemptions. Of one of these we read the other day that he had taken charge of the prison paper and writes pious leaders while his companions are in the stone-yard or the jute-mill. There is no sign in them of an appreciation of their criminal degradation; only of a firm resolve to avoid its consequences. Perhaps the wise legislators who abolished stripes may, like the wise village fathers in our parable, restore them for such as these.

The Married and the Unmarried State

Dr. Gordon, who lectures to young ladies in Wellesley College, is quoted as teaching his classes that Christianity, and it is clear from the context that he means the Catholic Church, has by its doctrines sown "an inveterate prejudice against the honor of wedded love and natural human parenthood." Sufficient proof of this is the teaching of the Church that the unmarried state is higher than the married.

Now we submit that a learned doctor who uses such loose language as this is something of a quack. Perhaps Dr. Gordon is misquoted. Perhaps it is only a straw professor that we level our lance at. But the distorted and inaccurate notion attributed to Dr. Gordon has seen much service with divines of Dr. Gordon's type; and so for their sake, if not for his own, we are going to give him a little enlightenment which any Catholic child who knows its catechism might have given him.

The Doctor should have suspected the existence of a flaw in his conclusions from the fact that practically in the Catholic Church alone is marriage considered something sacramental and holy. Does the Doctor believe in divorce? The Catholic Church does not. We doubt very much whether the Doctor's idea of marriage has the same halo of sanctity about it with which the Church has always invested it. This fact is so widely known that we wonder it did not influence the Doctor's conclusions. Has Baconian induction been abandoned at Wellesley? Or, is it only when the Catholic Church is concerned that facts are ignored and conclusions drawn from preconceived notions?

What the Doctor says about the Church's teaching, that the unmarried state is higher than the married, is very true. To be more accurate, the Church teaches that it is a more perfect state. But the Church uses the phrase "a more perfect state" technically, with a meaning altogether different from that which Doctor Gordon gives it. Doctor Gordon is a college professor and when he lectures on any subject he ought to be accurate in his knowledge of that subject. It is only what we look for from a studious professor; it is what his faculty looks for and, we presume, what the parents of his students look for.

Again the known facts should have led the Doctor to suspect the accuracy of the significance which he attached to the Church's teaching that the unmarried state is more perfect than the married. He must have known that the Church has canonized many of her saints who had been married and had lived in the married state. On the other hand, there have been innumerable men and women who have voluntarily chosen the unmarried state to live and die in and whom the Church has not canonized and never will. Here was another opportunity for Baconian philosophy. This collection of facts suggests a general law diametrically opposed to the construction placed by the Doctor on the Church's teaching regarding marriage.

When the Church teaches that the unmarried state is more perfect than the married, she means principally that the unmarried state is less hampered by the cares and troubles of life, and consequently in itself more favorable to the prayerfulness and peace of soul and pious energies which unite the soul closer to God and realize high spiritual ideals. The Doctor will not deny that the state of marriage multiplies distractions and preoccupations. He would very likely advise his son, if he has one, to postpone marriage until he had won a secure position and competency in life, for the reason that winning one's way in art or business is made more difficult by the additional burdens of the married state. If this is common sense in the Doctor, why is it folly in the Church?

Moreover, the Church does not teach that every one who chooses to live unmarried, even for spiritual reasons, is necessarily better than those who enter the married state. The latter may reach high sanctity despite the difficulties of their life; while the former may sink into mediocrity or worse, despite the facilities and advantages which the unmarried condition possesses. Indeed, the Church in her practice and through her officials is wont to discourage many who think they are called to forego marriage, on the score that a life of celibacy would work in them spiritual ruin.

All this was said in the beginning by St. Paul. The Doctor will find it in the Bible. There was a time, not so very long ago, when it was popular to accuse the Catholic Church of corrupting, hiding, suppressing and generally maltreating the Bible to keep it from disclosing to the multitudes how far the Catholic Church had departed from pure Christianity. Every day brings us evidence at present that the Bible is growing to be a discredited document everywhere else except in the Catholic Church. One more thundering breaker has broken itself on the Rock and has gone gliding, tamed and gentle, back along the sands to the sea of human error, only to gather and break again in criticisms of the Church's unprogressive attitude in defending Holy Scripture. And so the see-saw of changing front goes on in history among the enemies of the Church. They say it is progress. We think it is poetic justice.

Fable by Cable

Cabled fabrications of words and acts attributed to the Vatican have been of late in excess of the usual output. The motive is sufficiently obvious. Interested parties, unhampered by scruples, have been busy with fertile invention in veiling the inglorious features of the Roosevelt-Methodist misadventures, and enterprising correspondents readily receptive of sensations were eager to forward the items and in no way loath to improve the occasion. Of one such concoction, containing a note of rude sarcasm foreign to the Vatican, we publish to-day an official repudiation. The report of the Protestant Episcopal bishop of Maryland having been refused an audience by the Pope on the ground that "His Holiness is not a statue or a picture," may be safely ascribed to a similar inspiration. In the course of a just analysis of the imputation the Independent very properly remarks:

"We do not believe that any such brusque reply to the Bishop's request for an audience was authorized. It sounds quite too much like that other rude remark falsely reported as coming from the Vatican about Mr. Roosevelt. We may at least be assured that its language will be dignified, whether in approval or condemnation."

There are other indications that such calumnies do not now find general credence as readily as formerly and that fable by cable on Catholic subjects will have soon ceased to be a profitable enterprise.

Nicaragua's Muddles

The dove of peace is still fluttering aimlessly about in that grievously-tried republic with little prospect that it may fold its wings and rest. Ugly stories of forced loans and arbitrary imprisonment, not to speak of certain excesses of the uncontrolled soldiery, convey the impression that the quiet arising from gag-law and violence is the only quiet that Nicaragua is enjoying.

Hon. John Barrett of the International Bureau of American Republics has received a petition praying for the intervention of the United States to put a stop to useless bloodshed and to secure peace and property rights in Nicaragua. This petition will be a bitter dose to the Madriz administration for it is an appeal from it to an outsider in matters purely domestic.

Should the Federal Government act? Should it, as in Cuba, unfurl the Stars and Stripes and shake the mailed fist? Should it, if necessary, conquer a peace? Almost in spite of ourselves we have become a world power. Whatever the steps that led us to that proud eminence, they cannot now be retraced without a sacrifice, a bootless sacrifice, of the national self-respect. Yet the country is not to play the part of Don Quixote de la Mancha and hunt for wrongs for the sake of righting them. If not "against the peace and dignity of the United States," is the Nicaragua trouble at least of such a nature as to affect adversely the interests of Americans and to call for intervention? In Cuba, American citizens and investments and our benefits from Cuban trade are good reasons why the Federal Government should solicitously desire Cuban tranquillity and insist on maintaining it. In Nicaragua, Americans are not unknown and their interests are not insignificant, and the development of that country's mining, lumbering and agricultural possibilities offers an inviting prospect if only domestic peace and justice could be established.

Would the prospective importance of Nicaragua's imports and exports warrant a step towards hastening an improvement in our trade relations with it? The world is full of tireless toilers for trade; its markets are not too numerous; busy men are seeking to open up others;

America's manufactures have no monopoly to the exclusion of those other great countries. Domestic peace and that plenty consequent upon it would improve the Nicaragua market. Without posing as a settler of domestic brawls, for such meddlesomeness is seldom highly valued by the recipients of the favor, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor might offer some suggestions in the premises which would redound to the benefit of our fellow citizens and incidentally check the reign of despotism, bloodshed and outrage in a sorely afflicted country.

Much was expected of the widely-heralded investigating trip of Mr. Barrett, which finally fell through; but we doubt whether he could have seen and questioned those best qualified to speak of some aspects of the question. Where it is dangerous to exchange ordinary civilities when a Nicaraguan meets the United States consul on the streets of Managua, it is plain that the mild-mannered Mr. Barrett would find difficulty in learning from the natives anything more important than the state of the weather. Tyranny, riot and misrule are not government, as false witness is not evidence. The difficulty consists in sifting the testimony so that the truth may be seen, recognized as such and maintained. President Madriz has rejected the peace proposals of the Central American Court. The extremely delicate nature of the matter should prompt us to pray God to guide the administration in the sacred way of right.

The May issue of The Catholic Mind has been devoted to a compendium of the official records of the "Roosevelt incident" in Rome, and the best impartial, public comment on the facts why Col. Roosevelt had no audience with the Pope. The publication, which is now ready for distribution, thus preserves in handy form important data for easy future reference.

Apropos of the anti-Catholic agitation in England over the coronation oath, the remark of "An Anglican Clergyman in Spain," visiting the rector and students of the Irish College at Salamanca, is of interest: "It is to be lamented that he and they should be reduced to the necessity of seeking that protection in a foreign country to which they are entitled in their own. This kind of persecution is neither politic nor just." If this was true in the eighteenth century how much more so in the more enlightened twentieth.

The Abbé P. Veilleux, of the Cathedral of St. Germain, Rimouski, Que., after expressing his "ardent wishes for the diffusion of AMERICA," adds: "By its clear and concise articles this review renders very great service to readers whose leisure moments are few. And from this as well as from the point of view of the news it gives us from everywhere, it seems to me that AMERICA ought to be the review preferred by the parochial clergy, who have so little time to give to reading."

COLLEGES FOR CATHOLIC GIRLS.

Archbishop Farley has made the encouragement of progressive, practical Christian education in all its departments one of the dominant characteristics of his administration of the great Catholic community of New York. The latest notable incident in this direction is his determination that the Sisters of Charity, of which community he is the spiritual head, shall advance, this fall, the Academy of Mount St. Vincent-on-Hudson, to the rank of a college for girls, under the charter which it holds from the Regents of the University of the State of New York. The Sisters of St. Joseph, under the inspiration and encouragement of Bishop McDonnell, of Brooklyn, are also preparing to make a college of their beautifully-located school at Brentwood, Long Island. These two, with St. Angela's of the Ursulines at New Rochelle, and St. Elizabeth's among the garden demesnes of the New Jersey Oranges, will give to the metropolitan district, which the recent census will probably show now to contain more than three millions of Catholics, four Catholic colleges devoted to the higher education of its young women and chartered to award them the academic degrees.

It is among the things Catholic New York can feel proud of, that care for the proper education of its young women, the future mothers of its congregations, was always one of the first provisions of its spiritual chiefs. When the foundations of the early organization of the diocese were laid, in the opening of the last century, by the administrator, Father Anthony Kohlmann, S. J., he wrote: "I was always of the opinion that to cause religion to flourish in this country, three things are essentially necessary: first, a Catholic college for the education of the male youth; secondly, a nunnery for the education of young ladies; and thirdly, an orphan house conducted by nuns." He undertook to provide all three, the first by establishing the New York Literary Institution, where St. Patrick's Cathedral now stands on Fifth Avenue; the second by obtaining from Cork, Ireland, the services of three Ursuline nuns, Sisters de Chantal Walsh, M. Anne Fagan and M. Paul Fagan, who arrived in this city on April 9, 1812. He located them in "a very beautiful house * * * situate in a park of six acres of land and only six miles from the city * * * being within two miles of the Jesuits' College," as we learn from "The Memoirs of Miss Nano Nagle." This was in the present west side section then known as Bloomingdale.

But the school was not a success because these nuns could secure no accessions to their number, the financial burden of the undertaking and the more depressing fact that "the comforts of religion were afforded them only at uncertain and irregular intervals * * * And though within six miles of New York they were dependent on the casual visit of a passing clergyman for the most necessary ministrations of religion" (op. cit.). This was in the neighborhood of the present Fifty-ninth Street less than a hundred years ago! So after a three years' trial these Ursulines shut up their school, which then had twenty-nine pupils, several of them converts, and went back to Cork, on April 27, 1815. They have also left the curious record that: "The docility of their Irish pupils, their submission to authority and their reverence for those who were placed over them contrasted favorably and strongly with the assumption, pride and petulance which the name, and perhaps the reality of political independence was developing in the youthful character of America, and which in almost every instance interfered with the efficacy of their teaching" (op. cit.).

Why these good nuns framed this indictment against their New York pupils is not spread in detail on the records, but certainly their associates who followed after them at East Morrisania, in 1855, and later at Bedford Park and New Rochelle have had no such complaints to make.

When Mother Seton returned to New York after the death of her husband in Italy, she tried to earn her living teaching "in a pleasant dwelling two miles from the city." In a letter dated November 29, 1807, she gives the location: "Stuyvesant's Lane, Bowery, near St. Mark's church, two little houses joined, left hand; children the sign of the dwelling; no number"—but the project failed, owing mainly to the opposition of her relatives and former friends now alienated by her conversion.

Those two other famous converts, Mr. and Mrs. Virgil Horace Barber, when they came first to New York, opened a school in 1817 at No. 24 Vesey Street, under the patronage of Father Benedict J. Fenwick, S.J., who was in charge of St. Peter's. It lasted less than a year and then, obeying the call to a higher degree of perfection, father, mother and their five children went to Washington where all seven entered a religious life, the father and son becoming Jesuits, the mother and daughters members of the Visitation and Ursuline communities.

Another early effort to provide suitable Catholic education was that of the scholarly Father Felix Varela, pastor of Christ Church, in Ann Street, where, in August, 1828, he opened a school in the rear of No. 31, which, however, in the following year was moved to No. 25 John Street, two doors from Nassau. Girls were here instructed for $2.50 per quarter in English grammar, orthography, arithmetic and geography with the use of maps and globes. Music, with the use of piano, was $10 extra.

Next we have St. Joseph's Academy, started at No. 35 East Broadway by the Sisters of Charity in 1830. New York was then commencing the era of commercial prosperity that has since made the city the metropolis of the nation. The recent opening of the Erie canal had turned the trade of the great West and the interior to her docks, and quick recovery was being made from the long blight the war of 1812 and the Embargo Act had put on her trade and commerce. In the growing prosperity the Catholics then in the city shared, and this Academy was one of the results. "The principal object of the Sisters in offering their services to the public of the city," they declared, "is thoroughly to instruct those committed to their charge in religious principles, at the same time every attention will be paid to their morals and literary improvement.

"The course of instruction will embrace English orthography, grammar, composition, writing, practical and rational arithmetic, geography, history, drawing, painting on velvet, embroidery, plain and fancy needlework, French and music if wished. . . . "Pupils of all denominations will be admitted. All books will be supplied at the school at stationery cost."

Tuition in the highest class was $8 a quarter, and the extras were French, $5, music, $10, chenille embroidery, $5, drawing and painting, $5, stationery, 50 cents, fuel for the season, $2.

These were the polite accomplishments of the well-bred young woman of the day. East Broadway was one of the most attractive residential streets of the city, and the adjoining section, that now swarms with the polyglot mixture of Hebrews, Italians, Greeks and Chinese, was occupied by the comfortable homes of well-to-do native families, many of whom were Quakers.

On December 8, 1846, the New York Sisters of Charity organized themselves into a separate community with Sister Elizabeth Boyle as their first superior, the house at 35 East Broadway becoming its headquarters and novitiate. In the following year the historic farm house at McGown's Pass was purchased, and formally dedicated as the new convent and school of Mount St. Vincent, on May 2, 1847. It is described in the announcements made then as "situated in 107th Street between Fifth and Sixth Avenues, six miles from the city, and can be reached hourly by the railroad cars running to Harlem and Westchester, and by the stages of Harlem and Yorkville. The situation is extremely healthy, the scenery beautiful, the panoramic view extensive."

The school-year lasted from the first Monday in September to the middle of July. Board and tuition cost $150 a year, with music $44, French $20, and drawing and painting $20 extra. "The course of studies," says the prospectus, "embraces the various branches of an elevated and solid education, together with an uninterrupted attention to form the manners and principles of the young ladies to habits of politeness, industry, neatness and order, while especial care will be taken to cultivate and nourish in their minds those principles of religion and virtue which alone can make education profitable."

About the same time the Ladies of the Sacred Heart had moved their school and convent from Ravenswood, Long Island, to its present location at Manhattanville, then described by them in their appeal for patronage as "about eight miles from the City of New York, in the vicinity of Harlem and Manhattanville. The site is elevated, healthy and beautiful. The buildings are erected in a handsome style. The grounds for recreation and promenade are neat and spacious, surrounded by shrubbery and pleasantly shaded by forest and grove trees. The Manhattanville and Bloomingdale stages will pass by the Sacred Heart, whenever there are passengers to or from the institution."

The famous Madame Hardey was the head of the community. Board and tuition cost $250 a year, "postage, books, stationery and washing is charged to the parents." Music, drawing, painting, Spanish, German and Italian were also extra charges.

When the property of the Sisters of Charity at 107th Street was taken by the city to form part of Central Park, the Sisters of Charity purchased, for $100,000, on December 20, 1856, Fort Hill Castle, an estate of fifty-five acres, the home of the great tragedian, Edwin Forrest, on the adornment of which he had spent a fortune. The new Mount St. Vincent was opened there in 1858 with this statement:

"The institute is delightfully situated at Fort Hill, Westchester County, on the east bank of the Hudson, about thirteen miles from New York and a mile and a half south of Yonkers. The beauty and sublimity of the scenery cannot be surpassed.

"Parents may rest satisfied that every attention consistent with the spirit of a firm but mild government will be paid to the comfort of the young ladies placed at this institution. Whilst the utmost care will be taken to nourish in their minds those principles of virtue and religion which alone can render education profitable." The rate of tuition was increased to $180 a year.

These may be taken as fair examples of what has been done for the training of three generations of valiant women all over the country in similar institutions. It will be noticed that sociology, psychology pedagogy and various other supposed essentials of the present day "uplifting" educationalists had no place in any of their programs. Insistence was always prominent on the fact that, after a prudent array of literary factors assurance was added that the utmost care would be taken to nourish in the minds of the pupils "those principles of virtue and religion which alone can render education profitable."

But other times, other manners—in educational circles as well as everywhere else. So we have come to the woman's college, and to meet the demand of those who imagine that their girls must have academic degrees where academy medals and diplomas not so long ago sufficed, Catholic faculties and institutions are ready to grant them. What is best in the new ideals has been taken to augment the standards that centuries have shown to be essentials in a comprehensive educational programme, and all cemented firmly together by those "principles" the old-time schools declared so firmly and prominently "alone can render education profitable." The honorable monuments to the old-fashioned "Sisters' Schools" have been conspicuous in every centre in the land for a century. We need have no fear of the results that will come from their new women's colleges. The old order may change but the principles will not.

LITERATURE

A Modern Chronicle. By WINSTON CHURCHILL. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Having sung in diverse strains arms and the man, Mr. Churchill in his latest volume takes for his theme a woman. The author certainly sticks to his text. He begins with Honora Leffingwell, and for five hundred and twenty-four pages, each of about three hundred and twenty-five words, he never loses sight of her. This, if you come to think of it, is something extraordinary. If there be any notable long novel in the English language which holds to the heroine chapter after chapter and page after page, the present writer has not seen it or cannot recall it. Thackeray, Dickens and Scott have given us studies of women, which the world will not willingly let die; but none of these great authors has found fit to start with her, continue with her and end with her.

In "A Modern Chronicle" there are no episodes. From an infant in arms to a woman of thirty, three times married, Honora Leffingwell-Spence-Chiltern-Irwin holds the centre of the stage. She is the star beside which all the lesser lights of the story most effectually pale their ineffectual fires. Mr. Winston Churchill is to be taken seriously. None of his books are pot-boilers. Critics who sneered at him some years ago are now in his presence crooking the pregnant knee. In the light, then, of Mr. Churchill's popularity and of the splendid work he has already done, it is but fair that we should give this "Modern Chronicle" a careful consideration.

Honora Leffingwell is the heroine. We know it, because the author tells us so. In the first chapter we find her dancing in the nurse's arms. She has been brought, an orphan of eighteen months, from across the seas. Her uncle and aunt of St. Louis, a childless couple of moderate means, adopt her. Honora grows up winning the love of everyone. The author proves her good looks by having every man she meets smitten with her charms. She gets, for instance, three proposals in one day. Even after she is married, men propose outright, or hint darkly that they would like to do so.

Honora, taught from early childhood to appreciate fine clothes, goes at the age of eighteen to a fashionable school in the East. She does not return. Making a stay, while still a schoolgirl, at the summer house of Mrs. Holt, she selects and marries wealth in the person of a Mr. Spence, as against nobility represented by a French count, and character by Peter Irwin of St. Louis. Honora discovers presently that Spence is not so wealthy as she surmised. As Spence goes on by devious ways to the acquiring of money, Honora becomes disgusted with commercialism: the fine house and splendid rooms are filled with the echo of the ticker.

Her tenderness of conscience, however, has its callosities. She thinks nothing of encouraging the attentions of other men. Skating on thin ice, indeed, seems to be her commonest diversion. The ice breaks occasionally, and it is a wonder that she does not go through sooner. There comes to her, after a few years of married life, a veritable viking in the shape of a Mr. Chiltern. Honora has taken for her principle that she has but one life to live, and, therefore, she must get the most out of it. Wherefore, she coolly leaves her husband for the viking, and goes out West to wait for her divorce. She tells Spence that if he had loved her passionately things might have been different. Mr. Churchill does his best to make Honora dignified in her waiting. It is hard to preserve delicacy and refinement with the trail of the divorce court smirching the pages. Peter Irwin's visit to her as she awaits the legal separation is one of the finest passages in the book.

He calls her intended husband a scoundrel, and he speaks the truth.

The marriage comes tripping upon the heels of the divorce. For a time all goes well with the passionate Chiltern, him of the broad estates and the bluest blood, and the no less passionate Honora. The world, nevertheless, to which they both belong, sets its face against them; and in a few months, moreover, Honora discovers that her idol has feet of clay. The situation, going from bad to worse, is relieved by the violent death of Chiltern. Honora hides herself in Paris, and after five years, at the age of thirty, Peter Irwin, the most decent character in the story, comes and takes her to his own.

Such, in brief, is Mr. Churchill's latest story. In going through it one is thrown into very bad company—divorcees, men about town, cynics and the idle rich. At bottom they are all Socialists. They have but one life to live and they are going to get the most out of it. As for Honora Leffingwell, she is accorded so much attention that one is obliged to make some attempt at classifying her. She is, it may be said, an American Becky Sharp brought up to date. Becky was an adventuress from the moment she entered the home of the Sedleys; Honora, from the day she set foot in the house of the Worths. Becky won her way by her charms; Honora by her beauty. Becky chose the line of least resistance; so, too, did Honora Leffingwell. Both were thoroughly selfish.

But there are great and striking differences. Thackeray does not make a heroine of the famous Becky Sharp. While he causes us to realize her power over men, he never for a moment brings us to side with Becky in her schemings. Even while we admire her cleverness, we are laughing at her. Here Mr. Churchill fails to rise to his opportunities. He does not hold the mirror up to nature. Having resolved to make Honora his heroine—and treating her as the heroine is the cardinal error of "A Modern Chronicle"—his sense of humor fails him whenever he has to speak directly of Honora. When he has to do with the other characters—the climbers, the cynics, the fast set—he has some objectivity—he shows them as they are. But for Honora Leffingwell he is always subjective. He puts himself in her place. It had been better art, then, had Honora told her story in the first person.

Honora, throughout the lengthy biography, never by any chance rises to any great climax. Compare the finest passages in the book with Becky's encounter with her husband when he came unexpectedly upon her and Lord Steyne. Thackeray makes us realize the cleverness and charm of Becky: Mr. Churchill, in Honora's regard, would have us take his word.

As to the ethics of "A Modern Chronicle," one is reminded, on reading it, of the temperance orator addressing a crowd of sailors. He begins by dilating on the lure and pleasure of drink, and so successful was he that by the time he got to the rebuttal, three-fourths of his audience were thronging the nearby saloons.

At the end, Mr. Churchill seems to side with the upholders of the marital bond. But almost to the last chapters of his Chronicle he will have nine out of ten women readers (and to the women is Mr. Churchill addressing himself) in entire accord and sympathy with the much-married Honora. The book, whatever the author intended, seems to make for the propagation of divorce. Nor does it throw any further light upon the fast set of to-day than has been afforded us by "The House of Mirth" and similar volumes.

Finally, the question arises: Was it worth Mr. Churchill's while to bestow so much time and attention upon Honora Leffingwell? Has he shown a sense of proportion? To us the answer seems obvious. He has raised a tempest to drown a fly; and the fly, in the person of Honora Leffingwell, was not drowned after all.

FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J.

Akademische Vorträge, Die Exercitienwahrheiten. By HEINRICH BRUDERS, S.J., Dr. phil, et theol., Privatdozent für Dogmengeschichte an der Universität Innsbruck. Pp. x-483. Innsbruck: Felician Rauch, 1910. (Price, $1.)

In a recent number of AMERICA we recommended a book of a philosophico-apologetical character, offered by a professor of the Innsbruck theological faculty as a contribution to the defensive armament of the Catholic university student against the attacks of modern liberalism and scepticism, attacks which are nowhere more virulent than in the universities themselves. (See AMERICA for January 29, 1910, p. 428.) The excellent work now under review is another contribution to that armament, but its aim is ascetical rather than philosophical. During the last decade in Germany and Austria the crying need of a special pastoral care of Catholic students at the universities has been repeatedly proposed and urged in Catholic assemblies of all kinds, and has been, besides, the subject of frequent and earnest discussion in university circles themselves, and not without many encouraging results. Father Bruders' book has arisen out of this need, and while he recognizes that no book can ever be a substitute for the intelligent and enthusiastic guidance of a zealous priest, he realizes vividly what an important role the written word plays in the religious education of the student, who by the essential demands of his vocation is continually thrown back upon books as his guides and counsellors in every department of knowledge. In this book he will find such a guide and counsellor in a development of the "Spiritual Exercises" of St. Ignatius, originating in university circles, and especially designed to meet the spiritual needs of university students.

It is, to our knowledge, the first time a development of the "Exercises" with this specific aim has been published. One recognizes, both from the general character of the work and in many of the details throughout, that the author has had a long experience with university students, and that his intercourse with them has begotten a deep understanding of, and a warm sympathy for, their peculiar needs. The point of view is at times that of law, at times that of history, and the unity of the whole is preserved by the one aim, to make the "Exercises" an all-absorbing philosophy of life. As the preface notes, any and every special department of knowledge is made for the student into a philosophy of life, with the result that in a large number of cases he unconsciously loses his grip on the supernatural and religion ceases to exert any attraction on him. The attempt is made here so to present the "Exercises" that the student will realize that the results of scientific research in any department whatever are in exquisite and perfect harmony with the Great Truths, and that advance in scientific eminence does not demand a corresponding advance in scepticism or agnosticism.

If the specific aim of the book is new, the carrying out of that aim is no less so. Real practical piety manifests itself in the reception of the Sacraments. Against the Sacrament of Penance especially, nowadays, the attacks of radicalism are often directed. For this reason the history of this Sacrament is developed in four conferences, with the result that it becomes clear that, objectively considered, the penitential discipline of the Church was never in the Church's history milder than it is at present. The meditations on the Foundation, on Nazareth, on the Prodigal Son, on authority, on the Sanction of Authority, are also new in their plan and execution. In fact, every familiar detail of the "Exercises" is presented in a new light, history, and especially the history of dogma, being continually requisitioned to furnish a striking illustration or proof in a way that cannot fail to be effective. There is a tone of joy throughout; the service of God is to be a service of joy, the rallying-cry in the battle against sin: "Servite Domino in letitia." M. J. A.

The Magical Message According to Ioannes (St. John the Divine), commonly called the Gospel according to (St.) John. 8vo. pp. 227. By JAMES M. PRYSE. New York: The Theosophical Publishing Company, 1909.

To review this work with sympathy for its claims, one must needs be a theosophist. In a subtitle Mr. Pryse claims to have produced a "verbatim translation from the Greek done in modern English;" he has given us rather a theosophical interpretation of the Fourth Gospel. The start must be made with him, else he goes on alone. To Mr. Pryse the Gospel of St. John has no literal meaning at all, but only an esoteric and a mystical meaning. That mystical meaning is the history of the purification of the soul; the historicity of the person of Christ is cast to the winds of fancy. The Gospel, or Evangel, is a "magical message"—not a message of wonder-working, but a message of the wisdom of the Magi. The wisdom of the Magi is read in the language of the signs of the zodiac. The seven planets give seven magical meanings of each of the four Gospels. One of these seven meanings is worked out for us by the author. What a hodge-podge the seven must be! In this pseudo-psycho-physiological rendering of the Gospel story a wonderful evangelical metamorphosis results. The Sea of Tiberias is the ether of the brain; the Iordanos is the vital force in the spinal chord; the Dead Sea pertains to generation; Galilaia is the spiritual body; Samareia is the psychic body; Ioudaia is the physical body; and so on through a maze of heart centres and brain centres and sidereal bodies and what-not-else of theosophical esoteric cult.

To us Catholics this is all worse than nonsense; it is blasphemous. No proof is given of any statement; yet the inspired Word of God is juggled with as if it were some cryptogram which only the theosophist could make out. The so-called translation reads like so much blasphemy to one who is not a theosophist. "I lustrate in water," says John the Baptist; "this Anointed is he who lustrates in the pure Breath." Such is a specimen of this arbitrary and ridiculous attempt to translate the Gospel into an esoteric and a theosophic magical message. The foot notes follow the lines of interpretation which we have pointed out. We can see nothing to recommend the book except the fact that it gives Catholic priests an insight into the methods of theosophy. Literature like this is, of course, forbidden by the Church, but the essential dullness of it will supplement the prohibitions of the Index, so far as its popularity is concerned. It is a good book to review in order to show how the human mind can go knocking about wildly after it leaves the orbit of Truth.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

Heroes of the Faith. By DOM BEDE CAMM, O.S.B. New York: Benziger Brothers. Price, 80 cents net.

The glorious record of an ancient and honorable family, with which every Catholic may justly claim kinship, is here portrayed for us by the illustrious Benedictine. Selecting some of the valiant witnesses to the Truth during the darkest of England's dark days, he pictures them with all that deftness and enthusiasm of which he long since gave proofs. In "Heroes of the Faith" we find fresh inspiration to bless God that we are of the household of those heroes, that spiritual ties, closer and stronger than those of blood, knit us to them. In dwelling on their heroic lives we are studying the glories of our own kindred—another incentive for us to live worthy of the faith to which they gave such undaunted testimony.

Reviews and Magazines

A sympathetic article on Bolivia appears in Le Correspondant for April 25, from the pen of Prince Louis of Orleans and Braganza. It might well be styled Bolivia's "Halcyon Days," for he portrays the transformation that has taken place in the country during the past years of peace after almost a century of revolutionary uprisings, guerrilla warfare and general political unrest. The immense mineral wealth of the country and its high altitude prompted one enthusiastic Frenchman to liken it to a silver table with supports of gold. With 10,000 silver mines still awaiting capital and roads for their proper exploitation, Bolivia already ranks third in the production of the white metal.

The prince finds points of resemblance between the Russians and the Bolivians—great intellectuality and a praiseworthy curiosity to learn, the latter quality depending on the "splendid isolation" of the two countries from the rest of the civilized world, for what the steppes do for the Russian, towering mountains do for the Bolivian. The Jesuit college at La Paz is patronized by the first families of the republic. The Rev. Prosper Malzieu, S.J., the President, praises the talent of the young Bolivians, but regrets their almost excessive fondness for literature, art and ethics to the virtual exclusion of those studies of a practical nature, which, while demanding more labor from the students, would make them much more useful citizens. With a population of 2,500,000, all theoretically equal before the law, the management of public affairs is not shared by the two million Indians and inferior half-breeds, who are mere hewers of wood and drawers of water. The earnest efforts of the present administration to attract immigration, to develop agriculture and to improve education are proofs of an enlightened public spirit.

Among other weighty articles in Razon y Fe for May is P. Villada's views of the parliamentary elections. What we Americans humbly confess that we cannot grasp is how a petty, though noisy, band of demagogues can carry elections in Spain or elsewhere in the face of a safe and sane majority of the electors. Are the rank and file of the electors so safe, so sane? We know that a single word, which a high-minded patriot refused to utter, would have precipitated a bloody, fratricidal struggle among us in 1877, yet no vital constitutional principle was in danger of disappearing forever from our political field. Anti-religious and Catholic, Revolutionary and Traditional, Monarchical and Republican—these are the interests brought face to face in the unbloody battle of ballots. Señor Canalejas, the present Premier, has the merit of frankness, if no other: "I propose to follow an advanced and very radical policy in social and religious problems." Lerroux, who, with his French blood, throbs with French radicalism, is out with all his banners in favor of Canalejas. We know his aims, for they have been bellowed from the housetops: Subjugation of the Church, suppression of the religious Orders, neutral schools (that is, uncolored with religion) as the official schools. In the face of these threatened calamities, what will the Spanish electorate do?

EDUCATION

"Should further legislation provide for physical examination in private and parochial schools?" is a problem propounded by a pamphlet just issued by the Bureau of Municipal Research, New York City, for promoting interest in public school efficiency. To the thousands who pay little attention to the fact that the public school system of America is reaching out more and more into the home, and influencing the daily life of the people in material ways, this latest pamphlet may prove an eye-opener. Whatever one may think regarding this latter day development of the system—and there are many who oppose it for the best of ethical reasons,—the fact is made startlingly evident that the State Legislatures of the country are being diligently canvassed in favor of such legislation.

The purpose is to secure the enactment of measures which will bring school officials into very close relations with the home in matters hitherto commonly regarded as entirely out of the province of school administration. Recent reports emanating from New York City's Superintendent show to what length the project is already carried in some municipalities. The most extreme legislation to-day is found in Indiana, which declares that the children of Indianapolis must have physical examinations, and sets aside for that purpose fifty cents on every $100 of taxable property. It includes for examination children of all grades in private schools and kindergartens and parochial schools. It were well that those who consider this legislation an invasion of private rights, and an unwise paternalism, begin to pay attention to the movement. Unfair imposition of burdens has been made before, because of easy-going neglect on the part of those who should have been vigilant.

The current number of the Educational Review contains a paper on Moral Conditions in Ohio Colleges. The author confesses that his article is based "upon replies to a questionnaire prepared and sent out by President Welch of Ohio Wesleyan University." The report was probably sought for in order that conditions in Ohio Colleges might be compared with statements made by Mr. Birdseye, who has been rather insistent in the sharp fire of criticism he levels at the colleges of the country because of the moral conditions which he has found prevalent in them. The general trend of statements the critic makes may be gathered from a remark in his "Reorganization of our Colleges." He says, when studying the subject of college vice: "When I had gathered my proofs together, I was appalled at what I had found in many institutions."

The Educational Review article is not so satisfactory a comparison with Mr. Birdseye's statement of conditions as one would wish it to be. Probably the point which will attract a Catholic's attention most of all is the absence of the name of any Catholic college from the list of those whose administrative heads were requested to send in a reply to the questionnaire. The fact is noteworthy since there are in Ohio a number of flourishing Catholic colleges. Naturally this absence explains what a Catholic must call a deplorable omission in the response to the question, "What does your college do to show its disapproval of these things" (certain student vices concerning which information is sought)? Not one of the institutions questioned suggests recourse to a remedy based upon religious duty. Only a Catholic teacher can describe the helpful aid he has had at hand in training young men, in the efficiency of the practices of the Catholic religion.

Prayer, habits of devotion, above all confession and Communion give the one supreme help which makes the struggle against vicious inclinations a fairly easy one to the Catholic student who avails himself of their strength.

Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wis., announces that its Summer School session will begin June 27 next and continue to August 22. Classes will be held in all courses daily except Saturday. The purpose of the University in organizing this eight weeks' course during the vacation months is to meet the needs of deserving students whose occupations during the year prevent their attendance at the regular sessions of the University, and to give opportunity as well to more ambitious students to make more rapid progress by extra work. For the present only such courses will be offered as will be helpful to the students who take them, either in the way of preparation for college entrance or as part credit towards a degree. The courses outlined in the announcement comprise work in ancient and modern languages, history, mathematics and science. Rev. John J. McCormick, S.J., Dean of the School of Arts, will be the Director of the Summer School.

The Princeton Tutors' Association, an organization of undergraduates who coach delinquent students in making up back work, or in working off the penalty of extra hours for excessive absences from classroom exercises, has issued an interesting report for the past year. Evidently Princeton has had a large number of delinquents of one or the other sort within the year, since the total sum earned by student tutors is set down as $14,000. The report shows that some of the tutors, earning nearly $1,000 each, were enabled to thus meet their entire expenses in the University.

Speaking of education in Argentina, The Southern Cross, of Buenos Aires, has a highly commendatory word for Don Bosco's Fathers, who are so actively engaged in industrial education:

"The Argentine Republic owes a heavy debt of gratitude to the Salesian Fathers who are cooperating with such splendid success in the building of the Nation. We have heard a great deal of talk lately about industrial education, but the only place in which this class of education has been an undoubted success and has borne golden fruit is in the Salesian schools. There are about thirty Salesian schools in the country, in which all trades are taught, and in which, moreover, the boys have the advantage of a sound moral training which leaves an indelible impress upon their minds. In this country, where a great portion of the press is barely tolerant of, if not hostile to everything in any way associated with the Church, Catholic schools receive very little fair-play. The work done by the Salesians, however, has won recognition from many quarters, and it is with pleasure we find the leading Argentine paper praising it and recommending the Salesian schools of arts and trades to the attention of Government and to the provincial Executives."

The Senate of the Irish National University met May 5, thirty-five members being present out of a total of thirty-nine, to discuss the question of subjects for matriculation. Most Reverend Archbishop Walsh, the Chancellor, presided. It was decided that five subjects should be selected from the groups: (1) Latin or Greek; (2) Irish or any modern language, including Dutch; (3) English or History and Geography; (4) Mathematics and Natural Philosophy (5) any other subject. A rider was carried on the motion of Mr. Gwynne, M.P., that every Irish-born student who had not presented Irish matriculation, should attend during his undergraduate course lectures on Irish language, Literature and History, and satisfy the professors of these subjects in his knowledge thereof. A motion by Dr. Douglas Hyde that Irish should be made compulsory for matriculation in 1913 was declared out of order, and postponed for the consideration of the Board of Studies in July.

SOCIOLOGY

The following is the substance of a timely article on Catholic settlement work in Brooklyn, contributed by Miss Grace O'Brien to the Survey of May 7th:

"St. Helen's Settlement, the chief centre of activity of the Catholic Settlement Association, is the outcome of a sewing class for children organized several years ago by the Very Reverend Monsignor William J. White, D.D., Supervisor of Catholic Charities in Brooklyn. It has clearly seemed a responsibility resting upon American Catholics who obviously have an understanding of the religious problems involved, to assume a share in the assimilation of these future citizens. The Italians in the main are extremists in religion. They have always swung from Catholicism to Atheism, from conservatism to anarchy. Hence the law-abiding influence of the Roman Catholic faith, with its insistence upon recognition of all legitimate authority is, if only from a purely civic standpoint, a telling factor in the contest against the destructive tendencies to which the immigrant, cut off from the restraining forces of his native environment, is subjected.

"Most Italian children attend the public schools, where necessarily they can receive no religious instruction. They tend in consequence to grow up in an attitude of indifference to religion. It has no part in their Americanism. The perverted patriotism they thus develop is responsible in part for much of the lawlessness some of them have exhibited. Liberty is wrongly interpreted, law and order are disregarded, and undeserved condemnation is brought upon one of the most courteous, kindly people existent.

"In view of the conditions just outlined, there seemed to be an opportunity for an organization which, while conserving the constructive forces the Italians bring as a heritage, should strive to guide them toward a truer understanding of the fundamentally Christian character of American ideals.

"St. Helen's has been established one year and has as yet no resident workers. All its activities are directed by a committee of volunteers. Classes have been organized in sewing, cooking, metal work, choral singing; mandolin and violin instruction is given, social clubs for young girls have been formed and a kindergarten is in process of formation.

In the parishes of St. Anne's, in Front Street, the Visitation in Richards Street and the Assumption in Cranberry Street, in all of which there is a foreign population, the rectors allow the use of the parish schools for work in settlement directions. At times when the schools are not in session Italians and Spaniards are encouraged to come for lessons in English, for mothers' meetings, sewing classes and various kinds of social assemblage. The families are visited by the workers of the special committee assigned to the parish. The Settlement Association has co-operated with the Tuberculosis Committee in the sale of the Christmas stamps, the Children's Christmas Committee, the District Nursing Committee, the French Nursing Sisters and the St. Vincent de Paul Society.

"The association aims to build up the main house, St. Helen's, and to carry on the work in the parishes where the rectors see the need for it through committees formed for the purpose, using temporarily the parochial schools as meeting places.

"While social service in the Catholic Church antedates the Middle Ages, the methods used have varied with changing conditions. The settlement movement, calling as it does very largely upon the citizens who heretofore never joined the nursing or teaching orders of monks or nuns, when united with the spirit of social responsibility has not yet been taken up very generally by Catholics. But a constantly increasing number are coming to recognize in this modern expression of social reform a spirit akin to that of the gentle Saint of Assisi, whose wide sense of brotherhood claimed even the elements of nature. With the Franciscan inspiration and the church organization to aid in the practical upholding of these ideals, the outlook for a far-reaching influence for social betterment is encouraging."

"Outraged nature wreaks her own revenge" is the conclusion of Dr. Max Schlapp, of the New York Academy of Medicine, who establishes a connection between a low birth rate and feeble-mindedness or insanity among children. The oft-repeated fallacy that a falling off in the births makes for and marks an improvement in the race receives a set-back not on religious or moral grounds, but on purely natural principles. Dr. Schlapp establishes his conclusions on a study of the subject which embraces the past fifty years.

The Textile Conference held at Memphis, Tenn., in April, adopted resolutions in favor of compulsory education and the extension and strict application of laws against child-labor. The principal speakers on the conservation of child life were Mrs. Florence Kelly, of New York, Miss Barnard, State Commissioner of Charities, Oklahoma, and Miss Jeanne Gordon, of

New Orleans, who warned parents against yielding to the whims of stage-struck children. The "white slave traffic" was largely supplied by the great number of young girls on the stage, who when sent adrift, as they usually are, have no reputable means of livelihood.

ECONOMICS

One hears from time to time of the great development of British Columbia, Canada's Province on the Pacific, but its distance makes it hard to realize what this means. Let us give some history to illustrate it. Long ago, somewhere about 1850, the Hudson's Bay Company discovered coal near its station at Nanaimo, Vancouver Island. Practical miners were brought from England to work it, and among these was Robert Dunsmuir. After some time the Nanaimo mine passed into the hands of the Vancouver Coal Company, and Robert Dunsmuir ceased to be connected with it. He had his eyes open, however, and while wandering in the bush about three miles north of the original pit, he discovered a broad vein of coal which his experience told him was far superior to what had hitherto been mined. He kept his secret until in 1870 he succeeded in interesting in it the Admiral on the station, Rear-Admiral Farquhar, and Commander Egerton and Lieutenant Diggle, of the British gunboat Boxer, the last especially being a man of considerable means. They formed the Wellington Colliery Company, and, as they were able to work the face of the seam by means of an incline, began putting out coal which soon commanded the Pacific Coast market for steam and domestic use. The Admiral and Commander Egerton, satisfied with their profits, sold out to their other partners, who formed the firm of Dunsmuir, Diggle & Co. to continue the business. After a few years Lieutenant Diggle sold out to Dunsmuir for, it is said, $300,000. The development of the mines was maintained. New pits were opened, and the export increased year by year. Some time ago they were offered, according to report, to the Canadian Pacific Railway for $3,000,000 and refused. Now Messrs. McKenzie & Mann, of the Canada Northern Railway, have bought them for $9,000,000, and are raising money by a bond issue in the London market for their further development.

The decline in the export of food stuffs continues. During April, as compared with the same period of last year, it was especially noticeable in meat and dairy products of which the value was $6,603,846, against $12,193,632, and in cattle, hogs and sheep $184,374, against $1,576,343. In comparing these figures the rise in prices must not be overlooked. Wheat alone shows an increase, the export for April, 1910, being 2,669,408 bushels against 509,929 bushels in the same month of 1909. It must be remarked, however, that owing to reduced rates granted Canadian shippers, a great deal of Canadian wheat has gone out through American ports during April of this year.

A preliminary estimate by the United States Geological Survey fixes a gain for the year 1909 of 20% in the production of Portland cement over the year 1908. The net output was 10,227,000 barrels, at a value of $8,557,000. The production of natural cement showed a falling off of 100,000 barrels with an increase of 160,646 barrels in the case of Puzzolan cement.

SCIENCE

Yate, a wood native to western Australia, has been shown to be the stoutest of all known woods. It is possessed of an average tensile strength of 24,000 pounds to the square inch, the equal of ordinary cast iron. Specimens are on record that have withstood a pressure of nearly 18 tons to the square inch, equalling that of wrought iron.

The United States Senate has just passed the Frye bill providing that all ocean-going steamers, carrying fifty passengers or more, be equipped with radio-communicating apparatus.

The use of wireless in sea service has passed the experimental stage. It now remains to demonstrate its practicability in land service. The largest experiment is to be made by the Union Pacific Railroad, along whose lines stations are put at distances of approximately 100 miles apart. The breaking down of the telegraph systems of the West during the winter months has somewhat interfered with traffic, and it is expected that the wireless will put an end to such difficulties.

Prof. Morehouse, while observing the comet on May 1st, noticed a short bright tail projecting toward the sun. Two bright rays bordered the outer part of this sector. The nucleus was surrounded, on the sun side, with distinct nebulous sheaths. This later phenomenon recalls the observation of Smyth made in 1835 and recorded in the following terms:—

"Oct. 10. The Comet in this evening's examination presented an extraordinary phenomenon. The brush, fan, or gleam of light, before mentioned, was clearly perceptible issuing from the nucleus, which was now about 17" in diameter, and shooting into the coma; the glances at times being very strong, and of a different aspect from the other parts of the luminosity.

On viewing this appearance it was impossible not to recall the strange drawing of the "luminous sector," which is given by Hevelius in his Annus Climactericus as the representation of Halley's Comet in 1682, and which has been considered as a distortion."

By way of a concluding word to an interesting catalogue of the auroral displays, ranging over the years 1897 to 1910, Prof. Barnard, of the Yerkes Observatory, remarks:—

"I will not here go into the discussion of the connection between solar disturbances (as indicated alone by great sun spots) and the aurora. This does not lie within my province. It may not be out of the way to state, however, that such a connection does not at present seem to be clearly established in all cases. I have within the past ten years or so frequently noted solar spots so large as to be visible to the unaided eye. These have not always been closely associated with auroral displays. A most striking instance of this kind was shown in the case of a large naked-eye sun-spot on and about December 29, 1909. A careful record on every clear night about this time failed to show any evidence of aurora. Indeed this prolonged absence of auroras (up to the latter part of January, 1910), would have been noticeable without the incentive of the large sun-spot to look for them."

Weighing a whiff of gas is the latest triumph of the chemical laboratory. A scale sensitive to the seven thousand millionth part of an ounce has been designed and perfected by Sir William Ramsay, of University College, London. The beam of the balance is made of fused silica, thus combining minimum weight with comparatively fair tensile strength, and at the same time eliminating to a great extent thermal errors. The tray is suspended from the beam by a fibre of fused silica, of a diameter less than that of a cobweb. The displacement of the beam is indicated by means of a mirror on which is focused a pencil of light, which in turn is reflected on a black graduated scale, at a distance of six feet from the balance.

The Philippine Weather Bureau of Manila, conducted by the Jesuit Fathers, proposes to establish wireless telegraph stations at the auxiliary meteorological stations of Mt. Miranda, and at Santo Domingo de Basco on the Island of Batan. Thus the Bureau, which has a world-wide reputation for exactness in forecasting typhoons, will be able to give still more timely warnings of their approach to vessels navigating the China Seas.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

AMERICA has received from the office of the Apostolic Delegation a copy of the decree regarding the secrecy to be observed by all those who, directly and indirectly, have aught to do with the selection and forwarding of the names of candidates submitted to Rome for episcopal sees in the United States. The obligation of the secret, which is affirmed to be sub gravi, is declared in the decree to arise from the dignity of such an ecclesiastical election, from the important nature of the business involved, from proper reverence for the judgment of the Roman Pontiff, to which the names are submitted, and finally from a sense of fitting justice to the candidates themselves.

The International Catholic Truth Society has received several letters from devoted priests in the Southern and Western States appealing for Catholic literature. There are thousands of Catholic families scattered far and wide in Texas and Georgia, the Dakotas and the Carolinas, to whom Catholic periodical literature would be welcome and beneficial. The zealous missionary, with all his endeavors, can visit these isolated members of his flock but two or three times a year. A word of doctrine, an explanation of some puzzling news item or press comment, an account of the doings of their brethren in other parts of the land would give them subjects for thought and prayer during the long interval when there is no Mass, no sermon and no Sacrament.

An earnest appeal is made to readers of papers and periodicals to co-operate with the I. C. T. S. in supplying this want. The Society will furnish the name and address of a person who will gladly receive whatever reading matter one is willing to dispose of. The only expense incurred will be that of the postage stamp on the weekly or monthly which may be forwarded after it has been read. Communications should be addressed to the International Truth Society, Brooklyn, N. Y.

However Methodism fares elsewhere, writes T. L. M. in the Liverpool Catholic Times, it is declining in England. The facts are decidedly depressing for Methodists. The Wesleyan Methodist Connexion gives it a total of full membership as 483,595, a decrease of 2,267. Last year there was a falling off of 1,444. In 1908 the decrease was 4,224, and in 1907 it was 2,034; so that in four years the total reduction has been 9,969. There has been a like decline in the number of persons on trial for membership, the total for four years being 10,098. It is likewise noted that the Church of England has suffered. Its connection with the State gives it, of course, great advantages over other Protestant bodies. Yet the census of church attendance taken by the Daily News some years ago showed that it was losing ground in London, and the census carried out by the Liverpool Daily Post bore similar testimony as to the condition of Anglicans in that city.

On May 17 Bishop Alerding, of Fort Wayne, dedicated the new chapel of St. Joseph's College, Rensselaer, Ind. The institution, conducted by the Fathers of the Precious Blood, was opened in 1891 with 54 names on the student list; now there are over 250 attending collegiate, commercial and normal classes. The new brick chapel, seating capacity 600, is the climax of the progressive development of this institution for Catholic boys, which is recognized as an educational power in the State.

On May 10, Rev. Dr. John B. MacGinley was consecrated at Philadelphia, Bishop of Nueva Caceres in the Philippines, making the third bishop Philadelphia has sent to our island possessions.

The beautiful Peace Palace, the gift of Andrew Carnegie, was among the buildings destroyed at the recent earthquake at Cartago, Costa Rica. Many students of the College of the Salesian Fathers were killed. Only three of them, it is reported, escaped uninjured.

OBITUARY

Rev. Joseph Goiffon, the oldest priest in the Archdiocese of St. Paul, died on May 6, in his eighty-sixth year at Hugo, Minn. He was born at Ain, France, and came to the Northwest in 1857 and was enrolled among the priests of the diocese. In the winter of 1860, while making a journey from St. Paul to his mission in what is now the northern section of North Dakota, he was overtaken by a blizzard, and so badly frozen that his left leg and half his right foot had to be amputated. In spite of these injuries he recovered and served valiantly on the mission for a number of years, until age compelled him to retire from active work and spend his last days in quiet preparation for the end. At his funeral Archbishop Ireland paid an affectionate tribute to his beautiful life and unostentatious suffering in his zeal for the salvation of souls.

"Father Daniel McErlane, prison worker and philanthropist, died in St. Louis after an illness of many years. He was sixty-two years old." This is the brief press announcement of the death of a priest who, for twenty-five years past, has been a well-known charity worker in the city institutions in St. Louis. Born in Ireland, Feb. 29, 1848, Father McErlane came to this country to enter the novitiate of the Society of Jesus, Florissant, Mo., on Dec. 9, 1867. Following the usual training of the Jesuits he was ordained in Woodstock in 1881, and a few years later was appointed director of studies in the College of St. Mary's, St. Marys, Kansas. In 1885 he was named President of the College, a peculiarly fitting appointment, since Father McErlane as young Professor and as priest had been intimately associated with its development from a pioneer Indian school. Ill-health frustrated the hopes which his eminent abilities had led superiors to build upon his administration, and he was early obliged to retire from the presidency of the college. After a year spent in the South, Father McErlane was sent to St. Louis where he was stationed until his death on May 10. His health did not permit a resumption of college work, for which he was signally well equipped, and he turned his thoughts to the active charity of parochial duties. Circumstances led him into close contact with the needs of the unfortunates in the city institutions of St. Louis, and he was speedily so immersed in the diligent service his sympathy inspired in their direction, that he gradually withdrew from all other occupations to devote himself almost exclusively to prison and hospital work. Father McErlane's characteristic was an unselfish and limitless charity. His helpful influence will be missed by the poor and the outcast among whom he labored with apostolic energy in these twenty-five years. That he might have won distinguished place in another line of activity, the several little brochures he published give evidence. He had a singularly keen mind, and his popular exposition of the teachings of the Church in these booklets won for him a consideration entirely apart from the love and esteem his unflagging zeal in his life-work assured him.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

REBUKING ANTI-CATHOLIC PUBLICATIONS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

You have shown up the Literary Digest in its true colors in your issue of April 30th. Through curiosity I became a subscriber to that publication. There was much information to be gathered from its columns, but after giving a fair view of an event in which Catholics were interested in one issue, one must expect his Catholic sense to be wounded in the next. I paid my subscription up to date, and said that if the editor was prepared to consult a competent Catholic in future issues, when there should be a question on which Catholics were anxious to be informed, I would continue to be a subscriber; if not so disposed to treat his many Catholic subscribers I asked him to send me no more issues, not even those for which I paid. From that day I ceased to be inflicted with the Digest's biased and bilious views.

But I am not yet satisfied, for priests and Catholic laymen of my acquaintance subscribe for it. Why should any one subscribe for a paper which attacks his most cherished views? Why do not our Catholic Societies reprimand it as the Catholic Federation has reproved McClure's for its Ferrer article?

I pray for AMERICA's success. It is a power for good. It is so much after the Holy Father's ideal for Catholic publications. Of course, I could not do without it.

The following letter from the Rev. L. L. Conrardy, missionary in the Far East, contradicts the report sent out recently by the Associated Press that he is dying of leprosy in China:

St. Joseph's Leper Island,
Kouangtong,
March 8, 1910.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have received your excellent weekly, AMERICA, punctually every week. I am always looking for it with pleasure, specially so that it is the only paper I am getting from the States or elsewhere.

Since I came back among the lepers, at the end of November last, my health has been improving all along, and now I am in better health than for several years past, at least the last ten. Although near seventy I am always busy all day long. I wish that they were much longer, then I should have time to read outside of my daily and ordinary work. All the society I have are the lepers. Every evening I gather the men in one ward and together we recite our prayers and then they read aloud; one asks the questions and the others answer out of the little Catechism—in Chinese, of course.

Not one here who can speak a blessed word of English, or any other European language.

I know very little of Chinese yet; it is quite difficult at my age and with no one to help me and teach me. But, thank God, my health is now good and I hope to work for and among the Chinese lepers a number of years, God knows.

Wishing you my best wish and your paper an ever-increasing circulation, as it is a great power for good,

L. L. CONRARDY.

CHRONICLE

The Week in Washington.—The Senate decided in favor of the establishment of a United States court of commerce with exclusive jurisdiction over appeals from decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission.—The House rejected the bill to change the date for the inauguration of the President from March 4 to the last Thursday in April. The House passed the Stirling Bill, which provides for the parole of federal prisoners who have served one-third of their terms and whose applications for parole may receive consideration from the parole boards created by the bill.—The Supreme Court ruled that Charles W. Morse, now serving a prison sentence of fifteen years for violations of the banking laws, could not file an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The Supreme Court also fixed November 14 next as the date for a rehearing in the cases of the Standard Oil Company and the American Tobacco Company.—A violent attack on the President diversified the proceedings of the House. Mr. Hitchcock (Dem.) of Nebraska, denounced him as guilty of using undue influence in the conduct of the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy, while Mr. Underwood (Dem.) of Alabama, accused the President of conspiring with certain members of the House to withhold information in connection with the corporation income tax.

The Ballinger Investigation.—The conduct of the investigation in the Ballinger-Pinchot affair has been a series of blunders on the part of the friends of the Secretary. The charge was made that the Attorney-General's summary of the case upon which President Taft approved the action of Secretary Ballinger in the dismissal of Glavis, the complaining witness, was pre-dated so as to make it appear that it was in the President's hands before Glavis was ousted. That charge was indignantly denied and then admitted by the Attorney-General himself, though he claimed that he had submitted to the President at the date recorded rough notes and an oral analysis on which the summary was based. Then Frederick M. Kerby, a stenographer in the office of Secretary Ballinger, declared that the President's letter was substantially the same as a draft of such letter that was dictated to him by Assistant Attorney General Oscar Lawler. That statement was likewise repudiated, but for all that Attorney General Wickersham promptly sent to the investigating committee a carbon copy of the original Lawler letter which he said had just been found. Mr. Brandeis, attorney for Mr. Glavis, had been striving to get this document from the Attorney General for some time. Thereupon Secretary Ballinger promptly dismissed the stenographer, Kerby, "for the good of the service," and President Taft frankly admitted that he had authorized Mr. Lawler to prepare a letter to Secretary Ballinger, "as if he (Lawler) were President," indicating clearly to Lawler what he wished contained in the letter. The confusion has been increased by Mr. Lawler's charge of falsehood against former Secretary Garfield and ex-Chief Forester Pinchot, by his admission that he was prejudiced against Glavis when he wrote his memorandum for the President, and the introduction of letters supporting the charge that Mr. Ballinger was disposed to favor the Morgan interests in Alaska.

Railroad Disputes Ended.—The trainmen and conductors of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad and the Michigan Central Railroad have been given the same wage increases as those obtained on the Baltimore and Ohio. The award of the arbitrators likewise establishes the New York harbor switching rate across the Province of Ontario on the Michigan Central from Detroit to Buffalo. Under the terms of the decision the award differs from that made in the case of the New York Central dispute, where a lower rate than the standard obtains between New York and Buffalo on account of the greater mileage made. There are no runs of such length on the Lake Shore or the Michigan Central. The awards on the Big Four, Chicago, Indiana and Southern, and Lake Erie and Western will be made known later. —Seventeen thousand Iowa mine workers resumed work in the mines on May 16, after a suspension of over six weeks. As a result of concessions to miners, the price of coal mined in the Thirteenth Iowa District has been advanced by the operators two cents a ton. —The Vice-President of the Erie Railroad made known on May 20 that all the important points in the wage dispute with its conductors and trainmen had been settled satisfactorily.

Panama Canal Exposition.—The Louisiana State Legislature has voted a special tax to defray the expenses of the proposed Exhibition to be held in New Orleans, 1915, to celebrate the completion of the Panama Canal, and adjourned, May 24, in order to go in a body, headed by the Governor and presiding officers, to present the claims of New Orleans before the Congressional Committee on Arts and Expositions at Washington. New Orleans has already subscribed over a million dollars, and the tax is expected to bring the amount over seven millions. —Trade between the United States and the Republic of Panama has steadily grown during the seven years since the Republic of Panama came into existence. In that period the total approximates $100,000,000. In the fiscal year 1910, which ends next month, the total will exceed $22,000,000 abouts nine-tenths of which is merchandise exported from the United States to Panama, and about one-tenth merchandise imported into this country from that republic. The supplies sent from time to time on Government vessels for the Panama Canal and those engaged in its construction are not included in this summary. The British Minister at Panama estimates that about one-fifth of the total imports of the republic were for the commissaries of the canal zone, two-fifths for canal supplies and the remaining two-fifths for general use.

New Organic Law for Porto Rico.—Under amendments agreed to by the House Committee on Insular Affairs, the enactment of the new Porto Rican bill into law will effect a marked transformation in the governmental system of that island. The effect of the amendments will be to confer citizenship on the Porto Ricans as a whole instead of having the Porto Ricans file declarations of citizenship in the courts. The Porto Rican legislative functions are at present vested in an executive council. In the pending bill the Senate will consist of eight members to be appointed by the President, and five to be elected by the people. By the new measure this ratio will stand at the next election on the island, but at the following election this will be reduced to seven appointive members and six elective, which proportion will be continued for eight years. In the elections following that eight-year period the number of appointives will be gradually reduced until all the members become elective. The bill has already been favorably reported to the House.

Peru and Ecuador.—Despatches received at Washington indicate that the King of Spain, to whom the questions now in dispute between Peru and Ecuador had been referred for arbitration, has made known his purpose to withhold pronouncing a decision on the boundary question in order to give the two countries concerned a free hand to procure a direct settlement of their difficulties. This decision of King Alfonso makes mediation by the United States, Brazil and Argentina imperative, since under the joint note of those three governments it was stated that in case no award was made or in case serious difficulties should arise the three powers would undertake a satisfactory solution by mediation. Peru and Ecuador have both given assurance that they will accept with thanks the mediation offered.

Trouble in Peru.—Although the danger of war between Peru and Ecuador has been warded off through the good offices of the United States and other American republics, political and economic conditions give cause for great anxiety. President Leguía's health is so shattered that his physicians have ordered a complete rest, but he does not heed them. During an acute attack which seemed to imperil his life Doctor Ricardo Flores, who had been the President's medical adviser for many years, was summoned but refused to attend. He justified himself by explaining that, as he had been imprisoned by the President for supposed complicity in a revolutionary uprising last year, he would be blamed should his visit be followed by a fatal termination of the President's illness.

U. S. Gunboat Protects Non-Combatants.—Commander Gilmer, of the U. S. Gunboat Paducah forbade the Madriz steamer Venus, which lately arrived off Bluefields, Nicaragua, with men and munitions of war from New Orleans, to bombard the town because there were no Estrada forces within several miles of the place. The population which now consists of merchants and other civilians, including many foreigners and a multitude of women and children, could make no defense against the rapid-fire guns with which the Venus is equipped; but if Arias, who commands the steamer by authority of Madriz, were to attempt a landing, the Estrada soldiers could reach the shore in time to prevent it. The citizens are in terror over the possible entry of the Madriz troops, for the handful of marines on the Paducah could hardly protect the helpless people against the brutal excesses of the soldiery.

Canadian Catholics Honor King.—On May 20, His Grace Archbishop Bruchési, of Montreal, celebrated a solemn High Mass in his cathedral, not a requiem Mass, since the late King was not a Catholic, but a Mass to invoke God's blessing on the Royal Family and on the whole British Empire. Archbishop Bégin, of Quebec, did the same in the Quebec Basilica. Both these Archbishops conformed to the Church's discipline as stated by the late Cardinal Vaughan, when, writing from Rome the day after Queen Victoria's death, he said to his diocesans: "Of public religious services for the dead the Catholic Church knows none but such as she has instituted for the souls of her own children. For them the requiem Mass, the solemn absolution, and the Catholic funeral service form the only memorial service for the dead in her liturgy."

Great Britain.—The body of the late King was buried at Windsor on Friday May 20.—George V has begun his reign with an act of grace for all well-behaved prisoners whose sentences have five years or less to run. The five year prisoners are to be set free at the end of three months; the others, at the end of periods proportionately less.—Mr. Tom Mann, the Socialist leader, has returned to England. He is dissatisfied with the prospects of his party, saying there is little use in having members in parliament, so long as capitalists control the factory. He wants an aggressive Socialistic federation of all Trades Unions. He is even less pleased with Australasian and New Zealand Socialism, from which he once expected so much. He complains that the Socialists of the Colonies are too willing to be satisfied when comfortable, and are not ready enough to sacrifice themselves for the cause.

Ireland and King Edward.—Archbishop Walsh of Dublin, the Catholic authorities and municipal bodies generally have given public expression of condolence at the death of King Edward VII. The Dublin corporation passed a resolution of sympathy by 32 to 7, the dissenting councillors making it clear they recognized the late King's friendliness to Ireland, but opposed on national grounds. For the first time a Nationalist Lord Mayor of Dublin was present at the obsequies of an English King. The general mourning in Ireland was in recognition of the King's sympathy with the national and religious feelings of the people. Mr. Wm. Redmond's letter to the Prime Minister on the Coronation Oath is as follows:

"You may remember that upon the second reading of the Catholic Disabilities Bill moved by me last year, you spoke very strongly in favor of removing from the Royal Accession Oath the words which are so very offensive to Catholics. The view of yours so well expressed met with, I believe, favor from all quarters of the House, with some few exceptions. Indeed, most of those who did not favor my Bill as a whole expressed themselves in favor of removing the words in the Royal Declaration of which complaint is so justly made by Catholics throughout the Empire and the world. Under the present sad circumstances this matter becomes immediately pressing, and I venture to ask you to take such steps as may be necessary to relieve the new King from the obligation (if such really exists) of using language at the commencement of his reign which must deeply wound the feelings and outrage the faith of so many people everywhere."—In the Gaelic language and musical festival held during last week in Dublin, there were 2,000 entries in a great variety of competitions, dramatic, elocutionary, storytelling, essays, operas, vocal and instrumental performances in various combinations. There were plays and public concerts and oratorical displays, in which only the Gaelic language was used.

United South Africa.—The noted Boer General, Lewis Botha, now Premier of the Transvaal, has been summoned to form the first Union Ministry Cabinet of United South Africa, of which Viscount Gladstone is the first Governor-General. As announced in the chronicle United South Africa was formed recently by the federation of the British Colonies of Cape of Good Hope, Natal, the Transvaal, and the Orange River State. The four original colonies have become provinces of the Union, and each province will have its own council, consisting of as many members as the province is entitled to send to the Union Parliament. The latter will consist of a Senate and a House of Assembly and will be the general legislative body. Cape Town will be the seat of legislature and Pretoria the seat of Executive Government. The Union was formed with the consent of the individual parliaments.

Political Situation in France.—A few days ago there was a rumor in Paris that M. Briand, dissatisfied with the result of the elections, intended to resign as Waldeck-Rousseau did after the elections of 1902. This rumor is now officially denied by the Government organs, which assert that he will face the parliament with all his colleagues on June 1, and that his platform will be practically the same as that which he laid down at Saint Chamond a few months ago. And yet the general opinion is that the Briand ministry will be reconstructed to suit the situation altered by the recent elections. The political axis of the majority has shifted from the Radicals and Radical-

Socialists to the Republicans of the Left and the Moderate Republicans, who come back reinforced and now constitute an influential factor in the coalition on which M. Briand counts. L'Action thus describes the difficulties of the situation: "The moment is at hand, if it is not already come, when we must know if M. Briand's colleagues are ready to help him, without misunderstandings or reserve, in accomplishing the electoral reform, the administrative reform, the financial reform and the syndical reform. These four reforms are essential: they imply a thorough remodelling of government, a new orientation of the republic, a decisive readjustment of parties. Political loyalty requires that the cabinet should not present itself to the chambers without having come to a perfect agreement on immediate action. . . . There are so many points of interrogation clamoring for answers difficult to postpone." Les Nouvelles says: "The elector wants peace and liberty. He is weary of the bondage in which he was held by the petty 'arrondissement' [district] tyrants." The Progrès, a Lyons journal supporting M. Combes, admits frankly that he is beaten. In fact the loss of twenty-one seats by the Radicals and Radical-Socialists proves that the Combist faction is losing its popularity. Evidently M. Briand, if he cares to remain Premier, must lean toward moderate measures and break away from the Socialists of the extreme Left.

Labor Trouble in Germany.—Three weeks ago it was said in the Chronicle that an understanding appeared imminent which would end the long-enduring lockout established against the members of the builders' unions by their employers. Unhappily the expectation was not realized. Just now there is a suggestion that the difficulty may be finally referred to the arbitration of the Department of Home Affairs. The department officials are willing to undertake the task of conciliating the builders and the employees in order to close a conflict which has done immense injury in all the principal cities of the empire. The workmen have already agreed to submit their grievances to arbitration, and it is hoped that the employers as well will recognize the dangers attending a further prolongation of the crisis. It is reported that 200,000 workmen are locked out in the different cities.

German Centre Party Praised.—During the debate on the Prussian Electoral Reform Bill the Centre party was the object of heated attacks. Just recently it has been complimented by a vigorous defense of its policy published in the chief organ of Prussian Conservatism, the Kreuzzeitung. After stating that the Centre has always opposed restriction of the ballot in the empire, this paper goes on to say: "This alone is an evident sign of the genuinely liberal views that sway the party—a liberalism which is completely ignored by those who style themselves the liberals. The Centre party is for them 'the black man.' The fact that all its members are Catholics is reason enough, their enemies affirm, to have the party charged with narrowness and backwardness. A party which counted a Windhorst and Ballestrem among its members can well afford to smile at the charge of narrowness. And as to the charge that the Centre is behind the times, justice obliges one to concede that most of the laws enacted under Bismarck and Bülow, which made for the development and strength of the empire, had the hearty support of the Centre. The so-called Liberals, on the contrary, commonly assumed a merely negative stand in this legislation, contenting themselves with high-sounding, but empty, ineffective talk."

Emperor Francis Joseph in Budapest.—As chronicled last week the reception of the Emperor-King by his Hungarian subjects during his present visit has been singularly cordial. This week he held a review of the troops garrisoned in Budapest and the neighborhood and, as the weather was extremely favorable, an immense throng gathered to witness the spectacle. The enthusiasm with which the venerable monarch was greeted along the line of march was a notable evidence of the regard in which he is held by his impulsive people.

Austria-Hungary's Financial Problem.—During the Emperor's visit a conference was held by the combined ministries of Austria and Hungary under the presidency of Graf von Aehrenthal. In its sessions the preparation of the budget to meet the needs of both lands during the present year was considered. The late Finance Minister of Hungary, Dr. Von Lukacs, made known that he had entered into agreement with a syndicate, headed by the Credit Bank of Hungary, for a loan of one hundred million crowns, to meet the needs of the State until the budget shall have been approved.

Electoral Campaign in Hungary.—It will be a blessed thing to have the June elections over. The reports of disorderly scenes and riotous passages between the partisans of the different leaders continue in the daily news despatches. Hardly a meeting is held during which the service of the police or soldiery is not called for to quell serious outbreaks.

Conference of German and Czech Leaders.—Premier von Bienenrath made another attempt last week to arrange a compromise which shall put an end to the injurious bickerings between the Germans and Bohemians in the Austrian Kingdom. A meeting was held in Vienna, von Bienenrath presiding, at which the leaders of both parties were present in order to discuss the prospects of a general conference of the parties. As was the case last December, the outcome appears to rest with the members of the Slavic Union, who then put forward claims the Germans could not agree to. No doubt the Premier has had some encouragement to prompt this new effort to bring about the peace that is needed for the welfare of the Kingdom and the result of the meeting is awaited with interest.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Sacred Heart an Object of Worship

We all know and love the Sacred Heart. Devotion to it fills our churches and throngs the altar rail. "The first Friday" has become a commonplace among all Catholics. The devotion to the Sacred Heart, therefore, is thoroughly understood in practice by millions who have no idea of the knotty speculative problems it involves.

These cluster round the question: What is the object of the devotion? There have been Catholics who held it to be exclusively Our Lord's redeeming love. The Heart of Jesus, they said, is here but a metaphor to express this great love, just as a great heart, a broad heart, a tender heart, a hard heart express metaphorically qualities in those of whom they are predicated. This position they took through a kind of fear of the Jansenists, the implacable enemies of the devotion, who recognized in it something that would upset all the practical applications of their theological systems to Holy Communion.

It is absolutely certain that the real, physical Heart of Jesus is the immediate object of this devotion. Unless this be so, the revelations to Blessed Margaret Mary become, if not unintelligible, at least unnecessary. Showing her His Heart Our Lord said: "Behold this Heart which has so loved men as to have spared nothing, even to the emptying and the consummating of itself to manifest its love." Here the object of worship and the motive are proposed to us just as in those other words of Our Lord: "God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son; that whosoever believeth in him may not perish, but may have life everlasting." Moreover, the feast Our Lord demanded was to be the feast of the Sacred Heart; the devotions he required were to be directed to console His Heart and to make reparation to it for man's ingratitude; and in one vision Blessed Margaret Mary saw the Heart alone proposed as the object of adoration.

"Yes," said the Jansenists, "the Heart alone. This is just the error of the new devotion." And so in the Synod of Pistoia, which adopted their whole heretical system, they rebuked the adorers of the Sacred Heart because these "do not advert to the fact that the most holy Flesh of Christ or any part of it or His entire Humanity if separated or abstracted from the Divinity cannot be the object of supreme worship." The censure of the Jansenists was based on their abuse of the word alone. They pretended that in the devotion to the Sacred Heart Catholics separate it positively in their minds from the Sacred Humanity of which it is an inseparable part and from the Divinity to which it is indissolubly united. When the Sacred Heart alone was presented to the Blessed Margaret Mary as an object of adoration, it was not to lead her to so impious an act of mental separation but to help her to a more perfect concentration of her faculties upon the Heart of the Saviour. Wherefore Pius VI, in the Bull "Auctorem Fidei," which condemned the whole Synod and noted its errors one after another, says that this particular one is "captious and injurious to the faithful worshippers of the Sacred Heart of Christ, as if these adore the Heart of Jesus separated or abstracted from the Divinity; whereas they adore it as it is, the Heart of Jesus, namely, the Heart of the Person of the Word to which it is inseparably united, just as the bloodless Body of Christ during the three days of death, without separation or abstraction from the Divinity, was adorable in the tomb."

The infallible Vicar of Christ confirms our statement that the real, physical Heart is the object of our adoration, and he explains how it is so. It is an object of supreme worship because it is the Heart of Jesus, united inseparably to the Person of the Word. The briefest reflection shows that when one says: my head aches, all understand him to mean not that his head taken abstractly is suffering, but that he personally suffers in that particular part. When we praise an artist's skilful hand, we praise, not the member exclusively, but the person exercising his skill in that member. So, too, when we adore the loving Heart of Jesus, we adore the Person of the Word made Flesh manifesting his love in his Divine Heart.

How is the love of the God-Man manifested in his Heart? The older theologians of the devotion following the notions of their day said plainly that the Heart of Jesus is the object of adoration, inasmuch as it is the organ of His redeeming love. The expression is objectionable. This love is chiefly an act of the will, and as for the sensitive affections involved in it, one cannot say the heart is their organ. To obviate this difficulty others called the Divine Heart, the seat of redeeming love. This was no improvement, since in this matter seat and organ must mean much the same. But all this involves physiology. Hence when in 1765 Clement XIII approved the Mass and Office of the Sacred Heart he stated their object to be "to renew symbolically the memory of that divine love by which the only begotten Son of God took human nature, and becoming obedient even unto death gave himself to men an example to be imitated of meekness and humbleness of heart." The term symbol has since been practically consecrated by pontifical usage. We say therefore the object of the devotion is, the Sacred Heart of Jesus, inasmuch as it is the symbol of his redeeming love. In this the real Heart of flesh is the immediate object of adoration: the principal object is the love of Jesus redeeming mankind.

Some find the word, symbol, too weak. However, one must remember that among symbols there are degrees, the higher being connected much more intimately with the things symbolized than the lower. Two hearts tied together with a true-lover's knot, the joining of two hands, the use of one name, all symbolize the union in love of husband and wife, and each approaches more closely than its predecessor to what is symbolized. The close embrace from which they have to tear themselves when some temporary separation impends, is also a symbol of that love, but much more intimately connected with it and therefore much nobler as a symbol. Moreover, this too must be noted, that while everybody recognizes the intimate connection between love and the movements of the inflamed heart, the nature of this connection is one of the mysteries of our compound nature. Organ, seat, symbol are words halting because of the mystery, but expressing as far as this is expressible, an idea really the same in the minds of all, whether theologians or pontiffs, preachers or hearers, who are true adorers of the Sacred Heart. HENRY WOODS, S.J.

This Year's Eucharistic Congress

The Eucharistic Congress, the Canadian event of the year, which is to take place next September is already engaging the attention of Catholic Montreal entire, and it may be said of the whole of Canada. It is, of course, an unspeakable honor for the Metropolis of the North, and for the Dominion, to be chosen for this assemblage, but as Archbishop Bruchési declared at the Congress of London, "Canada has a right to the honor because it is a Eucharistic country." And so it has always been, from the memorable Feast of Pentecost, 1535, when Jacques Cartier and his brave band of explorers attended High Mass and received Holy Communion, before setting out for the discovery of the St. Lawrence, Montreal in particular has had a notable part in the reverence paid to the Eucharistic God. On the very birthday of its existence when Maisonneuve and his followers set foot on what was then a thickly-wooded island, Mass was said at a temporary altar by Father Vimont, the Jesuit Superior, and the Blessed Sacrament was exposed for the rest of that day. It became the custom, too, with the valiant and truly Christian founders of the settlement, when the attacks of the dreaded foe, the Iroquois, became unusually pressing, to have exposition of the Blessed Sacrament in the little wooden church within the enclosure of the fort.

When Villemarie and the other colonies of New France were threatened with annihilation by the same savage foe, seventeen young men, under command of the immortal Dollard, set forth to oppose the combined forces of the Five Nations, after having first received Holy Communion and offered up their lives for the salvation of the country. Even the official seal of the Seigneurie of Montreal, used by the priests of St. Sulpice, represented the Evangelist St. John giving Communion to the Mother of God, and bore a Latin inscription, "The Virgin Disciple giving to the Virgin, in Communion, Jesus, the purity of Virgins."

Since this devotion runs like a luminous thread through the annals of French Canada and specially of Montreal, the providential colony, it seems fitting that such a choice should have been made for the Congress. The celebration is, however, a stupendous undertaking, which only the zeal, energy and enlightened action of the eminent churchman who wears the mitre in Montreal, and the generous concurrence of the civic authorities and of the faithful, can bring to a successful conclusion.

Preparations may be said to have begun in earnest when in February last a cablegram was received from Mgr. Heylen, of Namur, permanent president of the Eucharistic Committee, then in Rome, saying that His Holiness had named Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli as Legate of the Holy See to the Canadian Congress. Committees were then formed, both of men and women, for the systematic division of work, the collecting of subscriptions, the making of altar linen, the providing of flowers and other decorations for the altar. The clergy in general, the religious communities, the Church wardens, the Catholic and national societies came forward with offers of cooperation. Apart from the large donations of the wealthy and the well-to-do, a general collection was ordered, it being expressly stipulated that the pennies of the poor and of children should be welcomed so that the greeting to the King might be truly a national act of faith. With regard to the flowers, which will be required in immense quantities, the Canadian Messenger suggests that the Promoters and Associates of the League make the work their own, and supply the "tons of flowers" that will be required upon that momentous occasion. Nor is the idea in the slightest degree far fetched or difficult of accomplishment, since, as may be remembered, during the London Congress, sixty thousand bouquets of flowers were sent across the British Channel from France, where, despite the dead ashes of unbelief, there is so often manifested the hidden glow of faith.

In Montreal, which is of course, the chief centre of action, it may truly be said, that every one is doing something great or small towards the grand total of endeavor. The most prominent Catholic women of the city hold meetings at their houses and have organized bands for the preparation of altar linen and other necessities for the altar, while men are busy in a variety of ways. Spiritual offerings are being made by the faithful in general and the religious societies in particular. The interest is universal, the enthusiasm unbounded.

Throughout Canada prayers are being offered up in every diocese for the success of the Congress. In Montreal, Quebec and Alberta, the priests recite after Mass the prayer to the Blessed Sacrament. An indulgenced prayer recommended by the Archbishop of Montreal has been distributed for recitation in families and communities. There is also a movement to establish in remote and isolated parishes the association for the promotion of frequent Communion and visits to Our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament. In fact, it is evident that the spiritual growth, the new fervor and right understanding of the sublimest of all gifts to man, which are the ultimate aims of the magnificent demonstration, are being realized to the fullest.

Various dioceses are already conspicuous in their offers of cooperation. From St. Albert's in the far Northwest come, through the intermediary of Bishop Legal, tidings of the proposed offering, which is full of poetic beauty and symbolism. In memory of the God who has fructified their harvests and has hidden his splendor under the veil which is formed from the wheat, the farmers of Alberta, during the coming harvest, propose to gather their finest ears of wheat, from which shall be formed for the procession in Montreal a splendid arch. Standing out from a golden background of the ripened grain, on its summit, the words, "Homage from the Catholics of Alberta" will be formed by bunches of real grapes. After the procession, these ears of wheat shall be ground and sent to a community to be employed in the making of altar-breads.

His grace Archbishop Langevin of St. Boniface, and Mgr. Legal of St. Albert, have issued pastorals, asking prayers for the success of the event. A similar request was made in the Archdiocese of Quebec. In the beautiful pastoral of Mgr. Emard of Valleyfield, the reasons why the whole country should participate in the coming festivities are thus given. "The time is come when in the designs of Providence, we in this fair country of Canada, should enjoy the happiness and become the recipients of the incomparable spiritual advantages which flow from the holding of an International Eucharistic Congress. And it is easy to see what conclusion may be drawn from that assemblage, and how that supreme manifestation, the Procession of the Blessed Sacrament, shall redound to the triumph of the Eucharistic God, who is thus acclaimed as the undisputed King of the whole people. God shall be glorified in the Eucharist which is at once the greatest of sacraments and as a sacrifice the principal and essential act of the religion of Jesus Christ."

From the United States, the warmest words of encouragement have also been received. In accepting the invitation to attend the Congress, Cardinal Gibbons says: "I beg to assure your Grace that it will be for me, not only a pleasure, but also a duty, to be present at such a solemn event. I recall the pleasure which I felt at the Eucharistic Congress of London, when it was decided to hold the Congress of 1910 in Montreal, and indeed no better selection could have been made, for I feel that Montreal is the ideal city of the North American Continent, to hold a Eucharistic Congress, by reason of the Catholic spirit and sentiment of the people."

Amongst the distinguished visitors to the celebration, will be their Graces Archbishop Farley of New York, O'Connell of Boston, Ireland of St. Paul, and Bishop Maes of Covington, Ky., who is the President of the Eucharistic Committee. From England and the Continents besides Bishop Heylen of Namur, Permanent President of the Congress, there will be among others the Archbishop of Westminster, and Bishop Touchet of Orleans, France. One deputation of English Lay Catholics, will be headed by the Duke of Norfolk; another will be composed of English workingmen. From France and Belgium and other parts of the Continent so many are expected to attend that the General Council of Pilgrimages have organized a round trip to Canada and the United States, leaving Liverpool on the 26th of August. A like arrangement has been made at Milan, Italy, to facilitate the transport of pilgrims from overseas to the Congress. It is believed that the concourse of visitors from all parts of Canada and the United States, will be very considerable, and that many societies will attend in a body or send delegates.

The Congress itself, and the accompanying celebrations will be of the most imposing character. Amongst the orators announced whose names are most familiar on this side of the water, will be Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop O'Connell and Archbishop Ireland. Papers of the greatest interest and value will be read at the various sessions, which will include one session entirely for the clergy; one for the laymen, during which their various needs and their apostolate will be considered; one for women which will treat of subjects pertinent to the sex, and one for youth, wherein education and similar topics will be considered. There will be innumerable Masses, many of them Pontifical, in all the churches, including the splendid pageant of Midnight Mass at historic Notre Dame, and Pontifical Mass in the open air at the foot of Mount Royal. There will be grand Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament every day. The entire city will be illuminated. But the supreme act of the demonstration will be the procession, through the streets of the city, which will be literally paved with flowers. The music during its course will be of a popular character, to enable as many as possible to lend their voices to the triumphal strain, and the Legate of the Holy See will carry the Sacred Host. It will be, in fine, such a religious demonstration as has never been seen and perhaps never may be seen again on this side of the water.

The chief centres of the celebration will be the Cathedral, Notre Dame, the Church of the Blessed Sacrament and St. Patrick's, the mother church of the Irish in Montreal, where, through the energy and initiative of the pastor, the Rev. Gerald McShane, preparations on a large scale are already begun. A. T. SADLER.

Social Work Among the Young*

City life is in a pronounced sense artificial. The spirit of organization which called the town meeting into being has so entered into every phase of existence in our large centres of population that officialism makes itself felt in affairs, public and private, in amusement as well as in toil. Our materialistic age which sees its supreme good exclusively in what can be weighed or measured or counted has developed a form of city life which is so foreign to man's normal traits that it has transformed him from an earnest, self-possessed worker with mind, heart and conscience, into a high-pressure machine that thinks and talks but does not know deference, feeling, love. The blight of industrialism has deadened the finer sensibilities of the dweller in the city.

If eagerness for gain has built up great workshops where armies of human beings toil shoulder to shoulder in the nerve-racking whirr and buzz and groan of struggling engines, pulleys and chains, a similar greed has reared near those factories the many amusement places which are keyed to gratify the unstrung nerves of the toilers. The evil is grievous enough for those who have grown to manhood under more peaceful conditions, but the greatest harm is done to the young who from tender childhood have known nothing but the noise and feverish haste by day, and more noise and more feverish haste in the glare of night turned into day. To these Miss Addams has devoted her life. On her initiative a great work has been built up. Although she has been the recipient of much adverse criticism, we do not recall now any assertion to the effect that there was no call for her strenuous labor in behalf of the young in our cities; nor are we aware that she has used unfair means to lure the particular objects of her solicitude away from other similar institutions which might possibly offer a better, because fuller, solution of the tremendous problem.

Working with inferior tools, because she knew of the existence of none better, she has had her measure of success and has done her share of good. Before belittling her work, it would be more to the purpose to offer something better. We regret that she does not avail herself of the one most efficient means to remedy the evils that all deplore, but we think that she is putting to good use the means that she recognizes as helpful.

As star differeth from star in glory, so our great cities seem to vary in their degree of civic righteousness and their love of respectability; but we think that all are now on the alert in keeping a sharp eye on cheap amusement places. After the monotonous drudgery of specialized work, the young, like the pendulum, swing in the other direction, the result being that they feverishly drink in the nonsense to which a nickel admits them for an hour. Jealousy, revenge, robbery, murder, the defeat of justice—these, and other features even more reprehensible, in cheap shows have induced the authorities of Denver, Colorado, which can hardly be called a puritanical city, to subject to inspection the films that are to be reeled off for the diversion and artistic education of Denver youth.

Secretary Wilson of the Department of Agriculture has warned the public against certain mischievous "soft drinks" which appeal to the already disordered nerves of the young and while harming their bodily health dispose them to vicious habits. Some of these drinks, such as Celery Cola, Café-Coca and Pillsbury's Koke, have led to the prosecution and conviction of their manufacturers on account of the deadly nature of the ingredients.

"All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," although old, is not an antiquated sentiment. There must be amusement for the young. The recognition of this principle and its steady, practical application are the secret of Don Bosco's phenomenal success with the flotsam and jetsam of Turin, although at the outset his work of the "festive oratories" with field days and picnics and athletics smacked so strongly of innovation that some moss-grown minds thought that he was not entirely in his wits.

A rigid family discipline, therefore, where such is still maintained, must necessarily defeat its own object if there be no provision for healthy, wholesome relaxation. Once we saw some youngsters making a brave attempt to play "knock up and catch" on a New York side-street. Carriage horses came prancing by; peddlers and push-carts and stealthy automobiles were not wanting. "Aren't you afraid of being run over?" A little chap missed a "fly" in order to doff his cap, and answered, "Sometimes it gets runned over and busted." No thought of arms and legs (a public hospital was near) but only of their plaything!

A French curé informed us that he was simply heart-broken over the transformation that the boys of his parish underwent after leaving school and beginning the struggle for bread, for many who had been models at home and in school speedily became veritable young demons in the excess of their waywardness and evil conduct. And a recent leader in El Pueblo, an influential paper of Buenos Aires, comments sadly on the change for the worse that comes over many boys in the Argentine capital after school days which were favored with every temporal and spiritual advantage. In the United States, we may well join in the chorus of lamentation, for our experience is not different. What is needed is a method of influencing boys efficaciously during the years when they are neither children nor men, when they are not under the restraints of school life nor controlled by the canons of conduct recognized by respectable adults.

As solitary confinement and enforced inaction are enough to drive a mature mind to madness, so the monotony of humdrum routine labor or idleness seems to nerve a boy for any foolhardy or even desperate endeavor. It is with occupation as with food: unvarying sameness begets weariness of soul, and develops a hankering after what is far less wholesome but much more novel, and alluring in proportion to its novelty.

The atmosphere of the modern city is not the ideal atmosphere for the healthy and normal development of the young. It seems to be against correctness of speech to apply the word "home" to the series of caverns which a family may occupy in a mountain-like building where scores of other families suffer similar privations; but even if the faithful, God-fearing parents are jealously careful of their children, it still remains true that the welfare of the commonwealth demands more than they can do for their young. Constant repression has accomplished prodigies in horticulture, as we see, for example, in the diminutive evergreen which Japanese skill has cultivated for half a century and yet has kept confined to a common flower pot. Such repression might be practised upon the young and, very possibly, might be attended with similar results, as was the custom three centuries ago, when children were horribly dwarfed and stunted, to become later on an attraction at some nabob's court.

But the most potent factor, and the one of which our esteemed social worker can make the least use, is the religious sense, or conscience. Children may be coaxed or wheedled up to a certain point, but when that point is reached there is a crisis to meet which fair words and neutral-tinted advice are helpless. "Hear, O Israel!" Thus spake the prophets. If the religious sense is utterly dead, the warning cry may fall on hopelessly deaf ears, but the reason for this is that while conscience was able to answer, there was none to call out to it.

The safe and sure way of incurring no loss to our Church membership through the activity of State institutions is to prevent our young Catholics from entering them. This is what Father Dunne is doing in St. Louis. The safe and sure way of avoiding loss through non-Catholic settlement work is to have similar work under Catholic auspices. Heroism is a glorious trait, but it is not universal among either children or adults. Trusting that they will lose nothing and hoping to gain something, they take a risk which may wean them from the Church, but in their simplicity or ignorance they think that the gain warrants the risk, for they have no way to secure the gain without the risk. The Spirit of Antagonism and a Modern Orator*

The best speech is a duel. The orator has before him in reality or in imagination an antagonist with whom he grapples. Demosthenes who learned the art from his teacher, Isæus, was the prince of oratorical duellists. He never lets slip from him his audience or his antagonist. Drop Æschines from the Crown speech and you may make of it a brief history of a certain period of Greece, but you make it a lifeless corpse. Cicero felt that his audiences called for less intensity of concentration upon him and he indulged in digressions and discussions of general topics that Demosthenes would dismiss in a sentence or phrase, but Cicero is too great a writer to be summed up in a formula. He too felt the spell of an antagonist and knew how to respond to it. Harmony, balance, the prolonged pomp of periods are not the complete description of Rome's great orator. Mark him when he meets an antagonist. He quickly drops the brilliancy and pomp and resorts to the parry and thrust, with as much skill as his Athenian rival. His refutations are quite the opposite to what passes usually for Ciceronian. The first part of his speech for Archias is altogether unlike the latter part. His speech for Ligarius, his Philippics might be called un-Ciceronian, they are so modern. The truth is most people remember Cicero by some opening periods rather than by the passages and speeches where he faces and fights an antagonist.

The value of an antagonist to bring a speech out of the vagueness of an essay into the sharp definiteness of a debate is very well illustrated in the speeches of Mr. Bryan, which have just been published. From the Biographical Sketch, written by his wife, which forms a most interesting introduction to the volumes, we learn that Mr. Bryan began early to contest for prizes. In fact it was only on his fourth attempt that he succeeded in getting into first place. Was the child father to the man in this case, or has the habit of losing, which he acquired so early, grown worse? Besides taking part in these literary contests, he was diligent in debate. Debate was his favorite means in his political campaigns. His first and most successful campaign for Congress was marked by eleven debates with his opponent. His astonishing success in a normally Republican district must have been due in no small measure to these debates. His opponents were induced to enter into debates on other occasions but, taught no doubt by experience, the meetings were fewer. Mr. Bryan has the greatest respect for debating. In the latest speech published in these volumes and in some respects the most interesting, he treats Lincoln as an orator. The speech derives its interest not from the subject only but because it gives us Mr. Bryan's ideal of an orator and as we should naturally expect, the traits which appeal to him in Lincoln are principally the traits we find in himself. Lincoln's debates with Douglas are properly emphasized by Mr. Bryan, as the first step to the presidency. "No other American President has ever so clearly owed his elevation to his oratory." A perusal of Mr. Bryan's speeches convinces us that had his opponents for the President's office met him on the field of debate, he would not now be under the cloud of that dark disgrace in American eyes of having made three attempts and failed. The baseball analogy is too much for the average American for whom the only original sin is failure.

The speeches of Mr. Bryan afford an opportunity to exemplify and test the effects of the principle of antagonism in oratory. They fall short even in their best portions of the fiery directness of Wendell Phillips, who fairly revelled in antagonism and seemed even to seek it in the way he flew in the face of all lessons of rhetoric and goaded his audience into fury against him in the very beginning of his speech, only to triumph the more surely at the close. But although Mr. Bryan is not as antagonistic as Phillips, yet his words and ideas respond to the thrill of antagonism. The examples of grappling are all the more striking by contrast with speeches where there is little or no such directness and intensity.

Mr. Bryan had courage to print his valedictory speech, given at graduation. It is decidedly sophomoric. There is no opponent in sight anywhere. The subject is Character, and the treatment is just as vague. No one could by any possibility disagree with the usual collection of platitudes ending up in the stream of tears customary on such occasions. The speech is no better than hundreds such which will be heard within a month. Complimentary speeches at banquets are not antagonistic. One such, entitled, "Radical and Conservative," is found in this collection. It follows the usual formula; a modest disclaimer of praise, a witticism at the expense of the presiding officer, a discussion of some general truth, closing with roseate views of the future. Mr. Bryan was then among Japanese in Japan, and there was no place for antagonism at a complimentary banquet.

These and other such speeches have parts which glow, but rarely burst into flame, or if they flare with the brightness of sheet-lightning, they fail to condense into the quivering lines that have the flash of death in their leap. The sting of rivalry is needed to bring ideas into sharp focus; and the heart to fever. Then thoughts are too insistent for utterance to be even winged; they explode into swift bullets. There is the enemy with his eyes upon yours, and language itself cannot be calm. It breaks up into questions and exclamations and brief, pointed phrases. It would become sword-points to pierce the rival. The retort, the sharp contrasts, the scornful reechoing of an opponent's phrase, above all the dilemma where the oratorical duellist grapples with both hands, these are the characteristics of the famous battles of the brain; these may be found in Mr. Bryan's best speeches in this collection.

Many parts of the speech on the Tariff have this quality. Such too are some shorter refutations, as "The Omnivorous West," "Dreamers" and that address called "Commerce," which was given on the historic occasion when a short while before election Mr. Bryan and Mr. Taft met at the same banquet in Chicago. The antagonism is suppressed by politeness, but it tingles there nevertheless. Better examples still are found in "The Trust Question," "Imperialism," "Naboth's Vineyard." In these the elocutionist will find that fiery selection he delights in or he will turn to "America's Mission," which for its length has perhaps the most fire and blood of any of the speeches. Compare the epigrams and historical examples and contrasts in this speech with the things which pass for such in the speech on "Character." The latter are warmed over from books; the former are the hot coinage of the heart.

Yet all things considered, although its famous triumph prejudices one in its favor, the well-known speech at the Chicago Convention of 1896 should be noted as perhaps the crowning instance of the power of antagonism. The best that can be said of it is that it showed the speaker worthy of the effect it helped to produce and drew from his enemies the retort of abuse and misrepresentation, tacit acknowledgments of its power. We venture this criticism and believe it to be true even if the cause Mr. Bryan defended was shown to be wrong. It was not so believed to be then and Mr. Bryan, who admits that changed conditions have now modified his views, was sincere in defending the cause of silver and shown to be masterful in carrying the wavering convention with him. The fight for silver had been long waged and silver and gold delegates sat in convention with the tense antagonism of drawn battle lines. The following passage should soften any heart except one of gold:

"Ah, my friends, we say not one word against those who live upon the Atlantic Coast, but the hardy pioneers who have braved all the dangers of the wilderness, who have made the desert to blossom as the rose—the pioneers away out there (pointing to the west), who rear their children near to Nature's heart, where they can mingle their voices with the voices of the birds, out there where they have erected schoolhouses for the education of their young, churches where they praise their Creator, and cemeteries where rest the ashes of their dead—these people, we say, are as deserving of the consideration of our party as any people in this country. It is for these that we speak. We do not come as aggressors. Our war is not a war of conquest; we are fighting in defense of our homes, our families and posterity. We have petitioned and our petitions have been scorned; we have entreated, and our entreaties have been disregarded; we have begged, and they have mocked when our calamity came. We beg on longer; we entreat no more; we petition no more. We defy them."

There are many splendid passages of contrast in these volumes; in "America's Mission," between Anglo-Saxon and American civilization; in "Imperialism," between Republicans now and formerly, between the policy of imperialism and monarchy; in "The Trust Question," between monopoly and competition and between law and conscience. Such lively contrasts seem to transfer the spirit of antagonism into the body of the speech.

For the scornful echoing of a passage in vigorous refutation we may refer to "The Trust Question," where a statement of Mr. Taft accusing Mr. Bryan of extirpating and destroying the entire business in order to stamp out the evils, is refuted. "Extirpate and destroy" echoes through a long refutation like Antony's "honorable men." The same speech gives examples of the dilemma and the retort, sharp weapons of antagonistic speeches.

We feel that to study Mr. Bryan's speeches in this way is to do them an injustice; because many of his fine lectures are passed over without a word and because even in the matter of style only a partial view is given. Besides Mr. Bryan will be impatient to be treated in this fashion. It may give people the notion that he strives for the graces of style, which he never seems to do. His doctrine and teaching is supreme for him, as it is for every orator, and there is scarcely a question of public life before the country during the past quarter of a century which is not discussed clearly and convincingly in Mr. Bryan's volumes. No style would be of avail without the solidity of true teaching. Yet on the other hand true teaching is shorn of much of its strength without strong and vigorous presentation, and some of Mr. Bryan's speeches deserve to live even after the questions they answer are antiquated.

In conclusion we may be permitted to say one word of supreme satisfaction with Mr. Bryan's speeches. Our country may well be proud of one whose printed words are such clear and outspoken professions of Christianity. Mr. Bryan's father was deeply religious, and Mr. Bryan gives evidence of a like trait, not only in his ethical teaching, which is solid, with but one or two slight exceptions, despite what newspapers have tried to make him out to be; not only in his quotation of scripture, fearlessly and frequently, especially at the close of a vigorous passage or at the end of a speech, a practice which he sometimes perhaps abuses; not only is it for these reasons that his speeches are Christian, but most of all because he freely and courageously champions the common truths of Christianity. When one thinks of some European countries where the name of God may not be even mentioned in public, it is deeply gratifying to read the speeches of Mr. Bryan and to know that he has advocated Christian truths and Christian morality more openly on many an occasion than even a clergyman would do.

The Servant Girl Problem

I

In a previous article in AMERICA, I discussed in brief the preventive activity of the International Catholic Girls' Protection Society. My object was to show what the society is doing to prevent the working girl from falling into the clutches of the libertine and the White Slave trafficker, by making them acquainted with the dangers of the great city, by securing good situations for them, by protecting them on the journey and by furnishing them with the means of wholesome mental and bodily recreation. In the present article I shall treat of the Protection Society and the Servant Girl Problem.

Some time ago the Koelnische Volkszeitung published a little article entitled "An Examination of Conscience." The writer is a lady prominent in city charity work and one of the most active members of the Girls' Protective Society.

"It is related," she says, "that the father-confessor of a certain sovereign once said: 'You are solicitous about your personal duties. Are you sufficiently mindful of your duties as sovereign? How is it with regard to morality in your kingdom? Are you sufficiently informed and watchful? Are you energetic enough? Do you think that your examination of conscience should cover only your own faults.'

"We housewives also have a kingdom which we rule as queens and which we must administer with due vigilance and energy in order to secure the well-being of all our subjects. Is it asking too much of us to put ourselves in all earnestness the question: 'How should you wish the lady of the house to act towards your daughter if she were poor and obliged to earn her bread as a servant-girl?'"

The further queries put by the writer may be classified under three heads, the gist of the servant-girl problem: Lodging, dismissal and treatment.

(a) In spite of wholesome legislation, great abuses in the matter of proper lodging for servant-girls are justly complained of in all the civilized countries of the world. In the large apartment houses the servants are generally huddled together in the attic or mansard, where they are under no surveillance and may communicate freely with each other and the outer world at all hours of the night. Even the steadiest girl will yield to the temptation thus thrust upon her. Last winter, in a certain large city, a servant-girl was wanted to go on an urgent errand for a dying person, but not one of the eight girls supposed to be sleeping in the attic was at home at one o'clock in the morning. It is just as likely as not that the ladies of the house in question belong to a society for the amelioration of demoralizing conditions in the tenement districts. "My good woman," you can hear them say to the mother of a large family crowded into a two-room shack, "clothe your daughter less expensively, and provide a proper sleeping place for her."

And then the permission accorded so frequently of being out late at night. Police records show that immorality amongst servant-girls has increased in proportion as they have been permitted to be abroad till ten o'clock and later at night. It is true, many girls make the granting of this privilege a condition sine qua non of their accepting a proffered situation. Concerted action on the part of the employers would soon put an end to this abuse. Can any conscientious woman say: "It is no concern of mine what the hired girl does at night?" The family of the girl is not able to protect her, to watch over her youth and inexperience; the mother certainly believes that her child has found, if not a second mother, at least a protectress. That the lady of the house must be doubly vigilant if she keeps "boarders" or "lodgers," is self-evident.

(b) And the sudden dismissals? Are they always justified? And even if they are in strict accord with the letter of the law, are they stamped with the stamp of prudence and charity? A sudden dismissal is in many cases equivalent to throwing the girl into the very arms of danger—into the company of doubtful companions, into the clutches of human birds of prey. The faults and crimes which are generally visited with sudden dismissal—company keeping, stealing, dishonesty—are just the ones that will lead the girl to her ruin if thrown on her own resources.

The door that is shut on the dismissed, disgraced and embittered girl—how harsh and inhuman is its bang! It seems to echo the thoughts of the woman's heart behind it—"Am I my brother's keeper?" This same woman will be very careful not to let her own daughter roam about the city alone at all hours, or pass the night untended in a hotel or lodging-house, or undertake a long journey without previous anxious preparation.

A girl who has lost a good situation through her own fault will perhaps be ashamed to tell her parents; she prefers to wait until she has secured another equally good place. In the meantime, with her whole fortune in her hand-satchel, she takes refuge in a lodging-house or with a girl friend, and as long as her money lasts things are well enough with her. But her tiny earnings are soon spent. She must find employment. Ill-advised, helpless, hopeless, she only too often falls into the hands of unscrupulous employment agents, who, divining her desperate plight, turn it to account for their own nefarious purposes. Months after, perhaps, her parents come to the police-station only to learn that that has happened which they would have given all the world to have prevented.

The Girls' Protection Society tries to remedy these evils in three ways: first, by refusing to secure situations for servant-girls except in families where they have good reason to suppose that the lady of the house will take a real motherly interest in them; secondly, by appealing to all employers, in season and out of season, in newspapers, in pamphlets, in lectures, never to dismiss the hired girl without previously notifying her parents or guardians or the nearest branch of the Protection Society; thirdly, by inducing as many ladies as possible to take an active interest in the Protection Society and other similar organizations; for none are better fitted to work intelligently and successfully for the moral and social well-being of servant-girls than the women who employ them. They are the ideal "confidential agents" of the Society, as has been shown in Munich, where there are two Servant-Girl Unions (called Dienstboten-Lehrmaedchen—apprentice servant-girls). Able and energetic ladies of all ranks act as employment agents, and a kind of indenture is signed by the servant-girl and her employer; the employer engages to instruct the girl in different branches of domestic science for a specified period and as long as the course lasts the girl receives somewhat smaller wages. If for one reason or another it becomes advisable or necessary to dissolve the agreement, recourse is had to the employment bureau. Experience has proved that a change of service is to the advantage of both parties in most cases. The apprentice system is on trial in several other cities of Germany and similar good results are reported as in Munich. An attempt recently made in Berlin to bring employers and employees together in common unions proved abortive. In England the National Service Union, composed of the Domestic Helpers' Union and the Federation of Housewives, has met with more success.

(c) But the solution of the servant-girl problem does not depend so much on the solution of questions relating to lodging and dismissal—both can be more or less satisfactorily dealt with by legislation and organization—as on the establishment of proper relations between the servant and the members of the family in which she is employed.

"Many people," says Oberdoerffer, in his excellent little work, "Die christliche Frau und ihr Dienstmaedchen," "understand by the servant-girl question only the question how and where girls can be found, who will do the greatest amount of work for the least wages, display extraordinary self-denial on all occasions, and bear harsh treatment with willing submission. A servant-girl problem in this sense cannot be solved."

The recent decree on wearing a medal as representing the scapulars sprung from a petition of Father Albert Missone, procurator of the Scheut missionaries in Belgian Congo, in favor of our colored brethren in that distant land. He noticed that the scapular which they wore as a sign of their faith quickly became so soiled or torn while they were working in their primitive dress as porters or were journeying about that it presented anything but an inviting appearance. Then there came to him the thought of the substitution of a medal, which resulted in the present legislation.

There are so many worthy objects which appeal to the charitably disposed and our people are so ready to answer a call for assistance that impostors of all kinds reap a rich harvest while deserving institutions often remain crippled in their work. Priest, seminarian, brother and nun are words that appeal to our Catholic sense and our pockets, as frauds and tricksters have found out, to their great temporal advantage. At least one clever swindler posed successfully for a time as a Catholic bishop and profited accordingly. Too often our priests and religious have to become honorary members of the mendicant orders and literally beg from door to door for the charitable institutions which depend upon the public bounty for their existence; but in every case of the kind, these solicitors for God's poor and afflicted carry with them the necessary authorization in the form of signed and sealed credentials. And the invariable rule should be to extend no bounty in favor of those who fail to show such credentials. Our good people cannot guard themselves too carefully against hurting worthy institutions by blindly contributing towards the enrichment of any impostor who uses the priestly name or the religious garb as a means for cloaking iniquity and robbing the public.

CORRESPONDENCE

King Edward and His Catholic Subjects

LONDON, MAY 7, 1910.

The death of King Edward VII seemed to come with startling suddenness only because there had been for a long time a courtly conspiracy of silence as to the real state of his health. For at least a year it had caused grave anxiety to his medical advisers. There was a marked tendency to a condition of the lungs that made breathing difficult. The frequent visits to the Continent and to the seaside at Brighton were efforts to obtain some improvement. The last journey to Biarritz was very unfortunate. While the King was there, instead of spring weather there was a local cold snap that made the place absolutely wintry while the south of England was enjoying an unexpected foretaste of summer.

The cable will already have informed you of the widespread grief caused by his death. It is the custom to say that kings are regretted by their subjects, but in this case there is no need of having recourse to the usual polite fictions. There was a time when men looked forward with anxiety to his accession, and feared that his influence would not tend to good. But his reign of nine years has caused all earlier errors to be forgotten. He worked for peace at home and abroad; he drew England out of a dangerous isolation; he was to a great extent his own Foreign Minister, governing as well as reigning, and in home affairs he exerted a moderating influence on party warfare. His loss at a moment when a great constitutional conflict is developing is a misfortune to the country.

One may well doubt if he had any very definite religious views. His father's religion was an enlightened philanthropy linked with a strong sense of duty. King Edward, both as Prince of Wales and as king was ever ready to use his influence in favor of charitable and philanthropic work. He was a kindly man with no trace of the old-fashioned idea that the "common people" were a separate race of beings. There was nothing narrow about him, and though he was the official head of British Protestantism he had a real respect for the Catholic Church and had many Catholic friends. It was noticed at his coronation that when he was required to make the offensive test declaration against the most characteristic of Catholic dogmas he mumbled the words rapidly in a low voice so that they were almost inaudible. He scandalized the bigots of Protestantism by being present at Mass on state occasions at Marienbad, and in other Catholic places when he was on the Continent, and in London at the requiem for the late King of Portugal. During his last stay at Biarritz a few weeks ago he visited Lourdes and as the procession of the Blessed Sacrament passed by stood bare-headed and with bowed head, not, of course, as a believer, but as one who paid reverence to a great act of Christian worship.

A few years ago he actually was at Mass in Buckingham Palace. Nothing was heard of the incident at the time, and it was only part of a kindly act to one of his old servants who was dying. The man was a Catholic, and when it was found that he was in danger of death the King himself asked the Archbishop of Westminster to arrange for the sick man receiving the last Sacraments and, perhaps because in the Established Church, when the "Lord's Supper" is given to the sick, there is a "Communion service" by the bedside, he asked if Mass could not be celebrated in the sick room. So an improvised altar was set up and the King and Queen were both present at the Mass, said for the first time for centuries in a royal palace in England.

Before the Eucharistic Congress of 1908, he was asked unofficially if he saw any objection to the proposed procession of the Blessed Sacrament in the streets of Westminster. He replied that if the Catholics wished for it he hoped they would have it. It was not the King, but his minister, Mr. Asquith, who at the last moment yielded to the intolerant outcry of a handful of noisy bigots.

Another evidence of his friendly interest in the ideals of his Catholic subjects was his visit to Loyola during his stay at Biarritz last summer. The late Cardinal Manning was one of his valued friends. They had been brought into frequent communication when, while the King was still Prince of Wales, he was the President of a Royal Commission to enquire into the housing of the working classes, and the Cardinal was one of its members.

In Ireland he was always welcome. There was no question of party when the King was concerned, and it was well known that as Prince of Wales in the days of the Land War under Parnell he had gone out of his way to show his sympathy with Irishmen who had been imprisoned for their defence of the popular cause. On a visit to the House of Commons he more than once asked to have some of these "ex-convicts" presented to him. For the first time for centuries, perhaps for the first time in history, the death of an English sovereign will cause widespread regret in Ireland.

For the reign of King George V one can only hope for the best. The new King is not a strong man either physically or otherwise. He was a zealous naval officer during his time of training afloat as a young man, though he could never get over a tendency to seasickness. He is of a nervous temperament and has no personal influence. Rumor says that he and his cousin, the German Emperor, are anything but friends. There is nothing to lead one to expect that he will be able to take his father's place as crowned diplomatist who did so much to keep peace in Europe, or as the tactful moderator of party conflicts at home in England.

Jeanne d'Arc's Feast Day

PARIS, MAY 9, 1910.

For weeks before May 8 the feast of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc, the French bishops seized every opportunity of impressing upon their flock the duty of celebrating the fête of their national heroine with due honor. Mgr. Touchet, Bishop of Orléans, aptly pointed out that this year the feast fell upon the exact anniversary of the deliverance of their city; he added that it was the citizens of Orléans who through years of oblivion, neglect and calumny, preserved the tradition of her holiness and, unlike many of their countrymen, never wavered in their belief in her heavenly mission. It is owing, he said, to the historians of Orléans and to the deeply-rooted traditions of its inhabitants that the memory of the heroine, forgotten by medieval writers and disfigured by modern sceptics, has been handed down in all its simplicity, purity and grandeur.

The fêtes at Orléans were, this year, somewhat marred by the weather. However, on May 6, the traditional ceremony took place: the mayor placed the maid's standard in the hands of the bishop, who stood on the threshold of the cathedral. In spite of the ill-will of the Government, this ceremony continues as before to excite much enthusiasm. Replying to the mayor's address, Mgr. Touchet regretted that the army should now be prohibited from joining the Church to honor the national heroine, adding that when he spoke thus he expressed his feelings as a Frenchman as well as a bishop. The next day, M. l'abbé Gaudeau preached Jeanne's panegyric. He drew a comparison between the material perils of the France that Jeanne helped to deliver and the perils that, at the present time, threaten its very existence as a Catholic nation; concluding that the Blessed Maid must again be called upon to save her country!

The procession then took place, but it was less numerous than usual. The municipal Council took part in it, but the civil and local societies and associations kept aloof, while the army had a separate military function in the afternoon. "One freely realized the want of union that exists," says a newspaper reporter. By its narrow sectarian prejudices, the Government has shorn a unique celebration of its picturesqueness and originality, besides inflicting a gratuitous insult upon the Church. Since Jeanne d'Arc has been raised to the altar she has become a "clerical" and her past services are ignored by the atheists who control French politics.

In Paris, preparations on a large scale were made, and, as early as the morning of May 7 blue flags with Jeanne's portrait, the Papal standard, white and yellow, the familiar tricolor and fac similes of the Maid's famous banner with its magic words: "Jhesus, Maria," were flying gaily from many windows. Then came, like a thunderbolt, the news that Edward VII had died the night before. This was followed by a notice sent to the newspapers by the archbishop, requesting Catholics, as a mark of sympathy with the mourning of a friendly nation, to abstain from decorating and illuminating as they had intended to do, but to be all the more zealous in celebrating the feast within the churches. The archbishop's tactful act must appeal to the English people, and in many a Paris church prayers were offered up in private for the dead king.

If the feast of the heroine was thus deprived of some of its outward splendor in Paris, the churches were crowded throughout the day. They had been appropriately decorated with banners upon which were inscribed the most glorious dates of her short life and the places most closely connected with her memory: Vaucouleurs, Orléans, Reims, Rouen, Rome. At Notre Dame, her panegyric was preached by l'abbé Sertillanges, in presence of the archbishop and of the principal leaders of the Catholic party.

In the provinces, fêtes in honor of the national heroine continue to take place and often assume a picturesque form, appealing strongly to the emotional and artistic side of the French temperament. These manifestations have a twofold advantage; they bring home Jeanne's story to the uneducated, whose imagination is struck by the pageants of which she is the central figure; they also frequently create a feeling of good fellowship between persons of different rank; and this, in small provincial centres, has a deeper and happier meaning than might be supposed. In a little town in northern France, for example, a fête of this kind was organized on the occasion of a mission; women and young girls of all ranks worked hand in hand, and the working class was given an appropriate part in the procession. The church, usually empty, was filled to overflowing and the preacher attributed many of the spiritual victories that crowned his efforts to the cordial good will created by the celebrations in honor of the Maid. This instance is but one example out of many of Jeanne's happy influence in the land she loved so well.

French literature experienced a severe loss, when on the 28th of March last the Vicônte Eugène Melchior de Vogüé, a member of the French Academy, died almost suddenly in Paris. He was the first to introduce Russian literature to his countrymen and his studies on Russian history are more interesting than any novel. His marriage with a Russian gave him an insight into the intimate life of a country whose language, history and literature were, at that time, almost unknown to outsiders.

ANGLO-FRENCH CATHOLIC.

Belgium's Flemish Question

LOUVAIN, MAY 5, 1910.

The Belgian Catholic party, and particularly the present government, have faced many difficult questions. None is perhaps more difficult than the Flemish question, for it divides all parties, and rouses enmities that lie deeper than mere political and economic differences. This was strikingly shown in the recent struggle in the House, which resulted in a victory for the Flemings.

As is well known, Belgium is a bi-lingual country: those in the north speak Flemish, a language practically the same as Dutch; those in the south, the Walloons, speak, some of them, Walloon, a Romance patois, most of them, French. Many Flemings also speak French. From the beginning of the last century up to about thirty years ago, Flemish was a despised language, spoken only, or almost exclusively, by those in the villages and country districts. Then came the awakening, hastened by such incidents as the trial and condemnation in court of poor Flemings in French, a language of which they understood not one word.

The language was saved by the only possible means, by creating a new literature and re-finding the old. Rodenbach and others at Louvain gave the impetus. Guido Gezelle, the West Flemish poet-priest, shed glory on it by poems of a remarkable grace and power. Henceforth the cause was assured of success, with the aid of the peculiar Flemish character, which unites great tenacity and stolidity to surprising depths of passion and enthusiasm.

The movement soon found its expression in legislation, as does nearly every movement in Belgium. In 1898 the principle was made constitutional of the theoretic equality of the two languages as official languages of the country. Speeches in the House and Senate, and education in Flanders can be given in Flemish. But this did not satisfy the Flemings as long as they were not actually given in Flemish. Hence, ten years ago, M. Coremans, Catholic deputy from Antwerp, proposed a bill requiring eight hours a week of class in Flemish in all the colleges. The House rejected the bill three several times, because of alleged unconstitutionality in putting the Walloons in an inferior position, and because it was said to infringe on liberty of education. It was a defeat, but only a temporary one.

The movement went on, the impetus coming, as always, from the intellectual élite, especially at Louvain. Indeed, the whole movement has a Catholic aspect; the other parties take it up merely as a matter of policy. It is a Catholic movement, and the great argument for keeping the Flemish tongue among the people—along with those of justice and fitness—is that thus the Faith will be preserved intact from the assaults of the immoral, obscene French "literature" that is flooding the southern districts, and so sadly undermining religion, and such appalling conditions will be avoided as exist, for example, in Charleroi, where there is an alarming disproportion between the birth and death rates, a condition attributed in great part to French influence.

Thus the Flemish cause grew up within, more widespread familiarity with the language led to a greater knowledge of its glories, and this in turn to a greater and more extended influence. At last the country was ready; one of the signs of the times was the offer of the bishops two years ago to grant the eight hours of class in Flemish. The third period of the movement was on, and reached its climax last week in the Franck-Segers' bill, a measure presented by two Antwerp deputies, and under the patronage of the government. The discussion lasted a week. Profound divisions were marked in the Left, while nearly every Catholic voted for the bill. It finally passed, 90-46.

A glance at its nature will reveal the present situation. It requires of all Flemings entering the university for any higher studies, a satisfactory examination in Flemish, or a certificate testifying to eight hours' Flemish for six years. The same is demanded in French from the Walloons. There are, besides, secondary requirements in German and English. Hence, no one's liberty is violated, the only ones at all suffering, being those Flemings who now refuse to learn their own language.

But, of course, this is only the first step. The ideal to which the Flemings have set their faces and resolutely march, is the entire "Flandricisation" of education in Flanders. What they want is the exact reverse of the position just won. Instead of a mere eight hours in Flemish and the rest in French—already better than what they had—they want the bulk in Flemish and eight hours in French. The inconveniences of a bilingual country are many and patent, but, say they, are not enough to outweigh all the considerations of justice and tradition.

The only obstacle worthy of note is that very impetuosity and haste in the choice of means to their end to which some of them too frequently yield. But that they will attain their end is beyond a doubt. Nothing is more admirable than their industriousness, constancy and enthusiasm, and daily they realize more and more that violence will never win anything.

And the Walloons? They, of course, can have no reasonable objection to the Flemings learning and using their own language, nor have they any. What many of them chiefly object to is that with the two languages in full and equal use and vigor in all commercial and political spheres, they, knowing only one language, will be handicapped; and thus while no direct constraint is exercised, practically, they will be forced to learn Flemish. To which it is answered that they are perfectly right. They shall suffer, in the interests of justice, what the Flemings all these years have suffered from injustice; they will have to learn a second language as the Flemings have had to learn French to get along. But each one will have his rights, no more and no less. J. W. P.

Visit of the New American Minister at Shanghai

SHANGHAI, APRIL 19, 1910.

Mr. J. W. Calhoun, the new United States Minister to China, reached Shanghai on Saturday, April 9. The mail steamer was met at Woosung by the U. S. S. Villalobos, with Dr. Amos P. Wilder, the United States Consul-General at Shanghai, and members of the Staff on board. The Minister and his wife stayed part of two days here, and were the guests of the Consul-General and Judge Thayer. In the afternoon a reception in their honor was held in the Palace Hotel, under the auspices of the American Association and the American Woman's League, and terminated at 5.30 p. m. During this time, all the members of the American Consulate, several prominent American merchants, representatives of the Consular Body, the Municipal Council and the Chinese Officials were presented to the Minister.

In the evening Mr. Calhoun was the guest of the American Universities Club, at their annual dinner held in the Astor House Hotel. At the close of the banquet, Mr. Wilder said a few words and requested the visitor to feel that he was for the time among his own people, 1,200 of whom reside at Shanghai. He enjoyed the personal friendship and confidence of two Presidents, as shown by his visits to Cuba and Venezuela, and he hoped that American interests would be safe in his hands at Peking. He knew that Shanghai had in him a strenuous advocate of the needed extension of the Foreign Settlements.

Judge Thayer followed, but said nothing very remarkable, while Mr. H. F. Merrill, Commissioner of Customs, who represented Harvard, said "that he was glad that Washington had selected a diplomatic agent and not a commercial man for Peking." This was the most pointed remark of the evening.

Mr. Calhoun replied briefly, avoiding every word calculated to disclose a line of policy, or involve his country in further complications with Russia and Japan in Manchuria. On Sunday evening, April 10, Mr. and Mrs. Calhoun left for Hankow by steamer. They will thence proceed to Peking by rail.

Mr. Calhoun having never before been in the old-fashioned and intriguing Capital, it will take him some time to adjust his perspective of things Chinese, and then he may be expected to steer a wise course, cooperating with China in the solution of her various problems, and advancing legitimate American interests in the Far East.

A Voice from Nicaragua

GRANADA, NIC., APRIL 22, 1910.

Public affairs seem to be going from bad to worse in Nicaragua. There is no heavy fighting, but the air is full of warlike rumors and signs of military movement appear on every side. President Madriz has had recourse to the tactics which made the administration of Zelaya so odious, namely, forced loans, arbitrary imprisonment, increasing by millions the paper money in circulation and issuing bonds with custom-house receipts as security.

He is charged with having had recourse to flogging in Matagalpa and with throwing respectable ladies into the common jail at Rivas, so he can hardly claim the confidence of the country. It looks as if neither party were strong enough to oust the other, for no serious advance has been made by the Madriz troops towards Rama, and the Estrada forces are not strong enough to take Managua.

In anticipation of the coming of Hon. John Barrett of the Bureau of American Republics on a tour of investigation, those not well affected towards the Madriz administration were warned to keep discreetly in the background and to tell no tales out of school.

The courtesies shown to Admiral Kimball's officers at a reception held in their honor were far from being approved by the faction in power, who dubbed the active participants "bootblacks to Uncle Sam's navy."

The White Slave Traffic

The existence of the White Slave traffic in New York has yet to be proved. In spite of the insistent clamors of political reformers, and the ding-dong reiteration of magazines and newspapers that appalling conditions exist, and the appointment of an investigating committee with John D. Rockefeller, Jr., at its head, determined to leave no stone unturned that the villainous trade may be exposed, in spite of so-called disclosures loudly trumpeted, the investigators have followed trails that lead nowhere and the will o' the wisp is now as far from being caught as ever.

Agitation and publicity and righteous indignation on the part of the great "censor morum," the press, and special committees and municipal machinery have effected nothing. Were Tammany in power the disconcerted pursuivants would lay the blame at the door of the city administration. The reformers are in the saddle and the press for the most part is silent. To cover their mortification the baffled pursuers of vice point out a recent notorious trial in vindication of their trumped-up charges. Two inmates of houses of ill-repute accept an engagement to go to a distant city to lend themselves to their nefarious occupation on the offer of a substantial gratuity. Another of the sex who admits that she has not for years been living with her husband, and whose lawyer would not allow her to answer questions touching on the character of her past life, yet respectable withal, because bespectacled and a college graduate, acts the decoy and entraps a procuress by the offer of a liberal reward if she will obtain girls under eighteen years of age, pure girls preferably. The infamous bargain is struck. But instead of innocent girls, two professional outcasts, the younger admitting she is twenty-three, are procured, who willingly lend themselves to the proposed scheme. Of course at the psychological moment the trap is sprung and the bird is caught.

A great triumph this of municipal reform! A triumph of the press, of private investigators and city officials. It has taken $7,000 to reimburse the Radcliffe College graduate and her partner for their prowess. But there is one comfort—a procuress who was not sharp enough for the superior cunning and college education of a settlement worker has been convicted. Lured by the offer of a handsome recompense she nibbled at the bait and is now punished for her temerity. The newspapers gloat over the magnificent results of their six months' work. But where, we ask, is the proof that innocent girls are systematically enticed from their homes and through a vast organization sold into the most odious form of slavery to be distributed by hundreds and thousands among numerous vice centres in this and other countries?

Some Facts About "Sister Candide"

Mlle. Forestier, the so-called "Sister Candide," whose financial transactions threaten to involve the French Government in scandals similar to those of its Church property liquidations, has no right to the name or garb of a nun. She seems to have belonged to a sisterhood more than eighteen years ago, but left or was expelled from the institution. She must have been a pushing personage, for she was at once taken up by the Government, which, while persecuting the Sisterhoods of the Church, took under its protecting wing "Sister Candide" and her "Nuns of Ormesson." It authorized the lotteries she instituted to defray the expenses of her pretended charities. President Loubet presided as honorary chairman over one branch of her enterprises, M. Casimir-Périer over another and Premier Waldeck-Rousseau decorated her with the Red Ribbon of the Legion of Honor. M. Monod, Supervisor of Charity under the Ministry of the Interior, lost his position because he refused her authorization to receive one legacy until the Government had examined her accounts. In eighteen years $5,000,000, of which only $200,000 was expended, is said to have passed through her hands. Her Secretary-General has committed suicide and the head director of her bank or lottery has disappeared. The Government that lionized her and fostered her operations, is characteristically trying to lay the blame of her defalcations on the Church from which she is a renegade.

The Church in the Northwest

So few people in the East recognize what tremendous progress has been made in the Northwest, that it is only when some such notable event as the simultaneous consecration of the six bishops, at St. Paul, Minn., on May 19, occurs that there is a partial realization of the extent of the development. Archbishop Ireland is so used to doing things on a big scale that even in the additions to his suffragans he makes the occurrence unique in the history of the hierarchy. The only other incident approaching this one was that in 1853, when the famous Mgr. Bedini, the Pope's inter nuncio, consecrated the Bishops of Brooklyn, Burlington and Newark in old St. Patrick's Cathedral. Last week's ceremony gives Archbishop Ireland an auxiliary and two new suffragans, and increases the number of the hierarchy in his Province of St. Paul to nine. When it is recalled that the first bishop of St. Paul was consecrated only sixty years ago, and had but nine priests and six thousand Catholics then in his jurisdiction, it can be seen that the progress of the Church is keeping steady pace with that made in all other respects by this section of the country. Archbishop Ireland, who officiated as consecrator of the new bishops and Bishop O'Gorman, who preached the sermon, were the first two seminarians accepted for the diocese of St. Paul by its first bishop.

L'Asino

The Catholic World for May speaks of L'Asino as "probably the vilest sheet printed in the world to-day, and synonymous with the most unspeakable filth and indecency. It would not be tolerated for an hour on any news-stand in America." It is not easy to know what may or may not be done in other parts of the land comprehensively termed America, but this vile sheet is for sale week-in, week-out, in stores and on news-stands in the Italian quarter of New York City. Why should not the attention of the Government be called to the existence of this blasphemous weekly with a view to preventing its importation into the country; or, if it is an American reprint, of prohibiting its sale? On his recent trip to the West President Taft spoke of the great strides that are being made in the fight against consumption and cancer, and took the position that the Government might well furnish money to provide the means of combating disease and bring about the "mastery of the intellect over natural foes." The Government is active in framing and enforcing pure food laws and refuses admission to paupers and criminals and the plague stricken; but no check is put to this purveyor of moral leprosy which corrupts the morals of the young and spreads its blasphemies against the Creator.

For Mr. Speer's Good Eye

On the official paper of the archiepiscopal secretariate of Santiago de Chile, we have received the following communication:

Certifico que del Archivo del Arzobispado de Santiago de Chile consta que, jamás se ha recibido de la Santa Sede correspondencia reconviniendo al clero por su conducta; al contrario, siempre el Santo Padre ha alabado su celo por la Salvación de las almas y por su buena conducta.

(L. S.)

J. AGUSTÍN MORÁN, C.,

Santiago, 13 de Abril de 1910.

Sec'rio.

For the convenience of some of our readers, we append a translation:

I certify that from the Archives of the Archdiocese of Santiago de Chile, it is certain that there has never been received from the Holy See a communication censuring the clergy for their behavior; on the contrary, the Holy Father has always praised their zeal for the salvation of souls and their upright lives.

(L. S.)

J. AGUSTÍN MORÁN, C.,

Santiago, April 13, 1910.

Sec'y.

We had diligently examined the published Acts of Pope Leo XIII, but found no trace of the letter quoted by Mr. Speer, and we had seen its very existence denied by the Chilean lay press. However, an official pronouncement, such as we are now privileged to lay before our readers, is the last word needed for the complete refutation of the gross calumny which Mr. R. E. Speer of the Student Volunteer Movement so industriously (though, we trust, unwittingly) spread through our country. As the Chileans would say, "a scalded cat runs away from cold water." Let Mr. Speer learn prudence in adversity and bow himself out.

"The Deadly Parallel"

We learn from Rome, on the best authority, that when Mr. Roosevelt was President a certain personage was reported to be on his way from the Vatican to Washington. He was a persona non grata at the White House. So Mr. Roosevelt sent a member of the Cabinet to warn the Papal Delegate that the person in question could not be received by the Administration. His Excellency was requested, moreover, to cable this information to the Vatican. On receiving the communication the Holy Father exclaimed: "What a fine, straightforward, honest thing to do!" Thus did Mr. Roosevelt act when he expected a visitor from Rome, and thus acted the Holy Father when an American visitor was expected in Rome. Thus, too, spoke the Holy Father. Would that we could complete the parallel and say: thus spoke Mr. Roosevelt when he received a friendly warning.

Methodist Inconsistency

The Board of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, through its secretary, Bishop L. B. Wilson, have issued an official statement which had been prepared by the board at its meeting in Chicago on May 9, relative to the Italian mission. The statement is the outcome of the recent controversy in Rome caused by the visit of Colonel Roosevelt.

The statement says: "We regret that after repeated challenges for details of the specific acts supposed to justify these charges, they still remain in such general terms that their validity cannot be tested before the judgment of the world. We can only observe:

"First—That ordinarily the use of opprobrious adjectives is suggestive of anger rather than of reason.

"Second—That the methods of our mission in Italy, now for the first time thus publicly condemned, are the same that have been pursued from the beginning, almost forty years ago."

We accept the challenge contained in the statement, which while it is commendable for its moderate and dignified tone, is hopelessly out of harmony with the Methodist publication in Rome, L'Evangelista, a copy of which (the issue of April 22, 1910) has reached this office.

On page 2 we read that 250 soldiers have given their names to the director of a Catholic assembly hall, where they have a library, conference, language lessons and various amusements. We quote: "Now let the Liberals of all branches of the party put an end to the anticlericalism, which is only in word. Let them oppose deeds to deeds . . . allurements to allurements; let them fight the priest with his own weapons, laicizing the arsenal of his propaganda, by doing in the light of the regenerating sun what he does in the lurking-places of the darkness. Why is there delay in denouncing the action of the 250 soldiers to their superiors that these may take energetic action in imitation of their fellow officers at Bergamo [where the soldiers were forbidden to assist]?"

A certain G. Agliata has a signed article on page 4, in which he says that the "Church of Rome" [not some rascally Catholic, not some lunatic, not some poor ignorant creature] teaches, among other savory morsels, "penance without repentance, prayer without intelligence, fasting without temperance, ceremonies without piety, celibacy without chastity, tradition without truth, indulgences without sorrow for sin, religion without the Bible." He then asks, "Is it true or not that the priests sell baptism to the new born and forgiveness to the sinner, that they made a trade of communions, masses, 'amulets,' crosses, blessings, etc."

We respectfully submit that the gentle accents of Jacob's voice in Chicago do not harmonize with the work of the hairy hands of the official organ of the Methodist propaganda in Rome.

A letter is reproduced in Il Resegone of Lecco, Italy, from Vico Mantegazzi, prominent among the Liberals, and anything but a crony of churchmen, in which he says: "I think that my open avowal will not cost me the esteem of my readers when I say that I don't understand very well what those 'Methodists' are and what they want to do. Some days ago, as I was walking along the XX Settembre street, examining books, I stopped in front of a show-case which belongs to the Methodist book store. Some of the books thus displayed have such titles as these: 'Infamies of the Popes,' 'Filth of the Pontiffs,' 'The Pope must be Driven Out,' and there are others like them.

"Frankly, it strikes me as very natural that one in high authority should think that the Pope ought not to receive in audience those Americans who, the day after or the day before, may take part in meetings where such topics may be treated. After the Fairbanks precedent, the doubt about what might happen could not be shelved. And from the moment when Roosevelt was unwilling to give the desired assurances, is it not natural that the Vatican should have signified its unwillingness to receive him? For this very reason, perhaps, the city authorities have seen fit to give a special character to the welcome and reception tendered to the ex-President. They believed that they were entertaining an anticlerical and therefore they must do more than is commonly done in honor of a distinguished guest."

In a recent editorial AMERICA called attention to a fact sufficiently common to merit an explanation. Why is it that Catholic achievement is overlooked by special writers in the press and in magazines? The editorial referred to a particular case. While municipal administration is one of the most common topics of our periodicals, the splendid transformation wrought by the municipality of Vienna during Lueger's mayoralty is scarcely noticed by them. The Nation, in its issue of May 5, offers an example. Quoting Scribner's Magazine, an editorial writer deplores "the wretched state of American city politics," contrasting it with the "honesty and efficiency of the German city." Among the cities commended by the Nation for these and other great qualities we find Berlin and Hamburg, but not Vienna, the second German city in size, and acknowledged the first in its latter-day record of honest civic administration. The fact that Vienna is the capital of Austria surely does not make it unworthy to figure as a "German" city. We wonder whether the fact that Vienna is a Catholic city and that Lueger, its great civic reformer, was an ardent Catholic had aught to do with its omission in the honorable mention of 'the Nation's paragraph?

Tourists visiting England are advised, if they have any tendency to strong language, to give Ivybridge in Devonshire a wide berth. A gentleman riding a bicycle came into collision there with a carriage in which were two ladies. His collar bone was broken and he received other injuries. One of the ladies was a doctor's wife. She recommended him to have recourse to her husband's art, but the gentleman not only refused to do so, but also strengthened his refusal with an emphatic utterance of the word the captain of the Pinafore hardly ever said. The lady was horrified and hastened to summon him in the police court. The magistrate decided the word to be obscene, and, unmoved to pity by the gentleman's broken and bandaged condition, fined him five pounds.

LITERATURE

The Poems of James Ryder Randall. Edited by MATTHEW PAGE ANDREWS. New York: The Tandy-Thomas Company.

During life Mr. Randall was neglected by a public which, while appraising one of his productions as our greatest battle lyric, failed to remember even the name of its author. And the author made no effort to jog its memory. Supremely humble and utterly unselfish, James Ryder Randall set slight estimate on himself or on his works, and the arts of the advertiser were altogether foreign to his nature. The necessity of earning a livelihood for his family forced him, like Lanier, another gifted singer of the Southland, away from the path of his true vocation, and for forty-five years (1862-1907) his great gifts were doomed to "the cart-horse work of rough-and-tumble journalism." Though the constant grind was a torture to his sensitive nature, he kept on "ever bravely meek" turning out editorials or correspondence to the eve of his death.

Essentially a poet, the fount within him was at times in-suppressible, and he broke into verse when mood or appealing incident coerced him, but he threw it in with the day's work and never sought or received compensation for any poetic composition. The fame of "My Maryland" would surely have given monetary value to any poem to which his name was attached, yet though need was often at his door, a certain inbred reverence seems to have inhibited him from sending his muse into the market. We recall no other poet of repute who was so delicately scrupulous. It did not even occur to him to guard his rights with his signature. When other names were attached to "My Maryland" he entered no protest. A letter to the Augusta Chronicle shows how he covered his best work with editorial anonymity: "Yesterday by accident a copy of your paper fell into my hands. It contained two notable things which I take to be from the same pen, one a poem, 'Resurgam,' the other what may be called a prose poem on the death of Father Ryan. Either entitles the author to fame." But the author had written:

He little heeds the dream of Fame,
Its treasure or its trust,
The hope of a sonorous name—
A Requiem from the dust.

This volume promises to win for Randall the fame that in life was denied him. It shows that "Maryland" was not an accident; that his muse swept with facile power over a varied range, and that if his name is writ in water, "the wave that surges from a hallowed grave" is, as he sung of Keats,

"The tumultuous Sea of Song,
The scroll of the Anointed Throng
To whom eternities belong."

A collection that includes juvenile pieces is necessarily of unequal worth, but several of these, written in his Georgetown days, bear no marks of apprenticeship. "The Oriel Window," composed before the war-blast roused him to voice the spirit of the South, reveals inspiration, maturity of thought and workmanship that make it, to our mind, superior to "Maryland." Many will pronounce a similar judgment on "Anima," "Pelham," "Keats," "The Battle-Cry of the South," "The Unbought Seminole," "At Arlington," and the humble paean of glorious hope, "Resurgam." Voicing the angry swell of war "Maryland" silenced for a time the poet's less strident, though richer and perhaps more permanent utterances, but it still possesses "the genuine ring and lifelike spirit" which Oliver Wendell Holmes "felt rather than thought," and failed to reproduce for Massachusetts. Because it has that within it that grips the heart and stirs the elemental motions, it has ceased to be sectional and is now the property of the nation.

The editor justly finds fault with Maryland societies for suppressing the last stanza because of the line: "Huzza! she spurns the Northern scum." Mr. Randall conceived the South as a rock repelling in foamy scum the assailing billows of the North. A few weeks before his death he consulted a friend about changing the line, but was advised to let it stand. It expressed the Southern sentiment of the time as Whittier's "The weak Southern's pride and lust," "The mean and tyrant South," etc., and Holmes' "legions of hell" and "sons of Belial" voiced the feelings of the North. All three softened with age and no one takes their war fury literally now. However, a fine stanza is omitted from "The Lone Sentry" (though included in the notes) because of the line: "The demon Goths pollute our halls with fire and lust and hate." Such outbursts expressing contemporary sentiment in impassioned song are a poet's contribution to history.

The editor is mistaken in attributing metrical peculiarities in "The Oriel Window" to Poe; James Clarence Mangan's "Song of the Sawmill" is its prototype, as is his "Karaman" of "Maryland." The intricate metre and airy imagery of the "Ha-Ha" phantasie, the solemn gloom of "Architecture," the swelling "Song of the South" and others of his best-constructed pieces suggest the Irish poet's influence, which Randall frequently and generously acknowledged.

The book is edited with taste and judgment. The notes are as informing as they are interesting, and the introduction outlines succinctly Randall's career and character as man, poet and journalist. Some specimens of vigorous and pregnant prose are culled from his Washington correspondence, but his strongest prose work was done for the Catholic Columbian and other Catholic papers. A Catholic to the core of his being, he wrote best when free to pour out his feelings and convictions unrestrained. Brimming with varied information, he always interested, and though his unreconstructed views often annoyed Northern readers, the fascination of his narrative retained and multiplied them. A well-edited collection from his correspondence should prove profitable to readers and publisher.

His works have special claim on American Catholics. A few years before his death Randall created a stir in Augusta by his defence of General Longstreet, one of the foremost Southern generals, who, after the war was over, joined the hated Reconstructionists. A gentleman having remarked in a public gathering that the attendance at Longstreet's funeral was meagre because the South had no honor for a renegade, Randall rose and in a torrent of indignation protested that, not because he became a Republican but because he became a Catholic was honor denied to Longstreet. The poet had suffered from the same cause. He was not only a devout Catholic, a daily attendant at Mass and an almost daily communicant, but in speech and writing he could not suppress his Catholicity. He received no political reward, and though an incessant worker, temperate and frugal, he often found it hard to secure a competence. As a man and a poet he deserves and will repay Catholic remembrance.

The public is under obligation to Mr. Andrews and Miss Shepherd, of Baltimore, through whose disinterested services "My Maryland" is linked at last with the other offspring of the same inspiration in a handsome and well-prepared volume.

The Recollections of a Varied Life. By GEORGE CARY EGLESTON. New York: Henry Holt & Company.

These reminiscences of an ex-Confederate soldier and journalist are the chance memories of a man who sits down to gossip over old days. Such gossip is always interesting. It may lack continuity and dwell on minor incidents and leave great blank spaces which we would like to see filled up; but this is not history, and under the circumstances history might fatigue us by its rigidity of purpose, whilst gossip and random recollections always have the merit of disclosing the unexpected and omitting dry transitions.

Mr. Eggleston had one misfortune as a literary man, that, namely, of being overshadowed in the popular regard by his brother Edward Eggleston, the author of "The Hoosier Schoolmaster." It was he who supplied his brother with the material for that story out of his own experience. "Sic vos non vobis." Another misfortune, according to the author of these reminiscences, was the necessity he was under all his life of doing hack work and newspaper writing in order to keep the wolf from the door, and thus discouraging literary ambitions which he never ceased to feel. One of the interesting elements in the book is the material it affords the reader for conjecturing just how great a literary person Mr. Eggleston might have become if he had enjoyed leisure for the development of his own fancies.

Among the interesting chapters we may note those on antebellum life in Indiana and Virginia, and the author's experiences as a journalist in New York. We read that "it was a rigid rule of the Harpers" not to publish severe and bitter assaults on the "irregular troops" in the army of religion as exemplified in the case of Mr. Moody. We wish the Harpers had been equally delicate about some of the regular troops, especially the Catholics. The editorial policies of the Post under William Cullen Bryant and of the World under its present management are described in detail, and are full of interest and information.

In view of some recent occurrences, the following paragraph from near the beginning of the book has a certain extrinsic interest: "Among the polemic novels that were generally permitted the most conspicuous example I remember was a violently anti-Roman Catholic novel called 'Danger in the Dark,' which had a vogue that the 'best-sellers' of our later time might envy. It was not only permitted us to read that—it was regarded as our religious duty in order that we might learn to hate the Catholics with increased fervor." This was in a Methodist community.

A Woman's Impressions of the Philippines, by MARY H. FEE. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

The march of bespectacled intellect which set in early in our history and has led whole armies of New England schoolma'ams to the peaceful, if not painless, triumphs of the class-room reached Manila (on Government transports) soon after the Philippines were our very own.

After an exile of eight years in those distant lands one of the army has laid aside the birch, or the tamarind, and grasped her pen. The result is not a dismal collection of petrified statistics, but a bright, chatty volume full of sparkle. It is as if she had favored us with an invitation to tea and there, in the atmosphere which only New Hampshire crags and strong bohea can produce, had indulged in bubbling chit-chat about the events, great and small, of her stay in the tropics. A hawklike eye trained to preserve intangible, indescribable, "order" has enabled her to catch a glimpse of many odds and ends of social and domestic customs which would escape the notice of an ordinary mortal. Written withal in a kindly spirit, these "Impressions" tell us much of our wards who are under the flag yet not under the Constitution, and who are much prone to frisk in their newly-found liberty.

Beyond the Mexican Sierras, by DILLON WALLACE. New York, Chicago, San Francisco: A. C. McClurg & Co. $2.00 net.

When one crosses the long bridge at El Paso, Texas, and stands under Mexico's red, white and green flag, the United States with its people, language and customs, seems to have been left a thousand leagues in the rear. All books descriptive of Mexican life and scenery are full of interest, but our author's book should have an additional charm, for it deals with the western part of Mexico, which is seldom visited, rarely described or pictured; but what might have been a wholly delightful book has been so disfigured by the introduction of silly and offensive tales, like that of "the church bells of Tepic," that the charm of novelty gives way to a feeling of disgust. The author does not know Spanish, as he takes the unnecessary trouble to assure us, else he would not misspell with monotonous perversity such familiar words as chile, garrapata, and sarape. Spanish words are so freely scattered through the book that they detract from its merits. It has a fine map and many excellent illustrations, one of which (p. 88), is wrongly labeled. Its appendix on "Mexico's Unhunted Wilderness" may help to verify the prediction, seen of late in Mexican newspapers, that Col. Roosevelt is to visit our neighboring republic. A satisfactory index ends the volume.

'Mid Pines and Heather and The True and the Counterfeit, by JOSEPH CARMICHAEL. London: The Catholic Truth Society, 69 Southwark Bridge Road, S. E. Price 1s. 6d.

Two interesting tales under one cover with a good voucher. Both are wholesome, both Catholic, but neither indulges in sermonizing. The former flows with a gentle current, the latter rushes on in a torrent of excitement. The way of the world is found in each, for the good and the bad appear and play their parts; but, and such is not always the way of the world, the young heroines come to a happy termination of their difficulties and the youthful reader hankers for "more."

Stories of the Saviour adapted to the capacity and interest of Children seem an answer to the invitation: "Suffer the little ones to come unto me." To them, as to their elders, Jesus is the Truth and the Life; His impress on their minds is the truest, and can be made the most welcome educative influence. We have before us four such books intended for children of various ages and approved by the proper authorities. Two are issued by Longmans, Green & Co., "A Life of Christ For Children," exquisitely told and artistically illustrated; and "Bible Stories" from the New Testament, narrated by Mrs. Hermann Bosch, with frequent but most interesting interruptions, by her little auditor, Toddlers. Those who made the acquaintance of Toddlers in the Messenger of the Sacred Heart will be glad to know more of her.

"The Divine Story," by Rev. C. J. Holland, S.T.L. (Providence: J. M. Tally) is intended for young people rather than children, and has reached the fourth edition within a year. The scope and character of "The Christ-Child," by M. C. Olivia Keiley (Washington, D. C.: Darby Printing Co.) are admirably described in the preface by his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons: "It is intended for the youngest children capable of learning the simplest lessons of our Lord's life. It aims to show them the preparation for His coming and the most important facts concerning His person and His work. I am sure that its loving and reverential spirit, its simple, easy style and its winning love, which shows that the writer understands and sympathizes with the child's mind, will make a deep and favorable impression on its young readers." In 62 pages of a handsomely illustrated quarto Miss Keiley weaves the story of Christ from creation to the Ascension with a skill and touching simplicity that should reach the minds and hearts of all who have arrived at the age of reason, or beyond it.

LITERARY NOTES

The passage in Edmond Rostand's latest play, which has especially caught the popular fancy, is the one containing the boast of the chanticler that by his crowing he causes the sun to rise:

"Je chante! Vainement

La Nuit, pour transiger, m'offre le crépuscule;

Je chante! Et tout à coup. . .

La Faisane.

Chanticler!

Chanticler.

Je recule,

Ebloui de me voir moi-même tout vermeil,

Et d'avoir, moi, le coq, fait lever le soleil!"

The entire passage of which we have quoted only a part has beauty and humor. But what we wish to remark is the novelty which is generally credited to the main idea in it. We have, it is true, seen various articles ascribing the boast of Chanticler to various erudite mythological and folklore sources. But no one, so far as we are aware, has as yet drawn attention to what we always considered one of the best-known good things in "Adam Bede:"

"You're mighty fond o' Craig," Mrs. Poyser used to say to her husband; "but for my part, I think he's welly like a cock as thinks the sun's rose o' purpose to hear him crow."

And later on in this novel Mr. Irwin, speaking to his wife of Mrs. Poyser, says: "I told you that capital thing I heard her say about Craig—that he was like a cock, who thought the sun had risen to hear him crow. Now that's an Æsop's fable in a sentence."

It is evident George Eliot valued her own invention in thus having the saying repeated; and anyone who has read the novel is likely to remember it distinctly. And yet the reviewers have apparently forgotten all about it, if they ever, indeed, knew of it at all, although it is not easy to see how they can have forgotten the well-known lines in "Hamlet," Act I, sc. I:

"The cock, that is the trumpet to the morn,
Doth with his lofty and shrill-sounding throat

Awake the god of day."

Of course, it may be expecting too much to ask professional reviewers to reread the classics and at the same time keep up with the enormous increase of new books.

We think it must be a matter of vain conjecture to many persons why Rostand should write a play in which the scene is laid in a barnyard and the characters are all denizens thereof. The following excerpt from a very fine article in the Academy may prove illuminating: "The idea of making his protagonist a cock and his scene a farmyard came to him [Rostand] in 1902. He wished, he says, to write a modern play, in verse, but found our present costume a hindrance, for 'le lyrisme d'une œuvre poétique s'accommode mal du moderne veston et de la bourgeoise redingote.' To avoid this modern coat, M. Rostand would have to go back at least two or three centuries; and then it would be impossible to write a play about modern life and modern problems. But fortunately the farmyard at M. Rostand's villa at Cambo presented a solution of the difficulty—an opportunity of being modern, and at the same time 'lyrical and picturesque.' The simple substitution of feathers for coat and breeches enabled him to be romantic, and to exhibit a becoming sensibility to the beauties of nature."

The solution of the difficulty arrived at by M. Rostand does credit to his ingenuity and is characteristic of his work as a poet and playwright. He has a mastery of his tools; but his inspirations lacks spontaneity and force. He is a great artist, but not a great poet. He studies the effects he wishes to produce beforehand, and afterwards sets to work at an elaborate and cold-blooded preparation of ingenious devices to stir the emotions he has in view. Everything is calculated and studied until the author takes on the character of a sort of glorified stage manager. But all the while his technical skill in verse and poetic phraseology lifts him above the level of contemporary standards.

The latest novel of Mrs. Katharine Tynan Hinkson, "Betty Carew," is receiving very favorable notice in English reviews. One critic says: "The whole story wins and holds your interest less by reason of its plot than because its characters are so thoroughly living and human."

It does not seem to be generally recognized among us that Mr. H. G. Wells is one of the vilest writers of fiction living to-day. He is an avowed Socialist of the kind that advocates the doing away of marriage laws. Mr. Wells makes his heroine a young lady who plays with fire in most outrageous fashion, and he proves how sensible she is by making her happy and respectable in the end. But as the editor of a certain literary weekly observes: "For one such who ends up happily in a beautiful flat with a virtuous and lily-fingered professor, fifty end up in much less attractive circumstances," and he goes on to stigmatize the manufacture of such novels as "a sorry and damnable trade."

The Editor of the projected "American Catholic Who's Who" informs AMERICA that the compilation of the book is about finished, and it will be in the hands of the publisher, B. Herder, of St. Louis, about July 1. It is hoped to have it ready for the book market early in the autumn. Competent judges have pronounced favorable criticism of the book in its manuscript form.

A strong metrical dialogue between Alfred the Great and Bishop Asser in the current Fortnightly Review represents William Watson's ideas of English government, past and present. King Alfred's vision of his successors is not so pleasant as Banquo's. He sees, at the Norman invasion, "dim forms at strife; beyond them, crown and crozier warring . . . and deeds of hell." England of to-day appeared to him

"Blind welter and the brood of dire misrule,

A groaning people and a sundering realm."

The reviewer of current events is equally pessimistic. The United States has been treating "the Mother Country" very badly, in interfering with England's Diplomacy in China, making injurious tariff arrangements with Canada and encouraging Sir Wilfrid Laurier in setting up a navy of his own and insisting that Canada shall be free to remain at peace when the "Mother Country" is at war. "Since Mr. Roosevelt quitted office the Anglo-American problem has fared worst of all," for which Mr. Taft is greatly to blame. There is even danger of an Anglo-American war, and the one man to prevent it is Mr. Roosevelt, who knows that England has been very good in India and China, and "that Canada should become the keystone of some future union between the two English-speaking Powers, the Empire and the United States."

EDUCATION

Mention was made last week in this column of the manner in which the public school system is reaching out more and more into the home, and influencing the daily life of the people in material ways. The need was then affirmed to watch this trend towards unwise paternalism, lest legislation impose unfair burdens because of easy-going neglect on the part of those who should be vigilant. The New York Tribune some time since had an excellent editorial to the same effect. The writer quotes with approval a paper on "Elementary Education," read at a recent meeting of the British Constitution Society in London, in which strong ground was taken against the compulsory principle in schools. "Free education," it was said, "had developed into free feeding of the children and free medical inspection, leading to free treatment, and the latest development was that school authorities were responsible for accidents to children in play-grounds. It might almost be imagined from present-day legislation that God gave children to the State or to municipalities instead of to parents." Commenting on the paper the Tribune editorial says: "It is disheartening that to an alarming extent parental control of children has been relaxed, if not altogether abandoned, and responsibility not only for technical instruction, but also for moral culture and general discipline has been shifted from the home to the school. . . . The laws of nature are not to be disregarded with impunity, and there is probably none of them more imperative or more inexorable in its exaction of penalties for its violation than that which prescribes parental care for and control of children and dutiful subjection of children to their parents. No satisfactory substitute for that relationship has yet been found, and it may well be believed that any attempt to abrogate that law, whether in favor of commune or of school, is sure to result in disaster."

It is a genuine pleasure to find so strong and correct a stand taken by a secular journal. It will be well for those who are pushing legislation which will bring school officials into very close relations with home in matters hitherto commonly regarded as entirely out of the province of school administration, to heed the warning. No training ground, not even the school, can take the place of the home, and no other influence can compensate for lack of parental control.

The Sixth Annual Report of the Reverend Superintendents of Catholic Schools of the Archdiocese of New York (1909) was issued this month. Its presentation will delight all interested in the work of parochial schools, and, we may be allowed to add, ought to be an inspiration to diocesan Superintendents throughout the country. With reports such as this to back our claims of excellent work done in Catholic elementary and grammar schools, what a splendid stand we could make for proper recognition of our services in the cause of general education! There are now in the entire Archdiocese 151 Catholic Elementary schools, an increase over 1908 of twelve. The total registration is 74,120, an increase over 1908 of 4,118 pupils. The regular attendance is 67,282. The number of schools in the Archdiocese proper (Boroughs of Manhattan, Bronx, Richmond and City of Yonkers) has passed for the first time the century mark. This marks a gain of 42 schools since September 1902, when the number was 59, and is a notable evidence of the zeal for Catholic schools which has characterized the administration of Archbishop Farley. The detailed statistics given at the end of the report present an imposing array of gratifying figures, not the least of which is the statement that the archdiocesan school property is valued at $9,836,000, and the annual cost of maintenance is $682,420. Thus is expressed in the concrete the sacrifice which the Catholic citizens of New York are making to give their children the fullest opportunity to be trained in Christian ways. A striking and significant feature of the activity of Catholic school work in New York is the replacing of old structures with up-to-date fire-proof buildings. Probably no detail of this excellent report shows better how far we have progressed from the days when classes were held in Church-basements or in old tumble-down structures. One is glad to note that the report contains a worthy tribute to Rev. Thomas Thornton, who had been associated with the present Superintendent in the charge of schools since 1903, but who resigned this duty upon his appointment to the important pastorate of St. Columba's Church.

The general announcement containing the preliminary program of the seventh annual meeting of the Catholic Educational Association, to be held in Detroit, Michigan, July 4, 5, 6, 7, 1910, has been published. The program is one of exceptional merit, and it is stated that the prospects for a good attendance are decidedly encouraging. All necessary preparations have been made by the local committees appointed by the Right Reverend Bishop of Detroit and Catholic educators of the country will receive a cordial welcome. An invitation to attend the convention is extended to all Catholic college and seminary presidents and professors, to pastors and teachers and all interested in the cause of Christian education. The general sessions will be open to the public.

SOCIOLOGY

Summer is coming and with it all the delights of country life. With it, too, is coming the dreadful heat which makes life in the tenements a torture and a danger. All the charities are appealing to their friends for the means to take the children, especially from the stifling city to the free mountain breezes for a time, that their strength may be built up to bear the strain that this condition of life imposes on them. The Mission of Our Lady of Loretto, 303 Elizabeth Street, in one of the most congested tenement districts of New York, has gone boldly into this work and, trusting implicitly in the dear Mother of God, who greatly pities her little Italian children and will reward abundantly all who aid them, its Director, Rev. W. H. Walsh, S.J., appeals to the clients of Mary for means to send 250 boys to the Summer Home he maintains near Monroe, N. Y. on the upper slope of the Schunemunk Mountain. The property is not paid for. $6,000 is still due on mortgage; moreover the buildings are greatly out of repair. Money then is required for the work. But the pressing need is the means to support his little guests for two weeks at least, and the more delicate for a longer period. The cost for each is ten dollars. The regular subscription to the work is placed at five dollars, but this does not mean that the full cost of one boy, or even more, will not be acceptable. Now that you are going to the country yourself, get Mary's blessing on your summer by helping the children of the tenements to a small share in your enjoyment. We would urge all to send to Father Walsh for the literature of his mission. From it they will learn how much he is accomplishing with the narrow means at his command, and what he could accomplish if our Lady's clients would increase his means.

We have received the report for the year 1909 of the Central Council of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, Boston, addressed to the President of the Superior Council of New York. It covers the work of 81 conferences containing 1,089 active members, and reports 2,670 families comprising 10,951 persons aided during the year. The visits of the members to the poor were 34,601. Situations were obtained for 389 persons and on December 31 there were 687 families on the roll. The special works of the Society are a home-finding bureau in connection with St. Mary's Infant Asylum; the employment of two agents in the Juvenile Courts to watch over the Catholic children appearing there, and put them in proper institutions or supervise the probationers; and the protection of immigrants, especially girls, in conjunction with the Charitable Irish Society.

The Survey devotes considerable space to what is called Hospital Social Work. This consists in following up the discharged patients and those of the clinics and showing them in a friendly way how to avoid relapses and the things that would render nugatory the work of the dispensary. Generally speaking, nurses are employed in this, though sometimes physicians on the staff of a medical college make it part of the training of their students. An extension of their work is the convalescents' home, the employment bureau to find suitable employment for convalescents, the concerting with the friends of the victims of drugs or vicious habits, of means to preserve these from danger.

Louisiana is one of the few States that make provision for the segregation, care and medical treatment of lepers. President Burke of the Board of Control publishes in the New Orleans Picayune a report of the State Home for Lepers at Indian Camp, Iberville Parish, under the charge of the Sisters of Charity. There are 32 white lepers, 19 females; 8 colored males and 7 female, making, with 4 since received, a total of 70. Though there are two separate establishments, one for the Sisters and employees and one for the lepers, the cost per capita is only $269 a year. The State appropriation is inadequate, having to be reinforced by private contributions of the charitable. During the past two years one patient has been discharged cured, several have improved in health and nine have died. High praise is awarded to Sister Benedicta and the attendant Sisters of Charity.

The Federated Catholic Societies of Philadelphia are turning their attention to the question of how immoral plays are to be stopped. The President, Mr. S. E. Megargee, in a very forcible speech recommended the appointment of a censor by the Legislature.

The New York State Commission on Employers' Liability, etc., calls attention to the fact that the Judiciary Committees of both branches of the Legislature have reported favorably upon two Workmen's Compensation Bills introduced by the Commission. The first Bill applies to a special list of extra-hazardous employments. Without taking away existing rights it would give a workman for injuries received through the negligence of an employer or an employer's agents, or through a risk of his trade, half wages during his disability up to eight years; and to the dependents of a workman killed under the same conditions, a sum equal to his wages for four years with a limit of $3,000. The second Bill applies to all employments. It provides certain amendments to the existing employers' liability law, and offers the employee the choice to contract out of his uncertain rights under it for a certainty of compensation under terms similar to those of the first Bill.

ECONOMICS

A statute of Kansas provides that certain banks incorporated by the State under special conditions, shall each make a deposit with the Secretary of State and thus create a fund to be administered by the State for the benefit of the depositors of any of the banks that may fail. Judge Pollock, of the United States Circuit Court, has decided this law to be unconstitutional, inasmuch as it denies equal protection of the law to national banks, which cannot fulfil its provisions, and, by creating competing banks which advertise the guarantee of their deposits, brings about what the legislature must be presumed to have intended, the withdrawal of business to these banks to the injury or destruction of the national banks.

The Government's income is getting to be in the neighborhood of 700 million dollars a year. It is collected from less than 100 million people, about $7 per head on an average. It is not felt, because it is taken in small sums, about two cents a day. The same trifling amount levied on the American people would provide 70 multimillionaires with 10 million dollars a year each; the same trifling amount saved would add to the capital of the people 700 million dollars a year. No reasonable man can complain of the fortunes amassed legitimately. We are apt though to complain of the excess. Yet we have it in our power to reduce this excess and to multiply popular wealth, not by depriving ourselves of the necessities or the conveniences of life, but simply by restraining waste. How much money passes through New York's Great White Way and its analogues in other cities! Where does it go? Chiefly to the owners of real estate in extravagant rents, to the Liquor Trust, to the Tobacco Trust, to the Theatre Trust, to Electric Light Companies, etc. We contribute our little share, and then growl because they grow so rich. Thrift is a power, if we only knew it.

San Francisco is the wickedest city in the United States, at least so they say who have never been there. Those who know it better are not so ready with their accusations. How did it get this bad reputation? Perhaps the Californian romancers are partly responsible. If so the rest of the responsibility lies with their readers who have not learned the tenderfoot's first lesson that the man of the broad sombrero, the sheepskin chaparejos, the flaming neckerchief, the holstered revolver and jingling spurs who boasts of his badness is not the worst person in the West. Still, San Francisco has its reputation, to which its deeds must be made to conform. Hence, as there had been sugar-weighting scandals in New York, it became absolutely necessary to find them in San Francisco; and a few weeks ago, according to the newspapers, the scandal was actually being investigated. Nevertheless, a well-informed correspondent tells us that of 202,926 tons of sugar entering San Francisco in 1908, only 2,096 tons were dutiable, and of 196,417 tons in 1909, only 5,742. Nearly all the raw sugar coming to that port is Hawaiian, which pays no duty. In this matter, then, San Francisco is innocent.

SCIENCE

That snow is possessed of radio-active properties has long been known. During the past winter, however, French physicists have studied the matter more systematically and have found that snow, gathered as it falls, is highly radio-active, but loses this property after a couple of hours. When it remains in contact with the soil its retentivity is greatly enhanced.

Dr. R. Alessandri, professor of pathology at the Roman University, disputes the assertion of United States experts that the breeding place of the bacillus of pellagra is mouldy corn. He claims to have isolated the germ from ordinary water.

A cable to the Isthmian Canal Commission reports that the heavy rains of April, amounting to 5.98 inches, seriously retarded the work. The total excavation for the month of April was 2,632,468 cubic yards, against 3,967,479 cubic yards for March.

England is now manufacturing from marine fibre and wood pulp a cheap substitute for cotton. It appears to give entire satisfaction. The fibre is deglutinized by nature's process, is unshrinkable and easy to bleach or dye. For wear and tear it is not second to fabrics manufactured of jute. Its cheapness is due to the fact that the supply of marine fibre is practically inexhaustible, large deposits, some nine feet in thickness, being found in the shallow waters of South Australia.

An Hanoverian professor, by name Nussbaum, has just published his investigations regarding suppression of noises in dwelling houses. He finds that the more solid and tough the building the more quickly and audibly sound is transmitted through it. Again, the higher the pitch of the sound the greater is the conductivity. Walls of tiles and cement transmit noises most readily, those of earth least. Between these extremes come ordinary brick walls.

Sir Thomas Holland, in the Wilde lecture before the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society of England, made some very interesting remarks on recent ideas regarding the internal structure of the earth. These are discarding the Laplatian hypothesis, as based on Clairault's theorem, for Chamberlain's planetesimal theory. Geologists are inclined to hold that the earth's core is not hot but cold; and the discovery of incredibly large quantities of radio-active bodies lead them to believe the reserves of heat to be indefinitely great, so that in place of a gradual cooling off the present age may end in a catastrophe of heat.

Dr. William L. Dudley, professor of Chemistry at the University of Nashville, suggests that polar auroras may be due to the presence, in the atmosphere, of neon, rendered luminous under the action of magnetic discharges. Dr. Dudley's theory rests on the experimental imitation of the aurora borealis in all its characteristics, by enclosing neon in a Crooke's tube and subjecting it to the action of the Hertzian waves.

Wire photography has been performed in this country. Photographs of prominent men have been sent over the wires between New York and Boston by Mr. T. Thomé Baker. The teletograph films used had 30 lines to the inch in their width, instead of 55, the usual ruling.

F. Tondorf, S.J.

Professor Jerome S. Rickard, S.J., of the Observatory of Santa Clara, has issued the following statement in regard to the sun spots, which he has been watching since they began to develop on May 12:

"After nearly two months of rest the solar surface is showing a recrudescence of activity well worthy of a maximum period. On May 16, at 1 p.m., there could be seen a large, intensely blue colored spot, convex to the westward, concave to the eastward, in shape nearly like a half moon.

"As a master spot, it had a retinue of fourteen little ones, or pores, following in the rear on the eastern side, led by a vanguard of one taller and bigger than the rest. It was about twelve hours east of the solar axis. West of the north and south line through the centre of the sun, at a distance of a few degrees, stood another group of three spots—a big one and two smaller ones. The first and larger group is probably eight degrees south latitude, and the second is about ten degrees same latitude.

"The largest black spot measures 236, 318 by 79,773 miles. The smaller group appeared on May 12 and was single, then became triple. The larger group was first seen on May 15 as a family of seven, then of nine on May 16, of eight on May 17, finally of fifteen on May 18."

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

On May 22, 1910, the Rt. Rev. Juan Martín de Yáñez y Paz entered upon his episcopal functions in the Diocese of Santiago del Estero, the oldest cathedral city in what is now the Argentine Republic. The third bishop, a Portuguese Dominican, Fray Francisco de Victoria, attended to the Canonical formalities for the erection of the diocese in 1578 although it dates from 1570, when it was established by a Bull of St. Pius V. The sixth bishop, Julian de Cortazar, was consecrated in the cathedral in 1618. The ninth bishop, Francisco de Borja, great grandson of St. Francis Borgia, was consecrated in the same edifice on June 20, 1670, the very day that his saintly ancestor was canonized in Rome. By Letters Apostolic of Pope Innocent XII, the bishop's chair was transferred from Santiago del Estero to Córdoba de Tucumán; and now, after the lapse of more than two hundred years, the progress of Argentina has moved Pope Pius X to restore Santiago del Estero to the dignity of a cathedral city.

For some time past there have been rumors concerning a change to be made in the government of the suburban sees that give the titles of the Cardinal-Bishops. A Pontifical Constitution dated April 15, has made the change. In future the Cardinal-Bishops are to be the titulars of these sees as heretofore, and are to retain all their privileges and prerogatives as such excepting only the actual government which is to be in the hands of an auxiliary bishop. Such an auxiliary is to have all rights of patronage not reserved to the Holy See, but he is not to unite or divide benefices without consulting the Cardinal. So, too, though he examines and approves candidates for orders, he is not to ordain without the Cardinal's consent. He is to consult the Cardinal before nominating the rector, the professors and the procurator of the seminary, and must hold the synod with the Cardinal's consent and in his name. His jurisdiction is not to cease with the Cardinal's death, resignation or transfer to another diocese, but he is to continue to rule the diocese in the name of the Holy See.

Archbishop Farley will open the convention of the New York Staatsverband at Kingston, on May 30, Decoration Day. The local councils of the Knights of Columbus and divisions of the Ancient Order of Hibernians will unite with the German societies in the preliminary parade and the Katholische Saengerbund of New York will supply the music. Kingston committees under the direction of the Right Rev. Mgr. Burtzell have arranged for the entertainment of the large number of delegates and visitors who are expected to attend.

The new cathedral of Nicolet, in the province of Quebec, was inaugurated May 13. In 1899 the first cathedral collapsed through defective foundations or instability of the ground on which it was built. The second cathedral was destroyed by fire in 1906. The present building bids fair to last and is an ornament to the diocese. Among those who went in solemn procession from the Bishop's house to the cathedral were Archbishops Bégin and Bruchési, Bishops Larocque, Archambault, Bernard, Latulipe and Roy, Monsignors Routhier, Baril, Douville, Gay, Rouleau, Allard, Suzor, Bolduc, the Abbot Dom Antoine, Father Lacombe, O.M.I., representing Bishop Legal, and a great number of canons and superiors of communities. His Grace, the Archbishop of Quebec, sang pontifical high Mass, and Bishop Brunault blessed the new cathedral. Bishop Roy preached the sermon. Sir Wilfrid and Lady Laurier were present.

The attitude of the Government towards the work in behalf of the Indians receives appreciative comment from the Rev. William H. Ketcham, Director of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions. In the latest annual report, Father Ketcham says: "President Taft, in making his appointments has endeavored to place in office men who will treat all American citizens justly and impartially, without regard to race or creed. There is every reason to believe that with Richard A. Ballinger as Secretary of the Interior, Robert G. Valentine, Commissioner of Indian Affairs and F. H. Abbott, Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Indians will be accorded just and sympathetic treatment, and the Catholic missions protected and encouraged in the same manner and degree as the missions of the Protestant denominations, and that the work of Christianizing the Indians will be upheld in every possible way."

On the eve of Trinity Sunday forty-two seminarians were ordained for the archdiocese of New York and the diocese of Brooklyn. Of this number twenty had just completed their studies preparatory to the priesthood in St. Joseph's Theological Seminary at Dunwoodie, N. Y., and were ordained at the Dunwoodie Seminary by Archbishop Farley. Twelve of the candidates for the priesthood were students of St. John's Seminary, Brooklyn, and received Holy Orders at the Church of St. John the Baptist, Brooklyn, Bishop McDonnell officiating. The other ten candidates are at the American College in Rome, of which Mgr. Kennedy is Rector; some of them were ordained at the Church of St. John Lateran in Rome, while several received Holy Orders in the Basilica of St. Peter's at the hands of Cardinal Merry del Val.

On May 14, Bishop Prendergast ordained seven seminarians at Overbrook, Pa., for the archdiocese of Philadelphia; and earlier in the week conferred minor orders on five converts from the Protestant Episcopal ministry and subdeaconship on three others. Another ordination that week took place at Villanova where three Augustinians were elevated to the holy priesthood. On May 21, thirteen young men received Holy Orders from the Rt. Rev. Bishop Farrelly in Cleveland. Nine of the candidates are from the territory included in the new diocese of Toledo and were ordained for that diocese. Doubtless other ordinations have taken place at these times in different parts of the country, but those here recorded are a sufficient indication of numerous vocations to the holy priesthood and of the prosperous outlook in many dioceses. To this may be added the interesting announcement that twenty Jesuits and eight Redemptorists will be ordained together in St. Francis Xavier's Church, St. Louis, on June 30.

More than 600 children received the Sacrament of Confirmation at St. Stanislaus' Church, Baltimore, on Whitsunday, Bishop Corrigan officiating. It was the largest class ever confirmed in that city, and the ceremony lasted from ten o'clock in the morning till after two in the afternoon.

A press cable from Rome states that the Pope has sanctioned the erection of a new diocese in Pennsylvania with Reading as its see.

The will of the late Richard Huncheon, of La Porte, Ind., distributes more than $100,000 to a number of Catholic institutions in the United States. Among the bequests are $50,000 to the Catholic University in Washington; amounts varying from $200 to $1,000 to hospitals at La Porte, South Bend, Michigan City and Lafayette, Ind.; $4,000 each to orphan asylums at Seneca, N. Y., Lafayette and Fort Wayne, Ind.; $3,000 each to the orphanage at Vincennes, Ind., Diocesan School at Fort Wayne and St. Joseph's Training School at Indianapolis; $2,000 to the Mission House at Brookland, Wash.; $4,000 each to the Little Sisters of the Poor and Sisters of the Good Shepherd, at Indianapolis; $500 to the leper colony at White Castle, La.; $4,000 each for the Home for the Blind, at Jersey City, and the Epiphany Apostolic College at Wallbrook, Baltimore. Mr. Huncheon was a mine operator and the owner of extensive lands in Colorado. At one time he was master mechanic of the Panhandle Railroad.

OBITUARY

The Rev. J. S. Conmee, S.J., an eloquent preacher and zealous priest, died in Dublin on the 13th of May. He was Provincial of Ireland from 1905 to 1909, when he was relieved of this onerous post on account of failing health. John Stephen Conmee was born near Athlone, on Christmas Day, 1847, and in 1867 entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus at Milltown Park, Dublin. He was appointed Rector at Clongowes in 1885 and Superior of St. Francis Xavier's, Gardiner street, Dublin, in 1898. His last appointment was to the Rectorship of the House of Theological Studies at Milltown Park. In the Dublin Freeman's Journal, May 14, Father Matthew Russell pays the following tribute to his memory: "The offices entrusted to Father Conmee show the esteem in which he was held by those who knew him best. In all these changes of duty he was eminently successful, for he was admirably religious, and a singularly gifted man. He was a delightful companion, beloved by all who had the happiness of his intimate friendship. . . . He was bright and happy in his death, as he was through all his life and his memory will be affectionately cherished by many till they follow him in their turn."

Mother M. Neri Bowen, a well-known Sister of Mercy, died on April 22 at the mother house in Pittsburg. She was in the eighty-fourth year of her age and the fifty-sixth of her religious profession.

On the eve of her golden jubilee as a professed member of the Religious of the Sacred Heart, Rev. Mother Catherine Winters died at the Sacred Heart Convent, Montreal. She was eighty-one years of age and had lived more than sixty years as a member of the institute.

PERSONAL

General Frederick von Schrader, one of three recently appointed brigadiers in the regular army, is an alumnus of the University of St. Louis.

Few people in this city read of the death of Father McErlane, says the Western Watchman, of St. Louis, Mo., who did not say, "a good man has gone." People who are brought in contact with the poor and the unfortunate considered his death an irreparable calamity. The poor and the outcasts of the streets bowed their heads in sorrow over the loss of their dearest friend on earth. Father McErlane's influence over the most hardened sinners was of a peculiar sort, amounting almost to fascination. His words were so cheery, his manner so open and engaging, his honesty so apparent that it was hard to resist his appeal. Mixing familiarly with the depraved he never lost a tittle of their reverence; and prisoners who asked to see him through curiosity called for him again to receive religious instruction. He was never obtrusive. He was as kind to those who repelled his ministrations as to those who surrendered to his arguments. What he made all know and understand was that he was a brother and had the heart and hand of a brother for all.

While Father McErlane possessed such a power to charm the lowly, they possessed a similar reciprocal power over him. He was not attracted to the rich and the people who belonged to the higher social walks. He had few friends among the ultra-fashionable; but oh! the lowly worshipped him. He was the servant of the unfortunate, and he had no "hours" for anybody. He was as ready to visit the poor and needy in the night as in the day, and it can be said that the owl car was his coach as often as those on regular runs. He knew all the short cuts to salvation, and even then his long legs often strided across lots. But his work was not carelessly done, as witness its abiding character. Those who were converted by Father McErlane remained true to their new faith and resolutions. He was thoroughly convinced that those who blasphemed God and spoke against religion were not in earnest, and they seemed to be glad to find one man who refused to take them seriously. His arguments were appeals to his hearers' hope and better nature, and they seldom failed.

Father McErlane was little known among the clergy of the city or even among his own Jesuit brethren. He had no time for social duties, when there were poor wretches in need of comfort. He was never heard in the pulpit; his home was the confessional and he lived in it when not away on a call of charity. He was almost an entire stranger to his people in the old land. Not that he did not love them, but because they did not need his kindly offices. We remember how amused and delighted his cousin german, the Rector of the Irish College in Paris, was when we told him some years ago of his cousin's wondrous work in this city. There are few men like Father McErlane vouchsafed to the world; but they are all the more treasured for that. Don Bosco in Italy; St. Vincent de Paul in France; Father Drumgoole in this country, have preached a gospel that the scoffer cannot answer, and the profligate cannot resist. The dogma of good works is acceptable to all; and that is the lesson driven home by Father McErlane's life.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Speaking of the approaching National Convention of Charities, Archbishop Glennon, of St. Louis, has suggested some points for the consideration of the delegates:

"While charity is, or should be, religious in its motive, it should not be given to sectarian propaganda in its results; and more especially should it not where it is a question of little children, whether they be orphans dependent upon the public or the abandoned, or the many who for one cause or another have to look to others than their parents for patronage and support. The one who would, for instance, offer with one hand the sandwich to the dependent child and with the other put into his pocket an anti-pope tract, is not a charity worker, but a downright criminal, and should be punished by any decent code for the crime of soul snatching. We look with horror on the people who go to the cemetery by night and take therefrom the bodies of our friends who are sleeping.

"To my mind, it is more criminal to endeavor to rob the little children of their faith, and to snatch from them that which is their soul's life, and which, according to the Christian standard, at least, is worth much more than their bodies. And under the protection perhaps of our courts and laws the idea is to take the child away, not only from its home, where it has a right to be, but from the faith of its baptism, and by that process of law, which is not law, to turn it over to some institution where it has neither the opportunity of learning nor of practising the faith of its baptism.

"These people appear to think that religious belief has no rights that they are bound to respect. They forget that the spirit and the letter of the law governing these very cases clearly defines it as a duty to give to the dependent child all reasonable opportunity to practice and to profess the faith of his baptism and his home.

"In this matter, I am pleading for the integrity and the rights of all the churches and faiths; and we should be together in saving the children from the system which by its very nature must exploit secularism and unbelief at the expense of revealed religion and definite creed.

"There is a feeling in the minds of some that the separation of Church and State means a necessary hostility between them. Why this feeling should exist I know not, except it be the outcome of prejudice or ignorance of the spirit of the Constitution. For on the part of the Church it is to-day, in its teaching, institutions and spirit prepared to give not only lessons in faith and morals, but a most unstinted service to the cause of citizenship and civic duty, a support which in those days of stress and storm the State can ill afford to dispense with.

"And while speaking of the rights of the little ones to the faith of their baptism and their home, I want to add that they have a right to their home also. Detention houses, orphan asylums and industrial schools are only places of last resort. They never do, and they never can, take the place of the home.

"All helpful charity and all sane social activity to-day should be directed to the building up and sustaining of the homes of the poor, and every means taken to render these homes habitable and healthy. Unfortunately, the tendency to-day is to get away from the home—to throw the children on the city or on the private charity. Divorce courts are the feeders of the Juvenile courts. The machinery is complete and quite effective. When it gets through there is left the ruined home—the cast-off wife, and the well-filled orphan asylum.

"In our orphan asylums at least 50 per cent. of the children are not orphans at all, but the children of worthless, possibly drunken, parents who refuse to support them; and we are asking the pennies of the poor to support these children while their parents are making the rounds of the saloon, or perhaps basking in the smiles and favors of the politicians. There ought to be a law compelling these men to work for their homes and children first, and if they will not do so, then they should be compelled to work for the State, which in turn would make the usufruct of their labors in some way support their children."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CATHOLIC BOOKS IN PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your commendation of the action of the Emporia, Kansas, Council, K. C., in presenting sets of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" to the State Normal and Carnegie libraries, raises a question that I have presented to some of our Iowa Councils, many of which have done the same thing. Why should the Knights of Columbus or Catholics donate such works to institutions to the maintenance of which they contribute in taxes equally with taxpayers who belong to other churches and to no church?

This "great storehouse of learning and information" is so necessary a complement in even the smallest library that any institution pretending to maintain a public reference library cannot afford to be without it. The demand, not from Catholics, but from students, teachers and all who desire to know the truth or the claims of the Church as to the truth of history, science, art, religion and literature, will compel its installation.

Librarians and library trustees generally, I believe, willingly give each "side" a hearing in selecting books for our public libraries which are supported by general taxation, and they acknowledge that they cannot in justice use the taxes of those belonging to any church, race or class, to purchase books that malign or misrepresent them. The Jewish taxpayer ought not to be compelled to pay his money and in addition buy the "Jewish Encyclopedia" (they have a good twelve volume one); nor should any class of contributors to the public library be compelled to purchase the books which in a proper manner give its claims on matters of public interest. If attacks on Christianity are to find a place in our public libraries, Christians are interested in placing within the reach of the public the history and claims and arguments maintaining it. There is so much written from the viewpoint of the agnostic, the infidel and the atheist that Christian antidotes should be provided.

My idea of the duty of Knights of Columbus, and it has no higher, is to see that "The Catholic Encyclopedia" and many other high-class works are placed in all public libraries; but they should demand it as a right under most conditions, not grant it as a donation. The State of Kansas and the city of Emporia can afford to and should place these books in their libraries, and the Knights could use their money for other educational or charitable purposes. AMERICA can do good work along these lines. Make the Public Library what it ought to be and then induce Catholics to use it.

E. M. SHARON.

Davenport, Iowa, May 6, 1910.

LAME THEOLOGY OF THE DAILY PRESS.

A correspondent sends us for criticism answers given to a correspondent by a leading New York newspaper regarding Papal Infallibility and the Immaculate Conception. They are by no means satisfactory and, were there any signs of malice in them, we should feel bound to take the matter up. On reading them carefully, however, we are convinced that the newspaper did its very best, and that this is no credit to it must be held the fault of the inquirer rather than of the too ready writer. "Do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles?" If, then, they go for theology to even the best of the secular press, they must not expect perfect satisfaction.

CHRONICLE

By Air Line to New York.—In a flight from Albany to New York Glenn H. Curtiss won a prize of $10,000 offered by the New York World and added a new record to his many triumphs as an aviator. The distance covered was about one hundred and fifty miles and the average speed 54 4-5 miles an hour. Two stops were made, one at Gill's farm, near Poughkeepsie, seventy miles from the starting place, and the other at Inwood, sixty-two miles from Gill's farm. From Inwood the flight was over the North River to Governor's Island. For speed and difficult achievement the flight establishes a new record for cross-country work. Mr. Curtiss now holds two of the three world's great records. Last summer, in France, he won the international trophy for speed, and shortly after carried off the grand prize for speed at Brescia, Italy.

New Bridge at Hell Gate.—The announcement has been made that work will begin soon on the gigantic Hell Gate Bridge, which is to connect the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad system with the Pennsylvania, thus giving New England access to the West through the Pennsylvania tunnels under the East River, Manhattan Island and the Hudson. The bridge is to cross the East River from Port Morris, in the borough of the Bronx, by Ward's Island and Randall's Island to the Long Island yards of the Pennsylvania, in the borough of Queens. It will be known as the New York Connecting Railroad, and will cost $30,000,000 for the twelve miles of its length.

Government Award for Indians.—As compensation for lands confiscated by the Government, the United States Court of claims awarded $3,408,611.40 to the confederated tribes of the Ute Indians. From time to time land had been taken from the Indians by minor treaties, and large forest preserves were taken out until the holdings of the Utes dwindled to a small acreage. In addition to the money compensation, a tract of the government lands in Colorado, containing nearly 15,000,000 acres, will be set aside for the Utes as a reservation.—During May the Treasury Department issued warrants in payment of the Cherokee claim of $5,000,000, for which an appropriation was made by the present Congress. There are 30,850 beneficiaries, who will receive about $133 apiece. Three-fourths of the Indians live west of the Mississippi. The claim was an old one dating back to the last century.

San José College Transferred.—The San José College, Manila, P. I., with its estates and appurtenances has been given over to the Society of Jesus. The college was founded in 1595 by Esteban Rodriguez de Figueroa. It was a Royal and Papal University. By the will of the founder, the revenues of the estate were to be used for the education of priests, and the college was to be conducted by the Jesuits. A large number of bishops and religious of various orders were alumni of the college. At the time of the expulsion of the Jesuits from the Philippines, the property of the Society was confiscated by the government; but the San José College was given to the archdiocese of Manila. About thirty-five or forty years ago a Dominican Archbishop transferred it to the Dominicans, and with its revenues they conducted their Medical School, known as the San José College of Medicine of the University of Santo Tomás.

Shortly after the beginning of American occupation, the government entered suit for the possession of San José. The record of the case fills a good-sized volume. As the Jesuits had to relinquish all claims to former possessions when reentering the islands fifty years ago, they made no claim of any kind to the property. On April 13 the official cable from Rome came to the Apostolic Delegation to notify the Archbishop, the Governor-General, the Dominicans and the Jesuits that the San José College was transferred to the Jesuits. The latter receive the right to confer all degrees in theology, etc., and the other privileges connected with this famous college. The Dominicans had had the exclusive right of conferring degrees up to this.

Mexican Boundary Dispute.—The United States has suggested to Mexico that the boundary question concerning the celebrated Chamizal Zone case be submitted to arbitration. The question involved is whether the southern section of the city of El Paso, Texas, valued at several millions of dollars, belongs by right under the boundary treaty of the United States with Mexico, to Mexico or to the State of Texas.

Building Statistics in Canada.—A statement issued by the Labor Department of Canada shows that, during 1909, the total value of new buildings in the eighty-two chief industrial centres of the Dominion was $85,133,077, an increase of approximately fifty per cent. over the figures for 1908. Of the eighty-two cities and large towns covered by the report only sixteen reported a decrease as compared with the previous year, and in no case did the decrease amount to more than half a million dollars. Sixteen cities each report new buildings costing in the aggregate one million dollars or more. Toronto headed the list with new buildings valued at $18,139,247. Next came Winnipeg, with $9,226,325; Montreal, with $7,783,621; Vancouver, with $7,258,565; and Ottawa, with $4,527,500. Building permits issued since the beginning of the present year show that in nearly every Canadian city last year's high record is being again far surpassed. There is a general scarcity of men in the building trades.

Great Britain.—The Wellington colliery took fire at Whitehaven. Though comparatively few men were in it at the time, the number of those that perished is 136. Among them were fifty Catholics.—Mr. Roosevelt has been made an honorary D. C. L. by Cambridge University.—Not a few public characters have taken occasion, in speaking kindly of the personal qualities of the late King, to proclaim openly their disloyalty to the Constitution.—A Welsh movement is on foot to demand that, when the King's eldest son is made Prince of Wales, he be invested with special ceremonies in which the Arch-Druid shall take the leading part. Who or what the Arch-Druid is, is not very clear. Anyhow, the movement originates amongst the Ultra-Nationalists and is not likely to come to anything.—The late King's death has produced a larger quantity than usual of bad verse. That of the Poet Laureate, Alfred Austin, is conspicuous for its worthlessness, having but one merit, brevity.—Mr. Keir Hardie, the English Socialist, led lately a deputation of 300 of his followers to Lille, where they were received with enthusiasm by the French Socialists. For reasons, drawn no doubt from the circumstances, there was much talk of Christian Socialism, and Mr. Hardie appeared in the unusual character of a Christian orator. His Christianity of course had not only been reduced to the lowest terms, but had also been deprived of many of its prime factors.

Ireland.—A votive Mass, offered in the Pro-Cathedral, Dublin, in recognition of King Edward's friendly services, and for the success of his successor in promoting the general welfare and Ireland's in particular, was attended by all classes. Archbishop Walsh in ordering the Mass said there is no longer danger that the dignified expressions of sympathy, coming in such numbers from the representative bodies of the country, would be misrepresented as indicating a change in their political views. Their feeling is one of regret for the death of a monarch who wished them well; the church will unite with them in offering a solemn Votive Mass, Pro Quacunque Necessitate; and the Hymn of the Holy Ghost will be sung that the new King may have the guidance of the Most High and see inscribed in the annals of his reign "Hibernia Pacata." The Dublin Corporation, in a called meeting, passed a resolution demanding that the phrases offensive to Catholics be expunged from the King's Oath. Nearly all the public bodies of the country have passed similar resolutions and instructed the Irish Party to take active measures towards carrying them into effect.—The report of skirmishes between the supporters of Mr. O'Brien and the Irish Party in Cork, has been greatly exaggerated. Mr. O'Brien's friends, who regard Cork as their appanage, considered Mr. Redmond's appearance there "an invasion," and especially resented the presence of Messrs. Devlin and Dillon who, with T. P. O'Connor, had just held in Armagh, Cardinal Logue's Primatial seat, a meeting which was construed as a threat to the Cardinal because he had voted for Mr. Healy at the last election.

The Belgian Elections.—The returns from the elections for the Chamber of Deputies indicate a loss of two votes by the Catholic Ministry, headed by M. Schollaert, which now has a majority of only six. The Liberals and Socialists had combined this year to crush the Catholics, who have been in control in Belgium for the past 26 years. One plank of their platform demanded the enforcement of compulsory neutral education as against the present system, which stands for religious schools.

French Academy.—On May 26 the members of the French Academy assembled for the election of a successor to Cardinal Mathieu and of another to the Marquis Costa de Beauregard. Mgr. Duchesne, member of the Institut (Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres), and Director of the Ecole Française of Rome, was elected to succeed Cardinal Mathieu. His competitors for this honor were Mgr. Baudrillart, Rector of the Catholic Institute of Paris, and M. Stephen Liégeard, a poet, who is eighty years old. For the second vacant chair the candidates were: General Langlois, M. Pierre de Nolhac, conservator of the Versailles museum, the Vicomte de Saint-Geniès (in literature Richard O'Monroy) and M. Maurice Maindron. General Langlois and M. de Nolhac each obtained fifteen votes. But the election in their case is void and will have to be resumed later on.

French Punitive Raid.—Last January Captain Fiegenschuh, an Alastian in the service of France, fell a victim to the treachery of certain native chiefs in the Wadai, a protectorate of France, forming part of the Chad Territory or hinterland of French Congo. He and his whole column were annihilated. A cablegram from Paris now announces the success of a punitive raid against the traitors. A despatch from Fort Lamy in the Chad Territory states that Captain Chauvelot, at the head of a column of Saharan troops, overtook the authors of the massacre in the far-off region of Dar Tama. The natives, routed by the French, lost one hundred men killed, eight of whom were chiefs. Captain Chauvelot seized all the arms of the rebellious tribe. Twelve Saharan sharpshooters were wounded.

Another French Submarine Wrecked.—The French navy, which has already lost three submarines, and in two cases a commander and twenty-six men, deplores the additional loss, on May 26, of the submarine Pluviose with three officers and twenty-four men two miles out of the harbor of Calais. She was sent to the bottom of the English Channel by the steamer Pas de Calais, which struck the partly submerged vessel. At first the captain of the steamer thought he had collided with a submerged buoy, but the passengers immediately noticed in the wake of their steamer the rounded hull of a submarine just emerging from the surface. A boat was lowered and the sailors rapped in vain on the shell of the submarine, which after a few minutes sank in thirty fathoms of water. Divers were brought to the scene as quickly as possible in the hope of saving the twenty-seven imprisoned officers, but they could not get far enough down. Efforts were then made to raise the submarine, and on May 27, the Matin reported that chains had been made fast to the Pluviose and that a diver had heard rappings in the interior. Experts cannot understand why this submarine did not keep to the surface in such crowded waters. But Admiral Fournier thinks that the Pluviose was attempting to dive under the Pas de Calais. This latter steamer leaked so much that it had to be towed back to the port of Calais, which it had but just left on its way to Dover.

A German Professor and American Schools.—Last week Professor Siebert, recently exchange teacher in Boston and who has traveled much in the United States, gave a notable talk on the American Schools before a gathering of teachers in Eberswald, Potsdam. He found something to blame and much to praise in the school system of the United States. He was particularly sharp in his criticism of school children here for their lack of respect and reverence towards their teachers. Especially worthy of praise and imitation the Professor affirmed to be the growing tendency to manual and industrial training in American schools.

Germany's Liquor Question.—Despite the energetic efforts of public and private bodies in the empire to stamp out the excessive use of alcoholic stimulants, recent correspondence of the Volksverein bureau presents alarming evidence of the widespread influence of King Alcohol. The bureau quotes statistics from the Reichs-Arbeits-blatt (1910, No. 3) which go to show that the German people can scarcely be numbered among the temperate drinkers of the world. It expresses regret, too, to chronicle the fact that the immoderate use of alcohol appears to prevail chiefly among the working people. Its general figures stun one. The statistics quoted show yearly expenditure in the empire of nearly three thousand million marks (three milliards) for alcoholic drink. As the correspondence adds, this immense sum is more than double the total expense of the army and navy, more than four times that expended in the insurance of workmen throughout the empire, and more than five times the amount set aside for the public elementary schools.

Kaiser William and the World's Peace.—Kaiser William was termed the natural leader of a world-wide association whose purpose would be the preservation of peace among the nations. The proposition to form such an association to be named after the late King Edward was urged by a speaker in a recent session of the Peace Congress in Guild Hall, London. Sir William Mather, who proposed the association, pleaded as one reason for its formation the fact that "Kaiser William was willing to hold a prominent place in a project of the kind, if not the actual leadership of the movement."

The German Reichstag.—The Kölnische Volkszeitung has this to say of the efficiency of the Imperial parliament during the session which came to an end with the Pentecost holidays: "The body may deservedly lay claim to industry, and in general it has done good work. In one essential detail the session showed a praiseworthy departure from the record of the parliamentary session immediately preceding it. With the downfall of the Bülow bloc which marked the close of the latter, opportunity was once given for the transaction of real business instead of the play of mere politics. The cooperation of willing and capable members for the enactment of measures tending to the common good was not rendered impossible through the selfish policy of the dominant majority: Even the Social Democrats deserve recognition for the positive help they contributed in the discussion of the potash bill. In one word the session of the Reichstag just ended is far from occupying second place when its record for useful work is compared with that of the Bülow parliament."

Shorter Working Hours for Women.—The ten-hour day for working women since January 1, 1910, made obligatory by legal enactment, appears to have been introduced with none of the disturbing results foretold by interested opponents of the measure. The law is binding in all establishments where ten persons at least are employed. The year book of the Factory Inspection Department of the Grand Duchy of Baden for 1909 has been issued and it reports favorably on the new law. In that district the change to the ten-hour day was introduced in the closing months of the year and no industrial difficulties resulted.

Elections in Hungary.—The Ministry has asked the King—Emperor Francis Joseph is King in Hungary—to issue the royal mandate for the meeting of the new Parliament on June 22. This fixes the elections for June 2-11. Central Committees of the different municipalities appoint the balloting day and select the presiding officials for each voting place. Naturally this gives the stronger party in the various districts considerable advantage, since the president is in full control of the election and has independent authority over police and soldiery on election day. In the multiplicity of parties and factions putting up candidates for the coming elections, it is difficult to make a forecast. The Khuen-Hedevergy or government party expects to poll a majority, but it is certain its majority will be a small one in case the expectation be realized. A victory for the government will mean renewed dominance of the Magyars, since the proposed manhood suffrage which would equalize party strength in the kingdom has been abandoned. Hungary, it is said, is not yet ready for such an extension of the franchise. Justh declares that he will continue his obstructive tactics, and if his party proves to be strong enough to make trouble, the disturbance and unrest marking Hungary's politics for some time back will continue, to the great detriment of its national well-being.

Austrian Dreadnoughts.—Answering an interpellation of the Reichsrath, Finance Minister Dr. von Bilinski declared that he had no official knowledge of the building of any Dreadnoughts by Austria. The government had contracted for none, and no money grant for the purpose had been approved by parliament. He added that a private firm had undertaken to build ships of the class, but at its own risk. It was probably designed, he concluded, to sell the Dreadnoughts now building to some foreign nation, in case Austria did not later agree to take them over.

Protest Against an Italian Law Faculty.—The Committee on Advanced Schools representing the German Union in the Austrian Reichsrath has entered formal protest against the approval of a proposed Italian Law Faculty for the University of Vienna. The protest is founded on the claim that such a step would mean the immediate introduction of bi-lingual instruction in the schools of Lower Austria, and as occurs in other districts, would lead to jealousies and quarrels between Italian and German students. The German Union insists that the principle of exclusive German teaching in the schools of the Crown Land of Lower Austria is to be maintained at all hazards.

Dr. Robert Koch.—The eminent bacteriologist, Dr. Robert Koch, died May 27 in Berlin. He had been in failing health for a year or more as a result of the exposures to which he subjected himself during his scientific research work in malarial districts in German East Africa and elsewhere. Recent reports had announced that he was in a fair way to complete recovery, but acute heart disease developed two weeks ago and the end came. Dr. Koch was in his sixty-seventh year. His fame will rest chiefly on his preparation in 1891 of tuberculin as a remedy for phthisis and similar affections. Born in Klausthal, Hanover, Dec. 11, 1843, and graduated from Göttingen University in 1866, Dr. Koch held a professorship in the University of Berlin since 1885. He became director of the famous Bacteriological Institute on its foundation in 1885, and has ever since creditably filled that important post.

An Expression Worth Remembering.—Commenting on the Duez scandal and sharply arraigning the criminal policy which has characterized the liquidation of church property in France, the liberal Protestantenblatt of Germany makes a remarkable admission. After describing how the millions which had been looked forward to as an endowment for a proposed workingmen's insurance scheme in France had been frittered away by a band of common thieves who used official place to enrich themselves, the paper adds: "It is surprising that a Kulturkampf is found in every instance to have bound up with it a scandal of some kind."

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Memorial Day

Some years ago a circular issued by the Grand Army of the Republic Memorial Association declared: "First through devotion of the soldiers of the Civil War for their fallen comrades, supported by the fervent gratitude of a patriotic people and a lofty pride inspiring the law-makers of our land, Memorial Day was fittingly established. It is a day dedicated and set apart that worthy tribute may be paid and tender memorials offered to the memory of those who defended the integrity of our national life throughout the long night of its deepest, darkest peril."

True words these and fittingly expressive of a solemn and holy feature of Memorial Day, yet they fail to make clear another reason for the day equally worthy to be recalled. Memorial Day has its strengthening influence for the living as well as its tender memorials of the dead, and it were mayhap well for all of us, whilst not forgetting the latter, to pay earnest heed to the helpful tonic which the day's associations afford.

There are those in the land who are ever keen to sound the warning cry of danger ahead because of fancied conditions portending evil. To-day, they tell us, we are living in a sunlight of apparent peace and material prosperity,—in a sunlight so alluring, so bright and beautiful that it almost dazzles us blind. And meantime the terrible lesson of the need of high ideals of civic virtue and lofty patriotism which half a century ago God wrote all over the face of this broad land with the sword's point dipped in the blood of the bravest and best is being carelessly ignored and willingly forgotten. Of a truth, it is well for us to recall the story which Memorial Day tells, lest the dark forecast dishearten us.

The public appetite for exposures, far from decreasing among us, seems to be gaining by what it feeds upon. A notable effect of the widespread inclination to satisfy the appetite has been a growth of exaggerated fear lest the old-time virtue of American patriotism, the old-time savor of civic integrity be fast disappearing, giving place to a destructive selfishness which bodes ill for the future development of the Democracy of our Western world. In truth, it is well for us to find in the memories of the day calm assurance to drive out the fear.

Strange fads and wilder fancies are taking root, so men say, among us. The good, simple ways of our forefathers, who found contentment in homely comforts won through unceasing toil are displaced by the strenuous ways of modern leaders in industrial life. Ruthless in their purpose to heap up more than abundance these reach out and aim to make the nation's holy of holies,—her legislative, judicial and executive power—but an instrument to further the aims of insatiable greed. And over against them is ranged the people, so the wail goes on, sore at heart because of ever growing injustice, while they dream strange dreams and seek relief in the fallacies of an absurd economy that would destroy at once and forever individual energy and genius. Yes, it is well for us to find in the record of Memorial Day the assurance that it will not be necessary to paralyze ambition and energy in order to cure the evils that may prevail. So long as Memorial Day is sacred with us, so long as its lessons appeal to us, so long does there exist the proof that men of moral force and moral courage abide with us, who will stand fearless for the right.

The lessons of Memorial Day! Who may describe them? There are those with us still, grizzled veterans who drop tears upon the graves of their buried comrades, who remember its beginnings. Far down in the Southland the black clouds gathered. Reading a false construction into the organic law of the land, loving their own states with passionate love, with mistaken enthusiasm, brothers in a common country hurried into the awful storm of war. Men of the Northland met the onset and through bitter years heroes clad in the blue, heroes clad in the gray, were never lacking when the stirring reveille awoke the weary and war-scarred along a thousand miles of battle line and the bugle blare sounded the advance to the duty and the dangers of another day. Some yet with us breasted the storm of those fearful days;—some of us saw how hosts of defenders of the star-decked flag went down in the clash of that cruel war as wheat before the scythe, only to be followed by other hosts whose superb bravery preserved our union one and inseparable. Many of us are of this later day and know no more of the sacrifices which were endured that this government might live and liberty be forever established than we read in the story of the deeds of valor which won the plaudits of the world and compel the admiration of the ages. But all of us realize that we are citizens of a great republic whose enduring life is sealed in priceless blood and therefore do men scatter flowers of tender gratitude upon the graves of heroes and proclaim that, with God's help, liberty and law shall never suffer insult or endure dishonor in the land these died to save.

This is the significance of Memorial Day in our regard. And in the influence it exerts we forget the mere material greatness of our country to find encouragement and inspiration in the high morality and the exalted patriotism of our countrymen. Given the occasion these will flash out in splendor to-day as they did in the dark days two score and more years ago. Given the occasion they will flame out on the hilltops and light up the valleys and thrill the pulsing heart-beats of young and old—for are we not the heirs of that heroism and valor? And does not our reverent memory of the dead proclaim an undying faith that patriotism, honor and integrity are as indispensable to all good government in time of peace; as patriotism, sacrifice and valor are vital in time of war?

Credulity and Superstition

Many years ago a certain Colonel, now almost forgotten, was giving in San Francisco the lectures of which the impiety made him for the moment famous. And there was a certain young woman who heard him eagerly, coming away from each discourse more willing than ever to deny God and his revelation; so that soon she spoke boldly and proclaimed her disbelief loudly, as became one who had got rid of the chains of superstition.

Now there was also in San Francisco one who, under the name of Caxton, used to write in the newspapers—for as yet the days of the Argonauts still lingered and Bret Harte and Mark Twain had only just passed over into a larger field—wonderful tales to entertain the wise and to mystify the foolish. Such was his story of a boy who had on a sudden developed telescopic powers in his eye, by which he perceived in planets and stars things astronomers never dreamed of; and all credulous San Francisco went pouring into a frowsy suburb to see the marvel. One morning the sceptical young lady came to breakfast pale and without appetite. "You seem unwell," said a sympathetic gentleman. "Oh," answered the lady, "Have you read the paper this morning? Such a dreadful thing was never heard. Last night a policeman out beyond Bernal Heights saw a bright glare and going towards it found in a lonely field two men standing beside a pond which was blazing merrily. He rushed upon them, arrested one, but the other escaped. It appears that the two possess the secret of making water burn unextinguishably, and the authorities' first idea was to kill their prisoner and hunt down his companion, thus to rid the world of such dangerous knowledge. They changed their mind on receiving a letter from the one still at large, in which he declares that unless his partner be set free by a certain hour he will fire the Bay and thus inflame the Pacific Ocean, and so destroy the whole world in a tremendous conflagration." Caxton was at work again; and a young woman who did not believe the Bible and scoffed at the day of judgment, was so terrified that she could not take her breakfast.

She was one of many. These today—I write on Monday, May 6—are greatly troubled over what the comet will do next Wednesday night, and are inquiring diligently of men of science and newspapers to find out. When the answers are reassuring they take courage until less hopeful suggestions revive their alarm. Were they believers they would trust in God, who alone knows whether the earth will pass through the comet's tail and what would be the effect of such a passage. Christians know that sooner or later the world is to be consumed by fire, and that God, if He so willed, could use a comet's tail to begin the conflagration. Men of science know so little about comets that their discordant opinions are only more or less probable. Nevertheless, men hang upon these between hope and fear, because they will not have the faith which would fill them with confidence, even though the worst were about to befall. To the believers Our Lord says: "When these things begin to come to pass, lift up your heads and rejoice."

Faith is a virtue: the credulity of the sceptic, for there is also a pious credulity, is a vice. By the former one believes God, who has supreme claim to man's reasonable assent: by the latter one accepts, without sufficient reason, the word of another, who has no claim upon him. Akin to this credulity is superstition. The enlightened who won't believe God and do believe the newspapers, talk very contemptuously of the superstition of the Dark Ages. Superstition is a vice which attributes to creatures the attributes of the Creator, as for example, the absolute power of life and death or the knowledge of the future. Since it is a vice it is to be found at all times and in all places of this sinful world. Whether it prevailed more in the so-called Dark Ages than to-day would make fine matter for research. But that it is rampant to-day, even amongst sceptics, is undeniable. Mediums, clairvoyants, palmists, all do a thriving business, and they would astound us were they to reveal their most assiduous clients. A large Bank and Trust Company failed not long ago in a western city. In the investigation which followed it came out that its manager was in the habit of taking a medium's advice concerning his investments. Dissensions among Christian Scientists have made manifest how permeated with superstition is their scepticism, and the silly talk one hears on every side of lucky and unlucky days, numbers, actions, etc., proves how widely this vice is spread amongst those who profess very free opinions with regard to Divine Providence.

The paradox is not hard to explain. Man believes by nature. Even of this visible world he knows so little that he must believe if he would live. He must believe his butcher, his baker, his cook, those with whom he does business and a thousand others. He must believe men of science in their particular sciences, a Catholic would be the last to deny this; nay, he must believe even the newspapers. But his belief must be rational and discreet. Each must receive the credence that is his due, neither more nor less. Each must be believed in his own order. And so a rational and discreet belief of our fellows implies a supreme belief in God their Creator and ours. When He is rejected the faith which is His due goes in a vague, halting way to creatures, and the whole order of belief is confused, becoming a sort of insanity.

Outside this visible world there is the world invisible, of which man perceives himself to be a part and to which he must pass absolutely when his brief stay among visible things shall end. He cannot ignore it. He cannot stand apart and contemplate it as something speculatively interesting, but not touching him practically. He feels that it dominates him, that, though he reckons with every visible agent, there are invisible powers that can and do bring his designs to naught. He meets the inexplicable and the preternatural at every turn; and the more he looks into it, as those engaged in what they call psychical research must confess, the more dumbfounded he is at the tremendous part the unseen plays in the drama of the seen; and he is forced to recognize himself as belonging to the world invisible much more than to the fleeting visible world. Only one sane course is open to him, to accept the invisible God, his Creator and his last end, who reveals Himself and His providence, naturally in His creation, supernaturally in the full Christian revelation. If he will not have knowledge of things invisible from God, instinct drives him to seek it elsewhere. How strong this instinct is none knows better than they who are compelled to a continual effort of an obstinate will in order to crush it so that they may proclaim themselves pure Materialists and become the slaves of doctrinaires. "All men are vain in whom there is not the knowledge of God."

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

A Notable Funeral

A recent incident in Ireland, slightly noticed in the press, is more illustrative of Irish national feeling and temperament and their directive causes than many volumes. On May 11 two bodies were exhumed from the precincts of Nenagh jail, where they had lain in quicklime over fifty years, borne twenty-five miles in long procession by an immense multitude, and laid in consecrated ground in the burial-place of their people with the solemn ceremonies of the Catholic Church. Fifty priests chanted the services at the grave while over twenty thousand people knelt in prayer.

On May 11, 1858, William McCormack, aged twenty-three and his brother Daniel, aged eighteen, were hanged in Nenagh jail, on the charge of shooting a land agent named Ellis, near Templemore, in Tipperary. Ellis had a bad reputation as a man and an evictor, and at that time, when there were no laws to protect the tenant from the landlord's whim, Tipperary had a reputation for dealing summarily with such men. Ellis was shot, a large reward was offered for the discovery of the murderer and the McCormack brothers, tenants on the Ellis agency, were charged with the crime. They were splendid specimens of manhood, quiet and industrious, regarded as models by their priests and respected by their class. None believed them guilty, but Ellis had made an insulting proposal to their sister, and they had both gone to his house some days before the murder and told him quietly that he must not address her again. A young wastrel, whose father, a government employee, declared him, on oath, unworthy of belief, testified against them. The jury disagreed, but the landlord party and the government were determined to make an example. Another jury was summoned, from which Catholics and friendly Protestants were carefully excluded; the notorious Judge Keogh was in charge, and though he admitted that the evidence was worthless, and an alibi was proved, they were found guilty and promptly condemned to death. Efforts by the clergy and others to reverse the sentence were fruitless; the government Attorney-General, who had conducted the prosecution, and the ascendancy party of North Tipperary were so set against any questioning of their procedure that the evicted tenant who had shot Ellis and offered to declare himself, was advised not to do so, as it would not save the McCormacks. They were publicly hanged in Nenagh jail, declaring their innocence on the scaffold, offering their lives in atonement for their sins and asking the sobbing thousands to pray for their souls.

Their cases were regarded as typical, and rightly at that time, of the administration of justice in Tipperary. Their answer to the judge was remembered and every boy and girl knows it yet: "Death is welcome to us—we are as innocent as the child unborn." The Fenian organizers had but to mention their names to enroll recruits by the thousand; they were invoked in every agrarian movement and helped to make Tipperary the backbone of the Land League agitation. One of the results of that agitation is that the lands of which Ellis was agent, are now owned by the people, and the McCormacks' farm is in the absolute possession of their kin. When this happened they wanted "the martyred brothers," as they are universally called, interred with their fathers in hallowed ground, and this was made possible by another consequence of the Land League agitation.

To quiet agitation in Ireland the Balfour brothers introduced and passed the County Councils Bill. Among other effects of this measure, the administration of the county jails was taken from the hands of the landlord party and taken over by the elected representatives of the people. The North Tipperary Council promptly handed over Nenagh jail to the Sisters of Mercy, who turned a portion of it into a convent, planted flowers on the spot in which the McCormacks lay buried, and placed a statue of Our Lady in the window from which they stepped to the scaffold. The law of the land had kept them in a felon's grave for fifty-two years; the people's Council determined to make reparation by giving them the sacred burial, so dear to the Irish heart, of which they had been deprived, and laying their bones with those of their brethren in Loughmore.

Their bodies were exhumed May 9, and in spite of the quicklime in which they were laid, were found in a wonderful state of preservation. In massive coffins they were borne to the spacious Church of St. Mary, where men and women knelt continuously until the morning of May 11, when a solemn requiem Mass was celebrated, and the procession, headed by the clergy, the Christian Brothers and their pupils, the urban councils and other public bodies, started for Loughmore. Leaving Nenagh there were about ten thousand men from far and near. Proceeding in silence, except for the solemn music of twenty bands, their numbers were trebled when they reached the end of their twenty-five mile funeral march, at Loughmore, where services were held in the Church, the pastor and the Archbishop's representatives officiating, and the remains of the McCormack brothers were laid with their kin in holy ground.

When the last prayer was said a public meeting was addressed by John Dillon. The McCormack case, he said, was typical of an unholy system which for one hundred and twenty years had made law hateful and justice a mockery; in hundreds of Irish jails lay the bones of brave and guiltless men condemned by packed juries and partizan judges; but the imposing procession that passed over the plains of Tipperary that day was a sign that that system and the landlordism that supported and inspired it, was dead or tottering to its fall. Mr. Dillon then gave the history of the trial and the parliamentary inquiry that followed. His concluding words are worth quoting verbatim, as shedding light on the character of the audience and the orator:

"The elder brother said on the gallows: 'Boys, we are innocent of the blood of Mr. Ellis. I offer the sacrifice of my life in union with the sacrifice of Christ on the Cross. Let ye all pray for us.' He then kissed the crucifix he held in his hand, and while the hangman was adjusting the pinions he prayed fervently to Jesus, Mary and Joseph to intercede for all his persecutors. Daniel, the younger brother, then came forward and made this declaration:

"'Boys, we are innocent of the blood of Mr. Ellis by thought, word or deed. We had nothing to do with it. From the bottom of our hearts we forgive our enemies. Pray for us. We offer up the sacrifice of our lives to God in atonement for our sins.'

"They forgave their enemies; their souls rest in peace; and Tipperary to-day is not ashamed but is proud of them."

The incidents of this solemn, united tribute of clergy and people and the fact that an Irish orator chooses such a recital for his final appeal, tell their own tale of the national and religious temperament of the present-day peasantry of Ireland.

The Servant-Girl Problem

II.

The relation in which mistress and servant only too often stand to each other is drastically illustrated by the following conversation recorded in one of the guinea-a-column pages of Tit-Bits:

Her Ladyship: "Have you given Fido his soup?"

Buttons: "Yes, 'um."

"And his omelette?"

"Yes, 'um."

"And his cutlet?"

"Yes, 'um."

"And his jelly?"

"Yes, 'um."

Her Ladyship: "Then you may have some bread and cheese and go to bed."

If all masters and mistresses, on the one hand, and all servants, on the other, heeded the admonitions of the Apostle, there would be no servant-girl problem. "Servants," he says, "obey your carnal masters . . . in the simplicity of your heart, as Christ: not serving to the eye, as it were pleasing men, but, as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart, with a good will doing service . . . knowing that whatsoever good every one shall do, the same shall he receive from the Lord, whether he be bond or free. And you, masters, do the same things to them, forbearing threatenings: knowing that the Lord both of them and you is in heaven: and there is no respect of persons with Him."

Onesimus was a wretched slave, who, after robbing his master Philemon, a noble citizen of Colossae, fled to Rome, where he met St. Paul. The Apostle took compassion on him, and, receiving him with tenderness, converted him to Christianity, and sent him back to his master with an epistle in his favor. "I beseech thee for my son Onesimus," he writes, "whom I have sent back to thee. And do thou receive him as my own bowels: not now as servant, but instead of a servant, a most dear brother, especially to me: but how much more to thee both in the flesh and in the Lord? If, therefore, thou count me a partner, receive him as myself."

Our relations to those that serve us are indeed at the same time relations to our own deepest self.

Wassily Andreitsch, a purse-proud, hard-hearted Russian landlord, and his servant Nikita, were caught in a heavy snowstorm one bitter cold mid-winter night, as they were driving home from a fair. They could not go on. To pass the night in the open steppe was certain death. "I will take the horse from the sleigh, said Wassily to himself, "and ride to the nearest village." He did not care what became of Nikita. He is only a poor slave and his life cannot be as valuable as that of the rich Wassily! But the road was high-heaped with snow and riding was out of the question. "I will lie down in the sleigh," thought Wassily, "and Nikita must lay himself upon me; the warmth of his body will keep me from freezing to death. 'Tis true, Nikita will likely die—but then what is Nikita's life to Nikita or to the rest of the world?"—"Nikita is your brother!" a voice spoke within him, so clearly that he was startled, as by a voice from the dead. He looked down at the rough, uncouth form crouched in the bottom of the sleigh. In the morning master and man would be but clods of clay. He looked back at his own life and compared it with Nikita's. "Nikita is your brother!" This had never occurred to him before. His life seemed a barren waste to him now. What was it better than Nikita's? "I will save my life," he said, "by giving it for Nikita's." And he threw himself on the rigid form of his servant, chafed it and warmed it back to life. When the sleigh was dug out of the snow the next morning, Nikita was drawn forth alive from under the dead body of Wassily. "We gain ourselves," remarked Tolstoi, at the close of this story, "if we sacrifice ourselves. We become free ourselves, if we break the fetters of slaves; we become men ourselves, if we see the brother man in others."

Education, environment, political and personal liberty—all these are factors that have overturned the traditional relations of master and servant. Collision is inevitable unless "the master thinks himself out of his privileged soul." Not class domination but division of labor is the relation in which master and man stand to each other to-day.

The lady of the house must endeavor, above all, to find a counterbalance for the humiliation of personal dependence. She must respect the independence of her servant, furnish occasions for its exercise, arouse it when it is dormant; she will leave nothing undone to learn the art of arts—the art of commanding, of commanding in such a way that obedience will not be degradation.

Many housewives," writes Prof. F. W. Foerster, of Zurich, "complain of the immorality of their servant-girls and join societies for their moral uplift—but forget that they themselves, by their whole manner of dealing with them, undermine in them the strongest resisting force against temptation—the sense of their personal dignity." Let a woman who takes service from others, give them respect, tact, sacrifice in return. Let her beware of degrading the girl who does her menial work. Let her, on the contrary, enlighten her as to her dignity. The work she is put to do must not be useless, dead or deadening, like that of a treadmill; it must benefit both her and her mistress. The mistress, by her own example, must teach the servant that work is a duty and a blessing, not a burden and a humiliation. A woman whose whole time is taken up with social functions and novel-reading, arouses in her domestics the torturing feeling that they are obliged to work in order that she may throw her life away in doing nothing. Such a woman forgets that servants do not look at our daily lives "with the dull eyes of beasts of burden, but with the keen glance of the cultured soul" (Foerster, "Christentum und Klassenkampf").

How often does the mistress—unwittingly in most cases—kill little by little the spiritual, the higher life in her servant-girl, instead of fostering and intensifying it? She allows her only the shortest possible time in which to fulfill her most necessary religious duties. After working till a late hour Saturday night, the poor girl must attend a very early and very short Mass, or none at all. She needs courage and consolation against the hour of trial; she needs supernatural help to be always cheerful, always obedient; she needs strength to carry out her good resolutions,—but leisure is not given her to collect her scattered forces in prayer and to renew their ardor in the Sacrament of the Altar.

Prof. Hilty, the genial Swiss philosopher, once wrote to a lady who complained to him of the conduct of her domestic: "Look on your servants as a kind of friends and try to place yourself in this relation to them. That is the solution of the servant-girl problem; they are willing to exchange the feeling of liberty only for that of friendship." (Letters, p. 203).

By lodging and feeding her properly and paying her a fair wage, the lady of the house, has not done, and does not do her whole duty towards her servant-girl, nor has she advanced far in the solution of the servant-girl problem. Money cannot adequately pay for personal service—soul for soul must be given. Sympathy must be given, sympathy which, as Burke so beautifully defines it, is a sort of substitution, by which we are put into the place of others and affected in a good measure as they are affected. Love must be given, which is more than sympathy, for it is a "participation in the deepest inner life of others."

Along the lines here so imperfectly laid down the devoted men and women of the Catholic Girls' Protection Society are endeavoring to solve the much-vexed Servant-girl question. The year 1910 promises to become a banner year in the history of this movement. Two important Congresses will meet in August, an International Convention of the Station Mission at Bern, and in the same month an International Congress of the Anti-White Slave Trade Society in Madrid, the fourth of the kind; the other three were held in London (1899); Frankfort (1902), and Paris (1906).

Aeronautics and the Catholic Clergy

I—IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

Some readers might infer from the title of the article that it is of an apologetical character, and tries to explain, or explain away, some supposed hostility to aeronautics on the part of the Church or her clergy. We often hear, or read, of "the attitude of the Church toward science," and we are all pretty well tired of "the conflict between theology and science," and the like. But nothing of the kind is intended by this article; nor is there any need of an apologetical defence or vindication. The purpose is merely to show what part Catholic clergymen have taken in the attempts at solving the difficulties and mysteries of aerial navigation. Now-a-days one can hardly read a paper or a scientific publication without finding something about balloons, dirigibles, aeroplanes, flights, successful or otherwise. It may be surprising to hear that clergymen have taken an active interest in the development of aeronautics; and yet such is the case, as will appear from these pages. A recent article of a leading Catholic daily of Germany, the Kölnische Volkszeitung, April 26, 1910, contains valuable material on this subject, here supplemented from other sources.

The desire to fly into the aerial regions is by no means confined to modern times. In most ancient times, the aspiration to "rise to the ethereal fields," found expression in various fictions and myths. The most famous is that of Dædalus, the patron of the Greek artists' guilds, to whom many inventions were ascribed. The story of his flight is well known; how he made for himself and his son Icarus wings of feathers fastened together with wax; how Dædalus safely crossed the Ægean sea, but Icarus, coming too near the sun, so that the wax melted, dropped down into that part of the Ægean, which was called after him the Icarian. The first known medieval attempt at flying was suggested by this myth, and the first aeronaut of whom we have any reliable record was the monk Elmer (or Ailmer) of the Benedictine abbey of Malmesbury, England. The story is told in the "Chronicle of the Kings of England," written by the monk William of the same abbey, who lived not long after the event is said to have taken place. There is at present an additional reason to quote the story, namely, the mention of the appearance of a comet at the time, which as is believed, was no other than the one which is paying us a visit these days.

The passage in the chronicle runs as follows: "In the next seven years were three popes, Victor, Stephen and Nicholas, who diminished the vigor of the papacy by their successive deaths. Almost immediately afterwards, too, died Henry, the pious emperor of the Romans (Henry III), and had for successor Henry his son, who brought many calamities on the City of Rome by his folly and wickedness [The allusion is to the struggles of Henry IV with Gregory VII]. The same year Henry, King of France, a good and active warrior, died by poison. Soon after a comet, a star denoting, as they say, change in kingdoms, appeared trailing its extended and fiery train along the sky. Wherefore a certain monk of the monastery (of Malmesbury), by name Elmer, bowing down with terror at the sight of the brilliant star, wisely exclaimed: 'Thou art come, a matter of lamentation to many a mother thou art come; I have seen thee long since; but now I behold thee much more terrible, threatening to hurl destruction on this country.' He was a man of good learning for those times, of mature age, and in his early youth had hazarded an attempt of singular temerity. He had by some contrivance fastened wings to his hands and feet, in order that, looking upon the fable as true, he might fly like Dædalus; and collecting the air (whatever may be meant by this) on the summit of a tower, had flown for more than the distance of a furlong. But agitated by the violence of the wind and the current of air, as well as by the consciousness of his rash attempt, he fell and broke his legs, and was lame ever after. He used to relate as the cause of his failure his forgetting to provide himself a tail" (William of Malmesbury, "Chronicle;" tr. Giles; Bohn ed., p. 251-2).

It is interesting to note, that our aeronaut and the chronicler, though both "of good learning for those times," connected the appearance of the comet with the death of monarchs, war, and other calamities—as some are inclined to do in this twentieth century. This passage shows that certain statements concerning the event are not entirely correct; as when the above-mentioned article of the Cologne paper says that "the monk Oliver of Malmesbury, while attempting to fly from a tower by means of wings, met with death, in the year 1060;" or when the "International Encyclopedia" (vol. I, p. 154, art. "Aeronautics") asserts that "Elmerus, a monk of the thirteenth or fourteenth century, is said to have flown from the top of a tower in Spain." The writer from whom we get the information, William of Malmesbury, died before the middle of the twelfth century, and the comet mentioned is the one which appeared shortly before William the Conqueror invaded England, 1066. It may be added that the chronology of William of Malmesbury is rather loose and needs correction. Pope Nicholas II died 1016; Emperor Henry III died 1056; and King Henry of France died a natural death in 1060. From this it is evident that the appearance of the comet was not as close to the events mentioned as the chronicler thought. But from these inaccuracies it cannot be inferred that the monk could not have had certain knowledge of an attempt at flying, made by a monk of his own monastery. Such an occurrence would have been fresh in the minds of men after fifty years, although time may easily have added a goodly number of yards to the length of the flight, so as to make it a round furlong.

In the next century, the twelfth, aerial flight is mentioned in a curious fashion. In the German "Alexanderlied," composed by the Rhenish priest Lamprecht, among many adventures of the hero is described a journey through the air. Sixteen tamed griffins carried an iron seat. A bait, fastened to a pole and held before the hungry vultures, induced them to fly up into the air; by holding the pole this way or that, the hero could guide his craft. A strange dirigible, indeed, as strange as the steering apparatus which the monk Elmer had forgotten! Lamprecht's notion of griffins carrying a man seems to have been derived from Oriental sources; it is quoted here not as an attempt at solving aeronautic problems, but as an illustration of the persistency, and of the variety of forms, in which the idea maintained itself.

ROBERT SWICKERATH. S.J.

Bishop Flaget and His Diocese

A hundred years ago, on November 4, 1810, Benedict Joseph Flaget was consecrated first Bishop of Bardstown, which was one of four sees erected two years before—New York, Philadelphia and Boston being the others. His diocese comprised all of Kentucky and Tennessee, and he was given temporary administration of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. Until that time Bishop Carroll, with his see at Baltimore, had had jurisdiction over the whole of the United States.

That the nineteenth century was one of strenuous endeavor and marvelous achievement is nowhere evidenced more conclusively than in the history of those Middle States where, exactly a century ago, a poor but ambitious people joyfully received their first bishop, a bishop without money or resources, with a small and scattered flock and almost without priests. Nor has their development been purely material, as is the reproach frequently, and with reason, flung at the progress of the past decades. Now, the seven states which were once Bishop Blaget's charge, have each a large Catholic population governed by three archbishops and fifteen bishops. Each diocese has its own seminary, convents, colleges, academies, orphanages and hospitals.

In the light of present conditions it is not easy to realize the state of the country west of the Alleghanies in the early years of the past century. When Bishop Flaget was installed in his vast see ("two or three times as large as France," as he said) it could boast of but ten chapels, seven priests and perhaps a thousand families, many of whom had been deprived of the sacraments for years. In all of Ohio there was not one resident chaplain. Bardstown, the episcopal city, had no church. The bishop's first "palace" was a whitewashed log cabin sixteen feet square. The furniture consisted of a bed, six chairs, two tables and some boards to hold books. The priests slept on mattresses thrown on the floor. Bishop Flaget was penniless; worse, he owed the three hundred and eighty dollars it had cost him and his companions to reach Bardstown.

These conditions were typical of that section of the country. If the bishop's journey from Pittsburgh was a thirteen-day trip on a flat boat which carried small cannon and was provided with a bullet-proof cover to protect it from the attacks of the Indians and lawless marauders who infested the banks of the Ohio, it was because the first steamboat was not launched on that river until the following year, because the strong arm of the law was an unknown quantity in that sparsely settled district. Then, too, the Indians were unusually restive at the moment. The great patriot and dreamer, Tecumseh, was sowing the seeds of an uprising which, he imagined, would secure to the Red Man an empire in the heart of America.

Everything, men, mail and merchandise, reached the Ohio Valley in one of two ways. They crossed the mountains to Pittsburgh on horseback or in wagons, and from there floated down the river on flat boats; or they were carried up the Mississippi from New Orleans on keel boats. The latter journey was not only dangerous but well-nigh interminable, for in the depth of a wilderness peopled chiefly by savages the cumbersome craft were slowly forced up stream with the help of sails and oars and were even towed by boatmen walking along the bank.

Though born and bred in France, Bishop Flaget was not unaccustomed to pioneer life. On his arrival in America in 1792 Bishop Carroll sent him to Fort Vincennes as chaplain to the soldiers and missionary to the neighboring Indians. On his way to his post he was detained for six months in Pittsburgh by low water. While he waited he acted as chaplain to the army of "Mad Anthony" Wayne which was quartered there. He spent two toilsome years at Fort Vincennes and was then for a while professor in Georgetown College. Later he passed several years in Havana. Everywhere he was distinguished for piety, zeal and common sense, and his success was phenomenal.

During the forty years of his episcopate he accomplished much. Month after month he journeyed on horseback through one part or another of his diocese, confirming thousands, reanimating the faith of careless or faint-hearted Catholics and encouraging his little band of devoted priests. Every possible obstacle beset his path but, undaunted, he persevered. He founded a seminary, colleges for boys and academies for girls. He built a cathedral and many other churches. Rome had such confidence in his judgment that the greater number of bishops named for this country during twenty years were chosen by his advice, Bishops Fenwick, Spalding and Kenrick among them.

The Dominicans and Trappists preceded Bishop Flaget to Kentucky; the Jesuits founded a college there in 1832. Cholera raged through the South that year and the succeeding one and the priests belonging to the college devoted themselves with untiring zeal to caring for the spiritual needs of its victims. Several of them were stricken and one died. In those trying days the bishop, too, was all charity. He wore himself out in his effort to comfort and help his people.

As time passed Bishop Flaget became old and broken in health but he worked incessantly. He still lived on horseback, riding from settlement to settlement like the youngest and strongest of his missionaries. He traveled alone, "without any distinction of rank except that of taking for himself the most difficult and laborious share of the ministry."

When well past seventy he went to Rome in the interest of his diocese, and journeyed for four years through France and Italy trying to raise funds and secure priests for the evangelization of this country. After his return he asked and obtained permission to change the seat of his diocese to Louisville, which had grown prodigiously, far outstripping Bardstown. He became and styled himself Bishop of Louisville and Bardstown.

The gentle, learned, saintly old man lived for eleven years after the change, dying holily in 1850 in the eighty-eighth year of his age and the forty-first of his episcopate. He was one of our great Catholic pioneers who has earned grateful remembrance far beyond the diocese of Louisville, where he is still held in pious veneration.

FLORENCE GILMORE.

IN MISSION FIELDS

Missioners to Foreign Lands

The brief survey of the mission field and missionary activity which has appeared in Nos. 4-8, of The Catholic Mind, of the current year, has been supplemented by Ramón Gil, in an article on the sources of supply of both men and means for the great work of the propagation of the faith. Based on careful investigation, his statements and statistics may be taken as the latest word on the subject. Curious contrasts appear; and strange anomalies force themselves on our attention. Although the United States occupies a rather inglorious place on this roll of honor of the Church, the facts speak well for our European brethren and may hearten Americans to undertake some share of missionary toil.

Missioners are supplied chiefly by the religious orders, which though seemingly crushed out of existence a century ago, speedily revived and developed fresh strength as soon as there was a lull in the storm of persecution. There are to-day very few Orders which do not show zeal for active work in the mission field. The Trappists, even, who, it might be thought, would never dream of mission work among the heathen, have nevertheless undertaken it enthusiastically and have seen their labors singularly blessed of God.

Whatever meaning the word may stand for, it is clearly misleading to call one a "missionary" when he labors as pastor in a long-settled Catholic community in which the heathen are wholly absent and there is no fixed plan or attempt to evangelize such non-Catholics as may dwell in his district, for in such a wide sense the chaplain of a convent of Trappistines might be called by that glorious and distinctive title. Of the Orders most numerous in the mission field the chief are the Jesuits, with 1,200 priests and 800 brothers; the Franciscans, with over 800 priests and as many brothers; the Dominicans and Capuchins, with about 400 priests each, and the Carmelites with 150 priests. A strong proof of latter-day enthusiasm for the missions is seen in the venerable Order of St. Benedict, which, in modern times, concerned itself very little with the propagation of the faith, but is now renewing its former glories, and is again establishing in the midst of unbelievers abbeys like those of earlier days, which became centres of civilization and religion. Among the Congregations which have developed more strongly the zeal for spiritual conquest in non-Catholic lands must be mentioned the Lazarists and Oblates of Mary Immaculate, with 300 priests each, and the Marist Fathers, with 200 on the mission.

A comparatively recent development in the Church is that of Congregations and seminaries devoted exclusively or chiefly to missions among unbelievers. Such are the Congregations of the Holy Ghost and of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, Cardinal Vaughan's Mill Hill Fathers and Cardinal Lavigerie's White Fathers, and the Society of the Divine Word. This Society, founded as recently as 1875, has 115 priests in mission work and has already brought upwards of 100,000 into the fold of the Church.

The Seminary for Foreign Missions of Paris, though founded in the seventeenth century, has developed most gloriously since 1820, when it was reopened after the political upheaval in France. Its field is the Far East, where 1,400 priests are toiling. No Order, no Congregation, has given to the Church during the past century as many martyrs as this deserving Society. Similar seminaries are that of Milan, founded in 1850, and that of Lyons, founded in 1856.

The Apostolic School, begun in 1865, by the Rev. Albert de Foresta, S. J., at Avignon, France, for educating youths for the missions, has been reproduced elsewhere by the zeal and alms of the faithful, so that to-day many missioners among the heathen look back with gratitude to the Apostolic School as the means which enabled them to realize the hope of their pious adolescence and share the hardships and privations of missionary life.

Of the 6,000 European priests in the mission field, one-half are natives of France. Germany and the German element in Austria contribute freely both missioners and alms; but the Slavs and the Hungarians give insignificant alms, although the Hungarian clergy are the richest in the world, and, with the exception of some Poles, hardly a missionary. Switzerland and Holland respond nobly, but Portugal does little. In the colonial possessions of the Most Faithful King, where there are millions of pagans, there are few missioners, and these are not all Portuguese. Spain does comparatively little among the heathen, but Spanish priests are numerous in those countries which cannot properly be called mission lands and yet have not a sufficiently numerous native priesthood. In number of missioners Italy comes next to France, but it gives barely double the contribution of the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg towards supporting them.

Considering the great wealth of our country, it might be expected that the United States ought to contribute more liberal alms to the foreign missions, and we confess that though the faithful meet the frequent appeals for home interests with edifying generosity they could do better by those who are spreading the faith in distant lands; there is a strange apathy of our people with regard to vocations to the apostolic life of the missions. There are petty sects, known in no other civilized country, which maintain in pagan lands more American teachers of their religious vagaries than there are Americans engaged in those or similar lands in fulfilling the divine command, "Going therefore, teach all nations." When will the United States have its Seminary for Foreign Missions or its Apostolic School as a nursery for future missioners, even martyrs? A young and vigorous nation ought to have youth and vigor to spare for the missionary field. How long will the United States rank below Luxemburg as a mother of missionaries?

CORRESPONDENCE

Catholics and the Royal Declaration

LONDON, MAY 11, 1910.

In all our London churches on Sunday there was exposition of the Blessed Sacrament and prayers were offered for the new king, for the royal family and for the Empire. By order of the Archbishop of Westminster the Litany of the Holy Name is to be said daily in every church until the day of the king's funeral, the 20th instant. Catholics are thus showing in the most practical way their sympathy with the nation's sorrow. Some of them bore a prominent part in the solemn proclamation of the new king on Monday. It was a Catholic Earl Marshal, the Duke of Norfolk, who directed the proceedings, a Catholic officer of state who conveyed the proclamation to the City of London, and a Catholic Lord Mayor who presided at the ceremony here. From Catholic Ireland have come messages of condolence with the royal family and of regret for the death of King Edward, the most ardent Nationalists joining in these manifestations of goodwill. The Catholics of the Dominion of Canada and the Commonwealth of Australia have joined in the national mourning.

Under these circumstances there is not only among Catholics but also among all fair-minded men a feeling that before King George V is crowned a change ought to be made in the law which imposes on English sovereigns the obligation of making on their coronation an insulting declaration against the most sacred of Catholic beliefs. Mr. John Redmond has raised the question in a letter to Mr. Asquith, and the comments of the press are mostly favorable to this tardy act of justice being done. The Times to-day has, however, a leading article suggesting that there is in some quarters a disposition to shelve the matter. The Times writer grants that the form of the declaration as it stands is most objectionable, but goes on to say that it is doubtful if in the present session of Parliament time can be found for amending the law. It was on this plea of want of time that the matter was shelved at the beginning of King Edward's reign. Mr. Asquith may perhaps try in this way to evade the question, for fear of provoking an agitation among the bigots, to whose noisy outcry he was so weak as to yield on the occasion of the Eucharistic Congress.

Happily the Irish votes in the House are numerous enough to force the just claim of the Catholics on his attention, and he has already himself acknowledged that we have a grievance that calls for remedy. The royal declaration, as is well known, is in the form of an oath that denies transubstantiation and declares that "the invocation or adoration of the Virgin Mary or any other Saint and the sacrifice of the Mass as they are now used in the Church of Rome are superstitious and idolatrous."

The formula is the "Test Oath" which the Test Act passed by Parliament in the reign of Charles II, made a condition of the holding of all civil and military offices in order to exclude Catholics from the service of the state. The Bill of Rights passed under William III imposed it on the sovereign, and Queen Anne was the first English ruler who took the Test Oath on her coronation day. Until the Act of Catholic Emancipation of 1829, Members of Parliament had to take it before sitting in the House of Commons. On his first election for Clare, Daniel O'Connell came to the Speaker's table and refused to take the oath, declaring that he knew it included statements that were falsehoods. Even after the Act of Emancipation the law not only reserved to non-Catholics the offices of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and the Lord Chancellorship of England and Ireland, but obliged the holders of these dignities to prove that they were not Catholics by taking the oath. As long ago as 1867 the law was amended in so far that it was provided that no "subject" of the crown should be required to take the Test Oath. But the royal declaration remained part of the Coronation ceremony.

In the House of Commons in introducing the amending Bill, Sir Colman O'Loughlan said that the oath was a "relic of barbarism." Only four members voted against the bill, and in the House of Lords, Lord Kimberley, who had been Lord Lieutenant of Ireland said:—

"He had himself been called upon to make that Declaration before the Irish Privy Council, in the presence of a large number of persons of the Roman Catholic Faith; and he must say he had never in his life made a declaration with more pain than when he was required before men holding high office and for whom he had the greatest respect, to declare the tenets of their religion to be superstitious and idolatrous."

This is the painful position in which the existing law places the king. During the latter sessions of King Edward's reign more than one effort was made to have the offensive declaration abolished, but it is notoriously difficult to pass a bill through Parliament unless it is a Government measure.

Catholics do not object to some form of words by which the king would declare himself a loyal Protestant, and they admit that in the existing state of opinion in England some such form would have to be substituted. The practical difficulty is to choose the substituted form. Catholics cannot propose this, but they leave it to the ministry to find a satisfactory solution.

Mr. Asquith has on one occasion at least gone so far as to say that personally he would be inclined to have no declaration, as the Act of Settlement provides that the king must be a Protestant, and this ought to suffice. In the debate in the House of Lords in 1903 the Archbishop of Canterbury said it would be enough for the king to declare himself a Protestant without the use of "offensive and insulting words." This is the feeling of even the most earnest Protestants outside the narrow circle of the Kensitite bigots. And there is now some hope that before the coronation the law will be altered.

Christian Brothers in the Philippines

MANILA, APRIL 18, 1910.

The Christian Brothers have purchased a building and grounds for a select school and academy in Manila. It will be opened in June, 1911. The government is using the place at present as an "American School" for the children of Americans and Europeans. Permission has been given the government to continue its lease for another year.

The new school will be under the direction of Brothers from the United States. It will therefore be the first establishment of a religious house in the Philippines by Americans. The matter has been under consideration for a long time. The Holy Father urged the matter personally with the General of the Brothers.

Archbishop Harty has just purchased from the government two parcels of former Friar-lands; the one, situated in Laguna province at Calamba, will be used as a girls' industrial school; the other, in Bulacán province at Lolomboboy, as an industrial school for boys. The latter institution will in all probability be opened in July. It is the intention to make it something like the Westchester Protectory. Nothing of the kind has thus far been established in the Islands. The work is looked on with great favor by all parties here as "filling a long-felt want." So too, for the Brothers' new school. Thank God it will be conducted in English, and we shall have at last one Catholic American school for boys.

Recent General Elections in Spain

MANRESA, SPAIN, MAY 15, 1910

To-day came out what you might call a trustworthy report of the general elections. The figures are approximately the following: Liberals 230, Conservatives 106, Republicans 44, Regionalists 9, Carlists 9, Integrists 2, Socialist 1, Independents 8.

The Republicans, as it appears, are growing in strength. In Madrid itself they won six places out of eight. Canalejas is willing to attribute their success not so much to their recruiting from other political parties, as to the fact that they utilize every vote, while the other parties lose ground through inaction and division.

The Liberals and the Conservatives are, at present, the two leading parties. They rule by turns, and pledge one another support. Canalejas, the head, to all appearances, of the Liberal party, now in power, feels sure of his position, owing to the support of his friendly opposition—the Conservative party. I called Canalejas the head of his party, not without a qualification, for the simple reason that the Liberal party is not now a unit, as it was during Sagasta's time. It is made up of the followers of Canalejas, of those of Moret, and of those of Romanones, all striving, of course, to place their god on the pedestal.

The other parties of the opposition, especially the Republicans, are directing their fight principally against the Conservatives. They realize too well that this party, with its large minority and especially under the stern and watchful discipline of Maura, will practically dictate its laws to the government.

Some even go so far as to say that Maura is really the power behind the throne, and that Canalejas is but allowed to sport the grandeur of a stage king.

In this unsettled state of things the redeeming feature is the King himself, who is a Catholic not only in principle but also in practice, and knows how to step to the front whenever the cherished traditions of his Catholic realm are at stake. This may throw some light on the sudden downfall of Moret.

Distinguished Visitors to Ottawa

The Capital of Canada has been favored of late by the presence of two distinguished churchmen, both of whom have a special interest in that city, and for its inhabitants, since both were former students and professors of Ottawa University.

The first of these is the Most Rev. Augustine Dontenwill, D.D., Bishop of Germanicopolis for twenty-one months, of New Westminster for nine years, Archbishop of Vancouver for fourteen days, and now Archbishop of Ptolemais, Asia Minor. A fortnight after he had been appointed Archbishop of Vancouver he was elected Su-prior-General of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, an office which will necessitate his future residence in Rome. He has spent some time, however, in visiting the various houses of his Congregation in the United States and Canada, and has recently made Ottawa his headquarters for a time. Needless to say that he met there with a warm and cordial reception, especially from the faculty and students of the university, of which he was, after his college days, a much-beloved professor; and from the parishioners of St. Joseph's who remembered him as assistant pastor to Father Pallier in the old church.

At the university, a brilliant reception was tendered to the man who, while still comparatively young, had been already chosen for three such important offices by the Holy See and his religious brethren. Addresses were presented both in French and English, very happily expressive of the lustre which had been shed upon those Academic halls by the former student and professor. A special feature of the evening was the rendering of a Latin hymn, Dominus Custodiat, composed for the celebration by Francis W. Grey, Lt.D., and set to music by one of the leading musicians of Ottawa, M. E. Tremblay.

On the following evening a banquet, held in honor of the distinguished guest, was attended by a number of prelates, by the metropolitan clergy and many others from a distance, as also by many representative laymen, including alumni of the university. After the banquet, the English Debating Society held its annual prize debate in the presence of the guest of the evening and those who had assembled in his honor. To the Catholic citizens of Ottawa it has been a privilege to renew their acquaintance with the distinguished Oblate, and to honor in him those commanding qualities which have won such notable recognition.

The second of the illustrious visitors to the Capital was the Rt. Rev. M. F. Fallon, D.D., the newly consecrated Bishop of London, Ont., who, returning thus in the dignity of the purple, was emphatically coming home. For, although when he was born his Irish father and mother were living at Kingston, Ont., it was at Ottawa that he finished his university studies, entered the diocesan seminary, and finally the Oblate Congregation. He was sent to make his novitiate in Holland, but ill-health caused him to be transferred to Rome. In 1894 he continued his course at the Gregorian University in that city, and was raised to the priesthood. Almost immediately after he returned to Ottawa, and became Professor of Discipline and later Professor of English at the university. He was made assistant rector under Father McGuckin, and acting rector for a period of some months. As early as his college days he was one of the founders and first editors of The Owl, an excellent college journal, since superseded by the Ottawa University Review. He contributed an article to its first number. Later on, following his ordination, he made another effort in journalism by the foundation of a Catholic paper, The Union, to which he contributed interesting and forceful papers. The times were not, however, ripe for such a venture. He also attracted considerable and favorable attention from such journals as the London Tablet, for his agitation touching the Coronation Oath of the English Sovereign, which had the effect of causing a resolution to be introduced in the Canadian House of Commons by Hon. John Costigan, and the mooted of the affair in England.

In 1898 Father Fallon became pastor of St. Joseph's Church, where he won a lasting place in the affections of his people by his ready sympathy, tact and warm-hearted devotion to their interest. A brilliant pulpit orator; he also made his mark as a keen and able controversialist. He was conspicuous in the cause of education, and advanced as far as lay in his power the interests of the juvenile members of his flock. He became County Chaplain of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, and to his efforts was due the organization of their first annual parade. In 1901 he was called by his superiors to Buffalo, where he remained until his elevation to the episcopate, acting in the twofold capacity of rector of the church of the Holy Angels and superior of Holy Angels' College. With the same force and energy as during his Canadian pastorate, but with wider opportunities, he devoted himself to the work of education, and constructed what is said to be one of the finest primary schools in the United States. In the interim he was made Provincial of the Oblates for the Northern Province of the United States, an appointment which gave a still more extensive scope to his energies. He purchased a valuable property near the Catholic University in Washington as a house of studies for Oblate theological students, and established missionary houses of his Congregation in Nebraska, Wisconsin and Oregon.

He took, during his residence there, a leading part in the public life in Buffalo, so that his departure thence was viewed with regret by citizens, irrespective of creed. He was tendered a farewell banquet, which was attended by ministers of various denominations and by the leading Jewish rabbi. His own parishioners presented him with three thousand dollars in gold. London is therefore to be congratulated on having secured for its long vacant See a prelate who must adorn the "vesture of holiness" and tend to the advancement and the glory of the Church. Previous experience shows that he is certain beforehand of innumerable friends in the diocese to which he goes as a complete stranger. A. T. S.

The Hong Kong University

SHANGHAI, APRIL 18, 1910.

Education is making headway in China, and officials and people are doing their best to furnish it to every child of the Empire. In olden times, the Government had never the idea of educating its youth intellectually, morally and physically; it tested scholarship and utilized the successful candidate for government purposes. This system is now changed, and schools—especially of the elementary kind—have sprung up on all sides. In these institutions, it must not be considered that success has been attained everywhere. Competent management, solid teaching and sound discipline are generally lacking. In the Middle and Higher Grade schools little or nothing has been done, principally owing to the dearth of competent teachers, and the necessary funds required to carry on such important work. To secure higher education, China has been compelled to send her young men to Japan, but the stream has much slackened of late, as it was found that results were of a shallow and superficial character. To despatch students to other countries is held to be very expensive, and when they return it is considered they are rather denationalized. In fact, students sent abroad have not given satisfaction. Too many have imbibed materialistic and revolutionary ideas, and hence are held in suspicion and little employed by the Government. China, therefore, prefers the "home-educated man," and it is to lend her a helping hand that the Hong Kong University has been started by the British Government.

The scheme originated in 1908. From that time forward, the British Minister in Peking, the Viceroy of India, the Governor of the Straits Settlements, the China Association, the Chancellor of Oxford, Lord Curzon, the Municipality of Shanghai, the British Shipping companies of the East, the Viceroys of Canton and Nanking, the gentry and Chinese merchants of the Southern provinces have all supported the work and labored strenuously for its success. The Governor of Hong Kong, Sir Frederick Lugard, has more than any other worked enthusiastically in the matter.

To make a start, it was necessary to have an endowment fund of £110,000 ($550,000 gold), equivalent in the local currency of Hong Kong to $1,250,000, and an annual revenue of £6,000 ($30,000 gold). In the course of last year, a committee was formed for the purpose of collecting funds. A rich Chinaman in Saigon (French Cochinchina) contributed $10,000 (Mexican silver) towards the endowment. Messrs. Butterfield and Swire—a large British shipping company—have promised £30,000. A sugar-refining company £5,000 and the Ocean Steamer Company another £5,000. The Chinese have subscribed altogether the sum of $200,000 (silver, Mexican). At the close of 1910 the endowment fund reached $1,400,000 (silver, Mexican), a sum more than was originally required. Placed at interest this will bring in a further amount of $60,000 to $75,000 before the University starts on its career. The above sums will be subsequently enlarged as the University grows, and no doubt every year will add to them. The Colonial Government has given the land required for the work. It is situated at the junction of Pokfolum and Bonham roads. The building will cost from $285,000 to $300,000 (silver, Mexican). A rich Parsee merchant, Mr. H. N. Mody, has generously offered to contribute this amount and a further sum of $30,000 towards the endowment.

The University will be open to all nationalities and creeds, though it is principally established for the Chinese. The program will be similar to the English Universities of Leeds and Birmingham. There will be a full course in Chinese classics and history, Arts, Medicine and Engineering. The Hong Kong Medical College, founded in 1887, for Chinese, will be incorporated in the new institution. From its inception, over 20 years ago, only thirty-six of its men have graduated as licentiates, but the diplomas were not recognized by the British Government. Instruction will be given in English, now the great vehicle of instruction in China, especially in the higher and technical branches, which so far have no fixed terminology in the Chinese language. The full attendance of students will be 500, each paying annual fees $250 to $300 (silver), a rather heavy sum for the Chinese, whose financial resources are generally slender. In the United States, tuition alone would be hardly covered by such an amount, except in the Chicago University, where it is as low as $120 (gold). In the others it is generally quoted at $150 (Harvard, Columbia), but at Yale it reaches even $155. Externs will be afterwards admitted, provided they live in approved hostels under the supervision of the staff. The English Government has promised to furnish scholarships to the value of £300 a year. Chinese who have contributed $10,000 (silver) towards the endowment are also entitled each to one scholarship. The Institution will be under the management of a Senate of its own. The London University will conduct the examinations, and in order that the diplomas may be recognized in Great Britain and the Colonies, it is expected that a Royal Charter will be granted for this purpose.

Assessment of Charitable Institutions

"If you take the assessments off the churches, who pays them? Do those who go there and live in the neighborhood pay them in the end, and do those who do not go to the church have to pay their share as well? Why should not the churches pay them?"

In these words the Mayor of New York City lately voiced his opinion that churches and private charity corporations should pay assessments for public improvements—for street work of all forms, which includes the opening of streets and avenues, regulating grading, sewerage and paving—and the usual water rates. The question of the distinguished official is not hard to answer—the same policy prevailing in Manhattan during many years more than satisfactorily explains why these corporations should not be thus burdened. Following an approved principle in social economics the authorities heretofore have looked upon all such institutions as quasi-public in character. Their work is recognized as directly helpful to the common good. Their enterprise in no way tends to private gain or to the building up of private fortune. Their unvarying purpose is to assist public authority in carrying on needed religious, moral and charitable activity absolutely essential in the well-ordered conduct of the affairs of the community.

They, finally, burden themselves with an immense expense, which did they fail to carry it with generous unselfishness, would needs be thrown back upon the community in some or other form of taxation. Doing the work of the community, and doing it without a shadow of emolument accruing to those charged with their management, these institutions have heretofore been classed as public institutions and therefore have been exempted from the burdens of taxation assessed for the upkeep of the community. And any suggestion of change in the public policy now prevailing will be an unfortunate step backwards from the liberal attitude which holds churches and schools and charitable institutions to be a valuable asset of the State tending to promote good government and moral living. We wonder what the gentleman whose words we quote in the opening sentence, would reply to a Catholic using a like argument in the matter of school taxes. "Do those who do not use the public schools have to pay their share of the school tax as well?"

Mr. Leishman's ^ABête Noire

"Mr. Leishman, the American Ambassador in Rome, has not yet volunteered any explanation of the reasons which induced him to lead Mr. Roosevelt so painfully astray on the occasion of his visit to Rome." This we gather from Rome, in its issue of May 14. The same trustworthy source supplies us with the details of another occurrence in which Mr. Leishman was again officious and obnoxious where Catholic interests were concerned. Recently General Woodford was sent to Rome by the Hudson-Fulton Committee to present the King with the Gold Medal commemorating the centenary of the discovery of the Hudson. The General was also the bearer of an address acknowledging the many ties that to-day bind Italy and America, and mentioning the "spiritual relations which connect a large number of our people with their religious Head in Rome."

The address was signed by General Woodford himself, Andrew Carnegie, Joseph H. Choate, Frederick D. Grant, Seth Low, J. Pierpont Morgan, Levi P. Morton, Alton B. Parker, John E. Parsons, Horace Porter, Herman Ridder, Frederick W. Seward, Francis Lynde Stetson, Oscar S. Straus, James Grant Wilson, Isaac N. Seligman, Henry W. Sackett, Edward Hagaman Hall, "a very galaxy of celebrities, with only a single Catholic among them." Mr. Leishman was requested to arrange an audience with the King, but on reading the clause in the address referring to the Holy Father as spiritual Head of so many Americans, he insisted that the address was not to be presented. The General was forced to acquiesce. But the address was presented for all that.

On the morning appointed for General Woodford's audience with the King, Mrs. Woodford was received by the Holy Father at the Vatican. When the General was about to start for the Quirinal he found to his dismay that the medal was nowhere to be found. Mrs. Woodford had undoubtedly put it away under lock and key. Summoning his chauffeur to obtain the missing article and follow him speedily, General Woodford started out to keep his engagement. There was some delay in being admitted, but just as the General was called to the presence of his Majesty the chauffeur arrived, "and thrust into his hand the package containing the medal and the unfortunate address which Mr. Leishman had vetoed." The King admired the medal and thanked the committee that sent it. "But I see you have something else for me," he added, noticing the document and holding out his hand for it. The King read the address and declared that it gave him great pleasure, and "the audience passed off in the happiest manner"—a clear proof that Mr. Leishman was needlessly alarmed, and another indication that the Vatican is Mr. Leishman's bête noire.

Catholic Records

The Bishop of Covington has been good enough to send us the Fifth Annual Report of the Catholic Record Society of England. The object of the Society is to provide for the transcribing, printing, indexing and distributing of the Catholic Records of Baptisms, Marriages and Deaths in England and Wales since the Reformation. It has published already seven handsome volumes and has three in various stages of preparation. Among its members are the chief public libraries of the kingdom and several of the United States. Of course such a society has a greater scope in England than in America; still there is valuable work to be done here, which has been left too much to individual enthusiasm and local effort. One very important lesson the managers of such societies would gladly inculcate is the advantage, not to say the necessity, of keeping our parish registers with absolute exactness. We hope the world is going to last some time yet and that, notwithstanding the prognostications of enemies, the Catholic Church in America is as yet only in its infancy. If this be so the history of the American Church is yet to be written. How grateful then will be the historians of the twenty-second century to the pastors who by their diligence shall have made their labor light!

Mr. Speer's Washington Address

A number of letters came to us during the past week requesting AMERICA to take cognizance of an address made by Robert Speer, Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, before the World Sunday School Body at Convention Hall, Washington, D. C., May 21. In the address Mr. Speer is said to have again scored the Catholic Church of South America, declaring that "the denomination in that country was not even a Christian organization." Our correspondents would have AMERICA join in the storm of protest which the address has aroused in Washington.

To all these letters we have but one answer: we will not deal further with the Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Why should one waste powder and shot? Months ago Mr. Speer astonished the readers of a widely-circulated magazine by a series of charges that horrified Christians, because their proved truth would have been an awful indictment of a body claiming holiness of life and doctrine as a characteristic mark of its being. The proof of the charges was demanded, the documents quoted as establishing the facts were questioned, and Mr. Speer was called upon to make good his assertions. We carefully went through the letters addressed to the South American Bishops by Leo XIII, and no such document as Mr. Speer quotes was found therein; we have published the direct denial of the Chilean Bishops that any such letter of reproof as Mr. Speer speaks of has ever been received by them from Rome; Catholics and non-Catholics alike, clergymen and laymen of wide experience in South America, have declared his words to be false; the very editor of the magazine in which his now notorious Student Volunteer speech at Rochester was quoted has asked in vain for satisfactory proof of Mr. Speer's accusations—and in it all Mr. Speer has preserved a silence like unto death. By reiterating his vicious falsehoods the Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions will probably serve the purpose of waking up a few of the Catholics who are always asserting that bigotry and prejudice have passed from among us forever.

Mr. Carnegie on War

The Peace Society of New York is unfortunate in its President. To preach peace is good: to do so, ignoring the causes of war and attributing to false ones the growing sentiment in favor of peace, is, in a President, to mislead those he should guide.

Mr. Carnegie's theory on the matter is, like all his social theories, very simple. Men were originally beasts fighting among themselves continually. With the gradual evolution of their nature, usually termed civilization, came a growing distaste for war and inclination towards peace. As evolution has no known limits, man must reach a state of civilization so comparatively perfect as to exclude war. As false and foolish as it is simple. The workings of our complex nature and the acts of the will which follow them, are not to be explained by simple theories, nor is it so evident that our peaceful dispositions flow from increasing virtue. Our sense of humanity has something to do with the decrease of war. What this sense of humanity is, is another question. Suffice it to say that it too is very complex, and its elements are by no means all pure virtues.

But there are other causes of man's peacefulness. One is his inordinate clinging to this mortal life because he has lost faith in immortality. Another is the refinement of sensuality, due to the multiplication of comforts and conveniences. Man is becoming infatuated with ease. Moreover, the nature of the modern battle which removes one in great measure from the excitement of the melée and requires him to remain in cold blood amidst unseen life-destroying agents, makes war far more terrific than it was in times past. Besides the king's fear war. They know that defeat would mean the shaking of their thrones if not the ruin of their dynasties. And Mr. Carnegie's own class, the capitalists and financiers, have their own private reasons for dreading war. They have their investments everywhere which war would imperil. To these "John Gilpins" the thought of "loss of pence" is heartrending.

The abolition of war, nevertheless, is only a dream. When matters come into dispute which are less important than the peril of war, nations will arbitrate. But quarrels must arise involving so deeply a nation's honor and existence that nothing is left it but to draw the sword in self-defence. This being so, it is a comfort to remember that war is far from being an unmixed evil. For those who perish it remains forever true, to die for one's country is noble and honorable; while out of war has come, and will come again, the rehabilitation of the social organization and the consolidation of authority. War is terrible, but it is not so much to be dreaded as the chronic evil of domestic lawlessness. War, too, is one of God's agents to punish men for their sins, a merciful agent, since it tends to bring back to Him those who in their prosperity have forgotten Him. The time is coming when the nations will learn war no more; but Mr. Carnegie and his friends are not its harbingers.

Number of Voters in France

Surprise was expressed by some of our readers at the magnitude of the total of voters in France as given in a recent issue. How could a population of thirty-nine millions (the latest figures available give 38,961,945 as the population of France), furnish 8,563,716 actual voters? In the first place, it ought to be borne in mind that we expressed doubts as to the correctness of those official figures (AMERICA, Vol. III, No. 6, p. 143). Secondly, the assumption on which the objection is based, viz., that one in five is the normal proportion of registered electors to the total population, though verified in certain cities, is not by any means a general rule. "The World Almanac" for 1910, p. 586, has a table headed "Number of Inhabitants, June 1, 1900, to each vote cast November 6, 1900," which applies also proportionately to electors, and in this table we find the proportion varying, through fifty-nine cities, from 2.73 at Salt Lake City, Utah, to 17.61 at Atlanta, Ga. The list is accompanied by this note: "The table shows how very wide of the mark in nearly all of these cities would be an estimate of the population made by multiplying the vote cast by any single ratio, and that this method of estimating a city's population is without foundation." Thirdly, La Croix, of Paris, in its issue of May 11, states explicitly that there are twelve million electors in France.

Now, eight and a half millions of actual voters, in round numbers the figure given above, represents not quite three-quarters of twelve millions, and this proportion of three-quarters is frequently surpassed in the tabulated report of the second balloting as published in Le Temps of May 10, which gives in each case both the number of registered electors and the number of votes cast. For example, in the first conscription of the first arrondissement of Paris there were 12,717 registered electors, of whom 10,016, or nearly five-sixths, voted. In Gannat, Allier, out of 20,729 electors 16,243, or considerably more than three-fourths, voted. In Arcis-sur-Aube, out of 8,959 electors 7,879, or more than seven-eighths, voted. In Nyons, Drôme, nearly seven-eighths of the electors voted. Almost exactly the same proportion occurs in Beaune, Côte d'Or. It is not, therefore, unreasonable to admit that nearly three-fourths of the registered electors did actually vote in the recent French elections, especially when we remember how great were the issues at stake, and what efforts were made by all parties to secure as many votes as possible.

Worth Considering

The Province of Vancouver, British Columbia, remarks that some people complain of the long medieval ceremonies which accompany a king's accession. But these, it says, if compared with the ceremonies of initiation into a lodge, are almost as brief and as simple as a boarding-house grace.

An incident told in correspondence recently come to us may help to open the eyes of certain Americans to one reason which impels the Pontifical Court to use a prudent discretion in the matter of receiving visitors in special audience. A parish priest of Bavaria, who for just cause is under the displeasure of the ecclesiastical authorities of his home diocese, a few weeks since visited Rome. During his stay in the papal city the anti-Catholic press of Bavaria gleefully announced that he had been received in special audience by the Holy Father, adding the comment that the pontiff had been exceedingly gracious in his manner towards the recalcitrant priest. The Kölnische Volkzeitung caused special inquiries to be made at the Vatican and was speedily able to publish these facts. A trustworthy person at Munich had requested that the priest be granted the favor of an audience, omitting all reference to the fact that he was not persona grata with his bishop. On this recommendation the priest was admitted to a public audience together with a number of pilgrims then in Rome. It cannot, of course, be known what the Holy Father happened to say to this or that member of the body as he passed among the pilgrims, but it is surely unwarranted to construe this simple fact into an official approval of the priest's position in his dealings with his bishop. And is one surprised, in view of such incidents, that the Roman Court insists upon laying down stringent rules regarding those who seek its favors?

The Pullman Company's contract with the Mexican government will expire in November and will not be renewed. An order for sleeping cars for the national lines has already been placed for fall delivery.

QUI IN TENEBRIS . . . SEDENT.

I went the other evening to the entertainment given by the children from the Catholic Institute for the Blind in the Cathedral School Hall near Lexington avenue. The place was packed to the doors when I got there and it was only when the audience was beginning to leave that I saw the Doctor on the stage talking to Miss Coffey and some of the ladies of the Board of Trustees. I waited for him and as he came out challenged him to a walk up Fifth avenue. It is the best place in New York for walking after nightfall, the sidewalks being wide, smooth and deserted. He agreed and we climbed over the bridge, swung into the avenue and started northward at a steady three-and-a-half-miles an hour gait. He's a comfortable walker, is the Doctor, keeps his pace even and does not bump you as he goes along, nor does he stop unexpectedly. Not a word did I get from him until we were past the Cathedral. Then—

"Man, do you realize what you've seen and heard to-night? Of course you don't—you're too young and you've got no imagination."

Being of an age where it no longer hurts to be called young and having long ago discovered the absence of imagination in my make-up, this did not hurt as much as it might seem. But I was curious to know what I should have realized, and in order to find out I delivered myself of some remarks on the great importance of the work carried on by the Institute and how it did this, that and the other thing, which no one else could or would do, and so on. The withering silence that greeted my efforts was discouraging—I was evidently on the wrong track—and my sentences petered out most unimpressively.

"Tut man! I don't mean that at all. Can't you get under the skin of it? Can't you feel it as one of those children felt it? Can you sense the sounds of it, the smell of it as they did? Dear me! it's an open book to me!"

"Why, no, I can't, Doctor," I said, trying to make my voice sound a little irritable, judging that it might have a stimulating effect upon him—which it had.

"Six weeks those children have been at it, Miss Coffey tells me—six solid weeks' drilling, rehearsing, practising in that quiet little Fifteenth street house where their fingers and feet know every inch of the walls and the floors, where every noise is familiar. Six weeks of gathering excitement, getting ready for to-night. Nothing like it before in the lives of any of them, nothing in the way of past experience to go by, everything new and strange. Just think of to-day—the hustle and bustle, the changed routine; remember that routine is the essence of life with the blind, it's the only thing that gives them a sense of safety! The getting dressed and waiting for the stage to take them to the hall, the drive in the stage, the street noises different from those they know—there's a different noise for every hour in the day to those who use their ears intelligently—the getting to the hall, the new smells and sounds around them and the feel of large space.

"Think of the noises to begin with. Don't forget how acute is the hearing of the blind—the movement of many people around them, the shuffling of feet, the swish of women's dresses, the hum of voices, hundreds of strange voices all about them, the shifting of seats—all most unusual and wonderful—perhaps terrifying for all we know. Then the arrangement in place on the platform, the touch of many strange hands upon them, the sound of footfalls about them, some known, some not; the whispering voices, some recognized, some not, now approaching, now receding—and then the sudden blare of the band close by. Then the noise like wind in the trees as the audience rose to greet the archbishop and the silence as Farrelly opened the proceedings—and the roar of applause heard for the first time then by probably most of them. And then the little stunts so carefully learned and the gradual accommodation of the little brains to the rush of new sensations. . . . Man alive! if you and I were suddenly dumped into black space five thousand light-years beyond the nebula in Orion, with the noise of all the world in our ears, we might know how some of those children felt to-night!"

We strode along for a block or so while I considered that simile a little, the Doctor muttering to himself occasionally, and I caught the words—"qui in tenebris, et in umbra mortis sedent," followed by a chuckle.

"What are you laughing at, Doctor?" I said.

"It's funny I should have thought of Stewart," he said, "but I see the connection now—in tenebris et in umbra mortis gave it to me. No, you didn't know him."

"Introduce me," I said.

"'Twas curious how he got his wish! If he hadn't given me his word, on my soul, I'd believe he took it instead of got it. But he wouldn't have lied to me. This is the way it was: He was a surgeon. We used to have cases together more than twenty years ago. I was with him when he performed his first appendectomy. He was two or three years older than I and a good surgeon. Just about twenty years ago—let me see, yes, 'twas in the spring of 1891—he came to me one day and said his optic nerve was going. I went with him to a specialist and he said 'twas so. Total blindness in a few months, no help for it and nothing to do but wait. We came back to my office to talk it over.

"'Twas a tough situation. He had a wife, a son at college, a daughter at Vassar and two younger girls. He had twenty thousand dollars saved and was carrying fifty thousand life insurance costing two thousand five hundred a year, and was making twelve to fifteen thousand. His policies hadn't much cash value, being mostly only two or three years' old. He had been spending about ten thousand a year and his family had had the best there was. If he lived—blind—his income wouldn't even half pay his premiums; if he died his family had a clear thirty-five hundred a year to live on. He wanted to argue that he had a right to kill himself, but being of Scotch Presbyterian blood he knew he hadn't, and I had no trouble in making him promise he wouldn't. But how that man did want to die! And he did!" The Doctor chuckled again.

"That spring we had a bad diphtheria epidemic on the lower West Side—there wasn't any anti-toxin in those days, you'll remember, and the mortality was sixty per cent. or more. Now, diphtheria, properly speaking, wasn't any of that man's business, he being a surgeon, but after he saw the specialist he wouldn't operate any more, and this happened within the month. His wife sent for me in a hurry one day—he was down with diphtheria.

"Where'd ye get it?" I asked him, and he told me he'd been helping another man on his cases. "Did ye play fair or not, Stewart?" I asked him. "Tell me the truth," I said, "for you're pretty sick."

"I did, Mac," he said, "on my word 'twas the only way to save the child's life." "All right, then," said I, "no shennanigan now! Ye've got to fight it out and do your best," and he grinned in my face.

"I'll give ye a fair show, Mac," he said, "I won't work against ye anyhow."

"Ye'll do more than that," said I, and I was mad with him 'till he swore he'd do his best. But his heart was affected badly and he commenced to go down hill.

"We're licked, Mac," he said, "thank God we're licked and I played you fair, on my word I did." He died the next day—the only one of my patients that really wanted to die and wanted it badly. 'Twas a curious sight—I guess he did play fair, too, he wouldn't have lied to me. But we don't often get our wishes as quick as that," and he again murmured the words "Illuminare his qui in tenebris et in umbra mortis sedent—it's no wonder Zachary says sedent—there's nothing else for those in darkness to do but sit and sit and sit—God help them!"

LITERATURE

Letters to His Holiness, Pope Pius X. By A MODERNIST. Chicago: The Open Court Publishing Co.

A few weeks ago the Open Court Publishing Company wrote to us that it was sending for review these letters, of which, it said, the author is a "Roman Catholic Theologian." It then proceeded to inform us that though the publication of the letters had seemed to be not without danger of increasing the antagonism between Protestants and Catholics instead of proving a help to the better understanding of true religion, nevertheless it had decided to publish them, since a careful consideration of the Modernist case had convinced it that the matter demanded investigation. The letter ended with a warning to beware of indulging our prejudices in reviewing the book, and a threat of dreadful consequences—to whom it is not very clear—should we presume to speak our mind. By "prejudices" the Open Court Publishing Company means our acceptance of the Catholic Faith on the authority of God who reveals it. And this will appear evidently when the scope of the letters is understood.

Some might term such an epistle impertinent. We cannot take upon ourselves to say that they are wrong, for not every instantaneous judgment is erroneous. However, as the question of impertinence turns upon facts, we will present the facts and leave the decision to our readers. Usurpation of authority is always impertinent. The impertinence grows with the disproportion between the low condition of the usurper and the lofty state of him over whom authority is usurped; so that it may become something deserving to be called by a much graver name. Perhaps the organizing of the Open Court Publication Company with offices in Chicago and the publication of the Monist once a quarter, and of the Open Court once a month, may, by some wonderful evolutionary process, have developed in organizers and publishers the right to summon before them the Catholic Church, to determine what is true religion and to put the Sovereign Pontiff on his defence for having violated it, and all at the suit of a nameless Modernist. If this be so we, in our lowliness, have no right to call the letter impertinent, nor to complain that, abandoning the custom of mere publishers who have attained to no such high prerogatives, they dictate the way in which we should review the prosecutor's brief; and we should be highly culpable were we to blame a letter which follows the best models of judicial proclamations.

The book came at last; and one holding the publishers' communication to be impertinent, would be staggered at its audacity. It carries its effrontery on its cover, on which, whether by author or publishers we cannot say, have been emblazoned the arms of Pius X! Who ever heard of an attacking army marching under the colors of the army to be attacked? On the title page the Pontifical arms are repeated and the frontispiece is a portrait of the Pope! All this does not give one the idea that in the Open Court Publication Company or in the Modernist author there is a very strong sense of decency.

The author says his personality is of little consequence. Of this, however, he is not the exclusive judge. One who is attacked attaches a good deal of importance to the personality of his attacker. Nobody likes to be shot at, but if he must be shot at he likes to see his enemy, to feel him to be a worthy antagonist, and dislikes very much to be fired on from behind a hedge by one who may be a nameless vagabond. Moreover, there is a special reason why this author should not conceal his name. Modernists have always shown themselves very economical with regard to truth, and one would like to have evidence that he is really "the Roman Catholic Theologian" the Open Court Publishing Company says he is, and "the active priest for many years, devoted to his pastoral work," as a certain "P.C." who writes the introduction declares him to be. His name should have been on the title page, not the Pope's arms; his portrait should have been the frontispiece, not that of Pius X. P. C. guarantees him to be "a good Catholic in the broad sense of the term." We therefore would also like to know who P. C. is, the more so as he speaks very magisterially on religion.

The initials fit the name of the president of the Open Court Publishing Company, and this being what it is, it is very probable that is president would presume to tell us what a Catholic is. If it belongs to every sect to define the character of its members, and to the coryphæi of Monism to define a Monist, why should the defining of a Catholic be taken by P. C. and the Open Court Publishing Company out of the hands of Catholic authority, according to which a good Catholic in the broad sense is always a very bad one in the strict sense? P. C. tells us that the author has many sympathizers in the Church. Nevertheless, he became acquainted with him through a Protestant minister. One of the curious phenomena of Modernism is that though its adepts call themselves Catholics, and boast of their Catholic following, they are always ready to have recourse for practical encouragement to Protestants. Schell was a notable example of this.

Finding this trait in our author we are prepared to acknowledge him as a good Modernist. Another brings absolute conviction. Personally, he is, no doubt, a fervent lover of truth. Still a prevaricating system has betrayed him into prevarication. This is a vice of the Modernist method. External submission and internal rebellion, the profession of the Catholic Faith for the purpose of undermining it, belong to its essence. Hence the anonymity of its writers, their multiplication by the ingenious use by one of several pseudonyms, the smuggling out of writings to be published by friends of the cause and other deceits. In his second and third letters the author sets forth his purpose in writing. He says he does not hope to be heard by the Pope. Unless he has actually attained to the colossal conceit of the editor of the Watertoast Gazette, one of Dickens' most absurd exaggerations, he knows perfectly well that though he should send copies by the dozen through the registered mail, the Pope would never see them.

To confess this, however, would not suit his purpose; so he goes on to weave words telling how he would like to persuade the Holy Father to amend his ways, and even apostrophizes him to this effect, until the unwary reader thinks his confession of helplessness to be mere rhetorical humility, and takes him to be another Bernard addressing another Eugenius. Nay, he deceives, not an unwary reader, but P. C., one of the very elect, who, contradicting the author, tells us that these letters have been written, "in the hope that His Holiness will hear the voice crying in the wilderness." Poor General Choke! Poor Lafayette Kettle! Between two such misleading passages the author sandwiches his real object. It is to stir the American clergy to revolt. Moreover, beginning with a demand for reform he grows bolder as he proceeds and ends by attacking the fundamentals of Christianity. The very title of his book, therefore, is deceitful. It should be called, not "Letters to His Holiness, Pius X," but "Letters to the American Clergy against the Catholic Faith."

He runs up and down the usual gamut of abuse. The Inquisition, Galileo, the Jesuits and Religious Orders generally, indulgences, relics, celibacy, the Curia, Italian domination, the methods followed in appointing bishops, popular devotions, especially the devotion to the Sacred Heart, are knocked about with great gusto. He gibes at our horror of Freemasonry, reviles the ignorance of the orthodox and extols with the swelling words that mark his kind the scholarship and science of the heterodox. He heaps abuse on great Pontiffs; and if this were all we might pause to examine some of his accusations and the solidity of the conclusions he draws from them. But this is not all. His railings, sneers and faulty conclusions are only the timbers of the scaffold on which he mounts for the grand attack. Let us suppose for a moment that overwhelmed with these diatribes the Pope should say: "If I allow you to elect your own bishops and pastors, if I throw over the Jesuits and reform the other orders, if I banish every Italian from the Curia and arrange it according to your ideas, if I get out of the Vatican, close up St. Peter's and live in lodgings, if I abolish the League of the Sacred Heart and condemn the devotion, can we have peace on these terms?" "Oh, no," the Modernist would answer, "that would be only a beginning. Read letter 17, ostensibly on celibacy, and you will see that guardian angels and persecuting devils, holy water, holy oils, the tonsure, baptismal regeneration, the perpetual virginity of Mary, fasting, mortification, incense, the churching of women, the atonement, the resurrection, transubstantiation, must all go as relics of ante-Christian superstitions; though I will allow you to retain as ceremonies baptism and the eucharist which, if rationally understood, are quite useful."

"Well, what else," the Pope would say. "Much more," would be the cheerful answer. "You must give up the old ideas concerning inspiration of scripture and accept our teaching. You must deny the visible, infallible, indefectible Church as the creature of your predecessors' ambition; above all, you must abandon your own fantastic infallibility and recognize yourself for the ignorant, peasant-priest you are." "And is that all?" "No. Read my last letter. You must renounce Christ the God-Man. Then we shall have peace." "My son," the Holy Father would sadly reply: "You have traveled a long way into the far country since first you allowed yourself to grow restless under the fancied grievances of your Father's House. You have followed the Prodigal in his rebellious wandering. May God give you grace to follow him in his penitential homeward journey."

But if he will not, what right has he to remain in the Church, to eat its bread, to stand at its altar to minister to its children who, if they knew him, would shrink from him in horror? Let him come out into the light, go forth with his associates and let all see their number. Who can deny that Modernism is the very quintessence of the lie?

We have ignored the mandate of the Open Court Publishing Company and despised its threat. We have written according to what it is pleased to call our prejudices, and we have said our say. We now will wait to see what will happen.

Mass and Vestments of the Catholic Church, Liturgical, Doctrinal, Historical and Archeological. By MONSIGNOR JOHN WALSH. Troy: Troy Times Art Press. For sale by Author, and Benziger Bros. Price, $2 net.

Handbook of the Divine Liturgy. By CHARLES COWLEY CLARKE. St. Louis: B. Herder.

The modesty of the author of the first of these works has led him to make its main title somewhat misleading. One hearing it called: "Mass and Vestments of the Catholic Church" might think it nothing more than an ordinary hand book of the rites and ceremonies of the Holy Sacrifice. As a matter of fact it is a book of 530 pages, treating its subject as the explanatory words declare from every point of view. It discusses the rites not only of the Western Church, but also of the Eastern. In it are explained the various theological views on the nature of the sacrifice of Christ offered in the Mass, and a most useful summary is given of the decrees of the Congregation of Rites concerning the validity of wines as now made, especially of sweet wines, as matter for the Sacrifice. For good reasons given in the preface the author has chosen the catechetical form for his book, which is a very practical compendium of all questions likely to come up in popular instructions or in controversy, and a bibliography attached to the more important chapters indicates where further information may be found. The index is fairly good, but might be improved. However it is easier to write a good book, hard though this be, than to make an index of it that will satisfy all. The author hopes to see his work taken as a text book in the advanced classes of Catholic schools. He fears, nevertheless, that in this he may be too sanguine. We hope sincerely that his fears will prove groundless.

The second book is more restricted in its scope. As the subtitle states, it is a brief study of the historical development of the Mass, and deals therefore with existing things relatively to their origins. It is able therefore to condense a great deal of information into a comparatively narrow space. The tone of the book is most devout, so that with its abundance of useful quotations it could be used for spiritual reading, something not looked for in works of the learned class, to which this, despite its brevity, really belongs. Whether it be wise to introduce among authors quoted Walter Pater and J. H. Shorthouse, may be disputed. Still, though the citing of the latter's "Golden Thoughts of Molinos" may give readers, knowing no better, occasion to suppose Molinos to have had really golden thoughts and so to procure them for the edification of their souls, a long quotation from "Marius the Epicurean" furnishes the author with the opportunity of making an excellent note on the falseness of the idea that the Church drew on Gnostic and pagan sources for the liturgy and of defining the Modernist as the Gnostic of to-day.

Arabic Prose Composition. By T. H. WEIR, B.D., M.R.A.S. New York City: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Price, $2.00 net.

Mr. Weir is lecturer in Arabic in the University of Glasgow. He has given us a useful little Arabic prose composition book. First come twenty-five pages of preliminary exercises, to be used while the student is studying the elements of Arabic grammar. In this first part, references are to Thornton's abridgment of Wright's Arabic Grammar. Any grammar will do; the exercises are headed with titles that indicate the portion of the grammar in which the student is being drilled. The second part is some twenty pages of easy prose. We are very glad to see that Mr. Weir has translated most of these from the "Majani" of the learned Jesuit, Father Louis Cheikh, of Université de St. Joseph of Beirut, Syria. His "Majani" is an anthology of the very best of Arabic literature; its volumes cover the whole range of the literature of the language. The work has the great advantage of being set up in the Arabic type of the Orient, and not in the un-Arabic type of the Occident. The Jesuit printing house of Beirut is second to none in its typographical work. The third part of Mr. Weir's book has eleven pages of easier newspaper extracts, translated from the famous Cairo newspaper, Al-Muaiyad. The fourth part is forty-eight pages of advanced prose, chiefly drawn from Lord Cromer's "Modern Egypt."

The vocabulary is simple and fitted to the purpose of the author and his selections. His purpose contains one very impracticable element—"the attempt to combine in one volume the classical and the modern Arabic"—to use the words of the author's preface. As well attempt to combine the Attic of the golden period of Greek literature with the Common Greek of modern Greece, or of either Septuagint or New Testament time and place. Anyone who has tried his literary Arabic on the natives either of Syria or of Egypt will readily understand the futility of this purpose of Mr. Weir.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

The Warfare of the Soul, by SHIRLEY C. HUGHSON. New York, London, etc.: Longmans, Green & Co.

The subtitle of this book is: "Practical Studies in the Life of Temptation." The author is an Episcopalian minister who has been compelled by the poverty of his denomination to draw his matter almost entirely from Catholic sources. As an amateur ascetical writer he had done fairly well; but, of course, such books as his are not to be recommended to Catholics. Perhaps some day when he finds himself within the pale of the Church he will prepare a revised edition.

LITERARY NOTES

The Etudes for May 5 has a criticism of M. Eugène Brieux that is rather out of the beaten track. It appears that M. Brieux, who became one of the "Immortals" on May 12, is a dramatist who, in his plays, is always preaching a morality without principles or tradition. Though tiresome in his fearless iteration of moral lessons, he never gets beyond the façade of society and confines his attacks to the judges, the Church, the parliament, the family, the professions. "The great classics," writes M. Benoit Emonet, the critic, "who were also true psychologists, did not entitle their plays 'La Robe Rouge,' 'L'Engrenage,' 'L'Evasion,' or 'Les Bienfaiteurs,' but 'L'Avare,' 'Le menteur,' 'Le Misanthrope,' or 'Le Tartufe.' They attacked not entities, laws, ignorance or society, but real concrete beings, consciences and characters: that alone is alive and capable of direct improvement. The rest will follow as a consequence." Applying this test to M. Brieux' best-known work, "Trois Filles de M. Dupont," M. Benoit Emonet shows how social conditions are forced by the unflinching playwright to bear the blame that ought really to fall on personal transgressions of the moral law, and he shows this without any preaching but with quiet, pungent satire.

"La Question du Spitzberg," in the Correspondant for May 10, is replete with valuable and not easily obtainable information on the past history and present condition of Spitzbergen. Compared with the long and apparently exhaustive article on this subject in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," the Correspondant paper breaks new ground. For instance, the latter tells us that, in the middle of the seventeenth century, Smeerenborg, in the northwest angle of the island of Amsterdam, at the northwestern extremity of the Spitzbergen archipelago, was the chief centre of the Dutch fisheries and, during the fishing season, numbered from fifteen to twenty thousand inhabitants, who were amply provided with shops, inns and warehouses and could enjoy that rare Arctic treat, bread fresh from the baker's oven every day. But all this busy life ceased with the beginning of autumn. The ships and men returned to Holland, and Smeerenborg's bustle and prosperity slept all winter. There were as yet no permanent human dwellers in Spitzbergen. The writer describes the important part played by French adventurers in the exploration and exploitation of this northern archipelago. In 1693 a French fleet commanded by M. de la Varenne, captured or destroyed thirteen Dutch vessels and put the others to flight in one of the bays of Spitzbergen. But the victory had no lasting results. A few years later, a visitor to those islands saw in one bay 121 Dutch, fifty Hamburg and fifteen Bremen ships, but not one French vessel. The coal mines, discovered in 1870 and more carefully examined since 1890, are now being worked by English, Norwegian and American capitalists, who employ Norwegian miners, some of whom have to remain all winter, thus being the first permanent inhabitants of Spitzbergen. Their presence calls for a social organization, which in turn supposes ownership by some nation. Hitherto Spitzbergen has been no nation's land. In February, 1907, the Norwegian Government proposed that the nations most interested in this archipelago should declare it res nullius (nobody's property) and decide in an international conference on an organization to be established by the interested powers. Germany, Great Britain, Belgium, Denmark, the United States, France, the Netherlands, Russia and Sweden have accepted the principle of the proposed conference which, it is hoped, will be held before the end of May.

Mrs. Alice Stopford Green, author of "The Making of Ireland and its Undoing," made a notable speech at a banquet given recently in Dublin, under the auspices of the Lord Lieutenant, to some twenty Irish ladies distinguished in letters. Her views of historical impartiality have a wide application. She had noticed that people praise most the virtues they least practise. Those who charged her with gross partiality in the writing of history would consider a strictly impartial person one who kept his mind gaping without intermission for what might fall into it. No one of character could perpetually remain in hovering uncertainty; as long as he possesses reason, he will still be reasoning, judging, deciding. The commonplace that history must be written without the slightest inclination to any side is impossible. "A historian must be scrupulous in investigating facts and neutral in seeking the truth that emerges from them, but when the work of critical judgment is over, there remains the quality of affection, that divine clue given us to penetrate the mystery of human affairs."

Mrs. Green's strictures on "impartial" histories of Ireland are equally true of a large portion of English history and literature when treating of the Catholic Church. "The words partial and impartial in Irish affairs have a recognized technical meaning. Impartial means a strong bias to imperial and English interests; partial signifies a regard for the special interests of Ireland. Should we in advancing years happen to be overtaken by the truth, from that moment our impartiality is undermined." The result was that "impartial history without bias" had concealed or discredited the noblest achievements of every race and class in Ireland, and Englishmen thus illuminated had bidden them drop their history, considering them merely raw material for an empire and devoid of the elements of nationhood.

We have had similar histories, many of them widely used as text books in schools and colleges, presenting like views of Catholicity under the titles "medievalism," "obscurantism," "superstition," etc. Mrs. Green asks: "What does an empire want of constituent peoples without national patriotism and national honor? Loyal and valiant peoples must come in the spirit of freemen and bring their language with them if they choose." We might remark that Catholics will add little of special service to their country unless they are imbued with their Church's principles and precepts and proud of her records. To them Mrs. Green's final word applies more forcibly than even to her Irish auditors: "They must carry their history with them, every jot of it, and bear it with affection and pride."

EDUCATION

The Irish Educational Review for April has an article on "Education without Religion," which ought to make interesting reading for the liberal-minded defenders of the Carnegie Foundation and similar institutions among ourselves. Quoting an article published in Paris some time ago, the writer presents a sad picture of the youth of France since the control of schools has been taken from the hands of religious teachers. "Listen," the French writer says, "to the complaints of parents, and see what happens in certain homes and in society. What a heart-rending thing it is to see so many children without faith, without a heart, without a conscience! Unnaturally precocious beings, they have no notion of respect. Neither parents nor the aged, nor persons worthy of veneration, find grace with these young criminals; impious, dissolute, intemperate thieves, they bear on their brow the mark of vice; they form an army of the worst revolutionaries; they are the shame of their families and the scourge of their country." After showing from official statistics that during the last thirty years the criminality of boys under sixteen years of age has increased in alarming proportions, the writer brings the testimony of M. Guillot, Judge of Instruction in Paris, to prove his contention that this rising tide of youthful crime is due to non-religious education: "It cannot escape the observation of any sincere man that this frightful increase of criminality among the young has coincided with the introduction of the changes in the system of public education."

It were strange indeed if the vigorous Catholic bodies of the United States were to find themselves seeking an example in the manner in which their younger brothers in the Faith, the Catholics of Australia, eliminated a burdensome condition. And yet this may occur. For a long period the Australian Catholics, like ourselves, have been obliged to build and maintain without State aid their own educational institutions; whilst at the same time they are taxed for the maintenance of State schools in which no religion is taught. Just of late books have been introduced into the State schools containing instruction openly hostile to the teachings of the Catholic Church. In a speech recently delivered, Cardinal Moran, of Sydney, does not hesitate to hold that Catholics might be justified because of this in refusing to pay any educational tax until educationally they will have been put on the same footing as all other citizens. The Cardinal does not, however, counsel such "passive resistance," but he does desire "an agitation for the righting of the wrong which shall not content itself until that end is gained."

Score another victory for principle. In a conference of Baptist ministers held in Philadelphia last week, the question of making the changes required in the charter of Brown University in order that this institution secure place on the privileged list of the Carnegie Foundation came up anew. Certain ministers present were disposed to favor changes that would sever the official connection of Brown with the Baptist church, thus to eliminate the denominational character of the school and to render it eligible to receive a portion of the Carnegie Pension Fund. The opponents of the proposed action declared that the institution has been under Baptist domination from the earliest times; that to allow any change of such domination would be a virtual admission of the incapacity of the Baptists to control such an institution. A resolution declaring: "That any change in the charter of Brown University in so far as affects the present relationship with the Baptist church be not consummated," was carried by a vote of 33 to 16. So far from desiring to share money which one member of the conference called "agnostic money," the ministers present spoke of making a general appeal to the Baptists of the land to establish their own pension fund.

Two or three paragraphs of a speech delivered by Governor Marshall on occasion of the dedication of St. Joseph's College Chapel at Rensselaer, Indiana, May 21, deserve to be treasured in the memory of Catholics. It is not often that the "prudent" policy of statesmen permits plain, straightforward speech, and the courage that throws such prudence to the winds is worthy of our esteem:

"I like many things about the Catholic Church and I'm not coward enough to conceal them in the State of Indiana. I believe no man is educated for the high and responsible duties of American citizenship unless trained to understand that he supports them because of an omnipotent God; unless trained to understand that God reigns and Jesus is the ruler over mankind. If I had any fault to find, it is not my business to find fault with the people who have been kind to me; if I had any fault to find with secular education it is that there are too many men losing their moorings; that they are turned out upon the sea of life without realization of the eternal. And why should I not be proud to be present upon an occasion such as this, at an institution such as this, where these young men are trained in a liberal education, an education which teaches them their duties to the family, an education which teaches them their duties to their State; an education which teaches them their duties to the God of their fathers.

"This constitution of ours guarantees to every man in the State of Indiana the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, but some men think that this gives them a license to worship or not to worship God, as they choose. I object to that. I submit that, although the constitution allows every one to worship God according to his conscience, I believe that every man must worship God somewhere, somehow, some place. And so I welcome this institution, building young men up in the most Holy Faith of the Mother Church; building them up in knowledge and wisdom better than those; in that wisdom which teaches them the rule of life of the Founder of Christianity.

"Whence comes then this friendship of mine to this your church? It comes because the Catholic boys and Catholic girls are taught that they are under authority. We live in a land of freedom, it is true; we live in a land where men worship God it is true, but they are forgetting that nevertheless they are living in a land of authority, and that it is the business of all to cleave fast to the ideals of democracy, law and authority in the community. And the worst thing that can happen to a people is to have them forget that God reigns; the worst thing a people can do is to have them imagine that they can find out in fifteen minutes all about the plan of life, death, and salvation; the worst thing that can come to a people is to have them believe that liberty means license, that liberty means 'do as you please.'

"I will tell you another thing—why I'm friendly to this Church of yours. It stands to-day, by reason of its belief, it stands as the one bulwark against atheism and socialism in this country."

Commenting editorially on the opening of the Catholic University of Argentina, El Pueblo, of Buenos Aires says that the sacrifices cheerfully undergone by Catholic parents in educating their sons in Catholic schools and colleges were so often brought to naught by the disasters which befell the young men while attending the lectures at a non-Catholic university that the successful exertions of clergy and people towards establishing a truly Catholic university are the surest pledge of the future religious and moral well-being of the republic. "Thus will there arise an effective reaction against the crooked tendencies of our young democracy, and against the prevailing abuses, corruption, frauds and favoritism, which are the juiceless fruit of a school which extinguishes generous enthusiasm, kills lofty ideals, and expels all holy convictions for the sake of glorifying gross materialism."

SOCIOLOGY

The Elmira Star-Gazette publishes a very severe indictment of social reform methods from the pen of that veteran worker, Col. Vincent M. Masten, of the Elmira State Reformatory. During the past twenty-five years, homicidal crime has increased 450%, and the annual cost of crime is now $1,373,000,000, or one-third more than the national debt. A whole volume could not prove more eloquently than these figures that our reformatory methods are such only in name, for they fail in their purpose. A disquieting feature of our system is that our penitentiaries show a heavy percentage of convicts who have passed through juvenile correctional institutions and reformatories for youths, and have duly qualified themselves for the state's prison.

Col. Masten lays a heavy finger on five ulcers which, in his opinion, disfigure the whole reformatory system and gnaw at the very vitals of the State. These are, first, the abuse of probation. Wisely intended as a means by which the offender not yet hardened in wickedness may regain his position as a useful member of society, it has been used by the sly and cunning to escape wholesome restraint and to ply their criminal trade. Sentimental sociologists whose hearts run away with their heads are chiefly responsible for this perversion of a praiseworthy means of good.

When the Rev. Henry A. Buchtel was Governor of Colorado, he was notoriously free in using his pardoning power. He made it known that as often as he visited the penitentiary at Canon City, a convict should be pardoned. And he made frequent visits. Such a practice must easily pave the way to feigned reformation and hypocritical protestations of amendment. This is the second ulcer.

Failure to impress effectively the need of self-control on the delinquent and failure to enforce due discipline in reformatories are two more gaping wounds. Too many social workers spend all their time and use all the resources of their ingenuity in coaxing young delinquents to be "good"—a system which, if applied in the family, would be enough to pervert a youthful saint. The "immigration evil" is the ulcer which is the most dangerous, thinks Col. Masten. As long as our laws are such that the criminal, the indolent, the anarchistic agitator and the dehumanized pervert are welcomed to our hospitable shores, so long will our sink of iniquity grow more vile and noisome. He closes with an eloquent plea for a "national conscience," which shall impress upon all that true prosperity is not measured in dollars but in virtue, and that compromise with evil constantly lessens resistance to evil.

SCIENCE

We have received from a subscriber, "R. J. M.," the following query:

"In your issue of May 7th, there appeared an article headed, 'That Dreadful Tail,' which stated that the mass of the comet, through whose tail we are expected to pass to-day, is one-millionth that of the earth's. In a cabled report from London in last Sunday's issue of the New York Times, from Norman Lockyer, the distinguished English astronomer, the statement is made that the diameter of the head of Halley's Comet is about nine thousand miles—or approximately that of the earth on which we dwell. What is the explanation of this amazing discrepancy between two scientific teachers in relation to so important a question?"

"R. J. M." is confusing mass with volume. Mass means quantity of matter, and volume the space it occupies. Thus, a cubic inch of water has nearly the same mass as a cubic foot of steam, but the volume of the second is 1728 times that of the first. The number of miles in the diameter and other dimensions of a comet can be obtained by measuring their apparent angular magnitudes as seen from the earth, and combining these with the distance. This is comparatively easy. The mass can be found only by the perturbations produced upon the comet itself and upon the bodies in whose neighborhood it comes. These perturbations betray themselves by a change in the orbits, such change being inversely proportional to the masses. Now as comets have at times come very close to planets and their satellites whose masses we know, and as the perturbations of the latter were too minute to be noticed, while those of the comet were great enough to change its orbit essentially, we can safely assign one millionth of the earth as the highest possible value of the mass of a comet.

WILLIAM F. RIGGE, S.J.

The earth, it seems, did not go through the comet's tail. The comet's head passed the sun, no doubt, between May 18 and 19, according to calculations. But the tail lagged behind and for one or two days was visible in the morning sky while the head had passed over into the evening sky. This seems to mean that the tail, which had appeared straight, took a decided curve, and that the earth was, as it were, coasting along the part it had been expected to penetrate. The explanation has been suggested that the earth and the comet are electrified in the same sense, and that as they approached each other the earth literally pushed away that part of the tail which crossed its path into a position more or less parallel to the same. This would explain, too, the apparently rapid shortening of the tail as the moment of the locked-for transit approached. Whether this theory be tenable the astronomers will tell us by their mathematics.

ECONOMICS

The exports to Panama for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June will exceed in value twenty million dollars, exclusive of canal supplies shipped in Government vessels. The chief items are iron and steel manufactures, over five million dollars; coal, about one and one-fourth million; cement, cotton goods, explosives, about a million each; meat and dairy products, about one and one-half million, and bread-stuffs about $800,000.

The exports to Canada for ten months ended April 30, amounted to 174 million dollars, forty-five million more than during the corresponding period ended in 1909. The chief increases seem to be connected with the great advance in Canadian agriculture. Thus the value of agricultural implements exported has increased by $840,000; that of automobiles, by nearly $1,900,000; wire, by over thirty million pounds; pipes and fittings, by nearly twenty-eight million pounds; cotton seed oil, by nearly four and one-half million pounds.

The through passenger service of the Western Pacific Railway from Salt Lake to San Francisco is about to begin. Locomotives and cars of the best types are arriving at Salt Lake daily. The freight service has been in operation for some time. The road virtually parallels the Central Pacific, crossing the Sierras to the north of it by the canyon of the Middle Fork of the Feather River, coming into the Sacramento Valley at Oroville. It traverses some of the most famous of the old mining countries.

The Cunard Co. has building for the Atlantic trade the Franconia, 18,000 tons and 20 knots, and has just contracted for a sister ship. These it calls intermediate ships, in contradistinction to the Mauretania and Lusitania, styled express ships. At the general meeting held lately it was hinted that negotiations are being carried on with a view to building another of this class.

According to Comptroller Williams, the State of New York spends more than one-seventh of its revenue in the care of the insane. During a period of ten years, from Oct. 1, 1899, the receipts of the State were $342,025,805: the expenditure on insane asylums was $54,018,261.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Advanced sheets of the Bureau of the Census, Washington, D. C., give interesting details of the growth of religion throughout the country, which the Bureau says is faster than population in the principal cities, owing chiefly to the greater strength of the Catholic Church.

The report follows:

Much greater than the rate of increase in the population of the principal cities between 1900 and 1906 was their gain in the number of religious organizations and communicants or members, according to part I of the special U. S. Census report on the Census of Religious Bodies for 1906, now in press. It is stated that, for the area outside these cities, the rate of increase in the number of organizations was approximately the same as the rate of increase in population, and in the number of communicants or members it was considerably greater.

In the general tables and the textual discussion in the report the 160 principal cities, those having 25,000 inhabitants or more in 1900, were divided into four classes, according to population; 11 cities of the first class, having over 300,000 population; 27 cities of the second class, having from 100,000 to 300,000 inhabitants; 40 cities of the third class, from 50,000 to 100,000 population; and 82 cities of the fourth class, having from 25,000 to 50,000 inhabitants.

The report declares that, among the different classes of cities, the first class showed the most notable increase, more than doubling the number of organizations and communicants; the third and fourth classes followed closely; while the second had a much lower rate. Outside the principal cities the rate of increase was even less.

The number of communicants or members in each 1,000 of population in 1906 was, for the principal cities, 469; for the whole country, 391, and for the sections outside of the principal cities, 363. The ratio of communicants to population was considerably greater for the principal cities than for the country as a whole. Comparing the different classes of cities it appears that the ratios for cities of the first and second classes were considerably smaller than for the other two classes. As compared with 1890 the report shows a gain of 90 communicants in each 1,000 of population for the principal cities, and of 51 outside of them. Among the different classes of cities, the largest gain, 106 communicants per 1,000 population, was found in the cities of the third class. The smallest gain was in those of the first class, and the next smallest in the second class.

It is affirmed by the report that the high ratios of communicants or members to population shown for the principal cities, as compared with the area outside those cities, are due chiefly to the greater strength of the Roman Catholic Church in the cities; and the greater proportionate increase in communicants or members between 1890 and 1906 shown for these cities is said also to be largely due to the same cause. The report observes that the fact that in 1906 the number of principal cities was larger by 36 than in 1890, and that in addition, during the sixteen-year interval, a considerable territory had been annexed to various cities, augments to a noticeable extent the rates of increase for the principal cities and diminishes the rates of increase for the area outside these cities. It is said that the latter fact does not materially affect the changes between 1890 and 1906 in the ratios of communicants or members to population.

There were 4,082,039, or 32 per cent. more female than male members or communicants in continental United States in 1906, while in the principal cities the excess of female members was proportionately less, being 960,526, or 23.5 per cent. Comparing the different classes of cities, it appears that in those of the first class the excess of female over male members was only 18 per cent.; in the second class, 28.9 per cent.; in the third class, 25.8 per cent.; in the fourth class, 31.1 per cent.; and outside of these cities, 35.9 per cent. It is stated that the greater proportion of males in the principal cities is largely due to the greater proportionate strength of the Roman Catholic Church in these cities.

Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli, Bishop of Palestrina, Papal Legate to the Montreal Eucharistic Congress, intends leaving Ostend on August 25 and spending the night in London. The next day he will go to Liverpool in the company of the Most Rev. Francis Bourne, Archbishop of Westminster, and the Duke of Norfolk, where the three will embark on the Empress of Ireland, in which their cabins are already reserved. On this steamship there will be ten portable altars, on which Masses may be said from 5 to 8 every morning of the voyage. On Sunday there will be pontifical high Mass at 8 o'clock on the third-class deck. His Eminence will be received incognito at Rimouski by the General Manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who has invited him and a party of invited guests to visit Niagara Falls on September 1. Thence the Cardinal and his companions will go to Toronto, leaving that city by steamboat on September 4 and arriving in Montreal on the evening of September 5.

The Right Rev. John B. MacGinley, recently consecrated Bishop of Neuva Ca-

ceres, P. I., received $7,000 from the clergy of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia in token of their esteem, and $2,770 from the parishioners of St. Charles Borromeo's Church, whom he served for twenty years.

PERSONAL

A public reception was given on May 19 to the Rt. Rev. J. J. Rice, the newly-consecrated bishop of the Diocese of Burlington, Vt. The mayor of the city presided and among those present were prominent officials of the State and leading citizens of Burlington. Judging from the cordiality of the reception, in which Catholics and Protestants were united, we may hope that a new era of prosperity has begun for the Church in the Green Mountain State. The Burlington Free Press records the event and pays its respects in the following editorial to the new bishop:

"The reception tendered to Rt. Rev. Joseph J. Rice, the newly consecrated bishop of the Burlington diocese, was a handsome tribute, representing all classes of people in Burlington and other Vermont cities regardless of religious faith, as well as the city, State and National Government. Bishop Rice had already made a pleasing impression on the people of Vermont whom he has met, and the splendid spirit manifested in the course of his remarks last evening further endeared him to his hearers. Bishop Rice's ability to get into close touch with the people is evident, and we believe he will be popular with our people in general as well as a most zealous and effective administrator for the great Church which he represents. If Bishop Rice is captivated by the beautiful scenery he has found within our gates, and the warmth of this community's spirit of hospitality, certainly our people are rejoiced to welcome him as a citizen as well as a religious worker whose congenial presence must add materially to his effectiveness in every field of labor."

Mrs. R. J. Page, second daughter of John Mitchell, the Irish patriot leader of the '48 movement, who died at Lebanon, Pa., recently, was born in Dublin sixty-four years ago, and after her father's escape, in 1853, from Australian exile, lived with him in both this country and France. She was the widow of Roger J. Page, of Richmond, Va.

Two of Mitchell's daughters, it will be remembered, became Catholics in Paris, at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, and the eldest entered the community. The family of his son, the late Captain James Mitchell, in this city, are all Catholics. Mitchell's father was the Unitarian pastor of the old church near the "little green" at Newry.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The New York Evening Post of May 14 has a letter on the situation in France from a correspondent who expresses himself in clear and vigorous English:

"Happily no law in France is applicable till the 'règlement d'administration' regulating its application has appeared in the Officiel. There are on the statute books laws duly voted, that are in a state of suspended animation for twenty years or more. Thus the government can take its time and break it gently to the working classes. The Judeo-Masonic coterie (or Third Republic) itself needs a rest. Like M. Combes, in his famous speech at Auxerre (recorded by me in these columns in October, 1904), the 'bloc' is breathless from a surfeit of victories. Twenty thousand Catholic schools closed, their teachers despoiled and dispersed—the church reduced to the condition of the man who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho—every bishopric robbed not only of its revenues but of its episcopal residences and seminaries with all their treasures of art, manuscripts, and invaluable archives and libraries. Is it surprising that M. Briand should sigh for peace, for union and concord? Anti-patriotism, anti-militarism, alcoholism, and the propaganda of vice and obscenity have really gone too far. Those who have profited by it wish to kick away the ladder and turn virtuous. The sheep must be allowed to grow new wool. Mr. Roosevelt's sojourn in Paris finds the government in this righteous mood. His lecture at the Sorbonne quite expresses the present attitude of the Third Republic. Mr. Roosevelt is still supposed, for some unknown reason, to represent the American people, and his cordial intimacy with the men who have accomplished the program of iniquity of the last ten years can only be interpreted as approval and sympathy with the 'ideals' of tyranny, oppression, and spoliation realized by the 'bloc.' That the Rough Rider who took so active a part in the most unjustifiable of wars should to-day be discoursing with M. De Constant and Léon Bourgeois on the necessity of appealing to the Hague Court of Arbitration, is amazing! The first of these Peace Conferences was followed by two of the most unjustifiable of wars. At the second, M. Léon Bourgeois was discoursing on the iniquity of bombarding unfortified towns, a barbarism which he said would never again take place. And at that very hour the French fleet was bombarding Casablanca, killing thousands of women and children. This same Second Peace Conference was appealed to in vain by a delegation of the Koreans, who were being butchered en masse by the Japanese. To-day, Mr. Roosevelt is appealed to to bring about a third conference at The Hague. The Young Turk party or Judeo-Masonic régime, founded in Constantinople by Emmanuel Caruso, the grand master of Spanish Freemasons, with headquarters at Salonica, stands in slippery places. Albanians are on the warpath and must be stopped. International Freemasonry must strengthen the hands of the Young Turks.

"J. N. Brodhead.

"Paris, April 24."

Speaking before the Young Men's Institute in San Francisco lately, a well-known attorney, Mr. Stanislaus Riley, said:

"Somewhere there must be a remedy for our social distress and a remedy that will cure these ills and eradicate the causes. That remedy is what George Washington offered as a preventive a century ago, when he urged his countrymen to hold fast to their religion. He warned them that national morality cannot prevail except upon a basis of religion. His words have come to pass. We have banished God from our schools, we have excluded consideration of Him from the most sacred of human relations—the family—and we are rapidly increasing in the number of those who never enter the portals of a house of worship. In our public and private relations we lay down no standard of action save the treacherous and uncertain rule of natural virtue.

"And yet how easy would be the solution of all our problems were we to cling to the principles that Washington laid down and that must naturally commend themselves to us not alone upon the ground that all others have failed but upon the loftier ground of the manifest merits of the principles themselves. Were capital and labor to meet upon the common ground that by the moral law each has rights and each has duties; that the employer is entitled to an honest day's work and that the employee is entitled to a living wage, and what constituted an honest day's work and what constituted a fair and living wage were to be solved by the contracting parties in the light of the moral principle that each in conscience should render to the other what was the other's due; if the public officer were to regard his office as a public trust and his stewardship a matter for which he must render an exact account to the Master of Masters, who knoweth all things; if we should realize that those fateful words 'for better, for worse, until death do us part,' are a solemn vow recorded in high heaven itself and not a rhetorical platitude to be uttered with the lips and dismissed lightly from the mind, what a world of crime, of oppression, of corruption, of sin, and of misery would melt away before the face of true Christian moral principle, even as the shades of night fade before the blazing disc of the rising sun."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

An esteemed subscriber in Chicago sends us the following very practical note:

"After reading in No. 58 of your glorious weekly, the article on 'Masons and Methodists in Rome,' it struck me that contributions towards the struggling Catholic language schools organized to offset the infernal Methodist propaganda in the Eternal City, might be very acceptable. Would you be in position, and at the same time kind enough, to forward the enclosed mite to Father De Mandato, or headquarters of the schools?"

AMERICA accepts the commission with much pleasure, will forward the contribution to Father De Mandato, and hopes that its columns, always open to such excellent service, will, in the near future, be able to record many similar manifestations of practical effort to help the schools in Rome.

CATHOLIC PROGRESS IN ARKANSAS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It may be a matter of general interest to Catholics to know that a convention of Catholic Laymen of the State of Arkansas was held in this city on May 10 and 11. In addition to the regular program, the Convention passed resolutions recommending that the laymen of this diocese assist the clergy in the work of spreading the Faith and managing the affairs of the Church where practicable; aid and assist our worthy bishop in the publication of a Catholic weekly; perfect some plan for the support of the new diocesan orphanage, and organize for the purpose of building chapels in the rural districts of this State. The Convention organized under the title of the "Catholic Laymen's Association of Arkansas," adopting by-laws and a constitution and electing proper officers. Each parish in the State nominated four delegates to the Convention, and two hundred were in attendance.

The paper of the diocese, for the publication of which a corporation is being formed, and for which $2,400 in stock has been subscribed, will be known as The Arkansas Catholic Record, and Monsignor J. M. Lucey, of Pine Bluffs, Arkansas, will be the editor.

The action of our bishop in calling this convention is in keeping with the progress he has made in all affairs of the Church since coming into our midst, and will no doubt result in an organization of Catholics such as no other State has had, the benefits of which will be far-reaching and of a permanent and most desirable nature.

Arkansas, at this time, is experiencing a steady advance and era of prosperity in all things material, and it is not the intention of the Catholics of the State to permit our Faith to be neglected or forgotten in the State-wide uplift. Asa C. Gracie.

CHRONICLE

Western Railroads Enjoined.—In response to a statement from shipping interests that certain railroads were about to be make an increase in freight rates amounting to something like $500,000,000 a year, President Taft instructed Attorney-General Wickersham to bring an injunction against twenty-five of these railroads in the Middle West. The writ restraining them from making the proposed advances was issued by Judge Dyer, of the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern Circuit of Missouri. The petition filed by the Government charges that the contemplated advance in rates was agreed on by the defendants without competition, and in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. It is believed that the litigation thus begun is likely to make an important chapter in the history of the great conflict between the people and the corporations. The concerted action of the western roads has been followed by a similar movement in the East, where several roads have announced rate increases ranging from 3 to 31 per cent. President Taft gave a hearing on Monday to a large delegation of railroad presidents who felt aggrieved over the injunction suit. The result of the conference was that the Western railroad presidents agreed to suspend all increases of rates until the pending interstate commerce bill goes into effect; the President, in return, promised to discontinue the suit against the Western Traffic Association at that date.

Railroad Bill is Passed.—The Administration Railroad Bill was passed in the Senate by a vote of 50 to 12.

Every Republican present and six Democrats voted for its passage. The bill was before the Senate for twelve weeks, preventing during that long period the consideration of other important measures before Congress. The House greatly changed the original form of the bill before passing it, and the Senate has perhaps gone even further than the House. One of the salient features of the measure as it passed the Senate is the creation of a new "Court of Commerce," which will deal exclusively with appeals from orders of the interstate commerce commission. The court is to consist of five judges, to sit regularly in Washington, whose powers are to be coordinate with the judges of the Federal circuit court. They are to be appointed in the first instance by the President for terms respectively of one, two, three, four and five years, each judge as he retires to take up the work of a circuit bench, these and other vacancies to be filled by appointment by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. The Government rather than the Interstate Commerce Commission is made the defendant in all cases coming before the court; but the commission is permitted to intervene, as are other interested parties. The defense is placed under the direction of the Attorney-General, but the commission and interested parties are permitted to have counsel and to carry on the suit in case of the failure of the Attorney-General to do so. Appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court. As the House has already acted on a similar measure, the bill will not go to conference. It is rumored in Washington that the bill will never pass the conference stage at this session, but will be put off until next winter. Color is given to the presumption because the bill contains many provisions of the utmost importance to the carriers and the country, which have not been properly debated and digested.

Policemen Honor Dead.—The annual memorial service for the members of the police force of New York City was held at St. Patrick's Cathedral in the afternoon of June 5. Three thousand uniformed patrolmen attended the exercises, at which His Grace Archbishop Farley presided in the sanctuary and the Rt. Rev. Mgr. Lavelle made the address of welcome. The Rev. Francis J. Sullivan, chaplain of the Police Department, delivered the sermon, in which he urged the men to cultivate a moral courage equal to their physical bravery. The Benediction of the Most Blessed Sacrament followed, Archbishop Farley officiating.

When prayer had been offered for their departed comrades the policemen joined in singing the hymn "Holy God, We Praise Thy Name," accompanied by their own band. The trumpeters then advanced to the altar railing and sounded "taps," and the service was over. The men were in charge of Chief Inspector Schmittberger and Commissioner Baker and nearly all the inspectors and captains were present.

Nicaraguan Situation.—In view of the reports circulated in the American newspapers that there has been a week of bloody fighting at Bluefields, and that the Government forces have been defeated and put to flight, the official denial of these reports by President Madriz is informing, and shows that there are still influences at work to force if possible the United States Government to step in and assume control in Nicaragua. In his statement President Madriz says: "The report of General Chavarria's defeat is absolutely false. For purely military reasons his column, which was operating against Rama, was ordered to fall back on Muelle de los Bueyes, where it arrived to-day in perfect order, with all military stores. Owing to the difficulty of transporting provisions to the troops operating at Bluefields, because of the heavy rains, the columns of General Lara and Godoy were ordered to retire on El Almendro. Our military position is entirely advantageous, as results will very shortly show. If Bluefields were defended only by the revolutionists, we should have captured it long ago." The last sentence seems to intimate that Americans are the cause of the failure.

Canadian Items.—There has recently been an exchange of views between Canada and Great Britain as to the control of steamship rates. The Canadian desire to control lake and ocean freights springs largely from the fact that water traffic originates, after a short rail haul, as far west as Fort William, Ont., the head of Canadian navigation at the northwestern extremity of Lake Superior, a thousand miles from Montreal. Thence wheat is borne to Liverpool, and the railway commission has no control over water, lake and ocean traffic. Moreover, the Canadian Pacific Railway owns and operates the largest line of transatlantic steamships running from Canadian ports, and the Canadian Northern Railway has gone into the ocean-carrying business on a big scale. While these companies must submit to having their rail rates regulated by the government, they can, nevertheless, adjust their ocean freights in such a way as to offset the effect of such regulation. Judge Mabey, chairman of the railway commission, thinks that control of ocean rates through international agreement is feasible. It was authoritatively stated at Ottawa on June 2 that the plan thus far contemplated relies upon the established jurisdiction of the Dominion Railway Commissioners and the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose chairman is Mr. Martin Knapp.—The Hon. A. C. Rutherford, Premier, Minister of Education and Provincial Treasurer of Alberta, resigned as a result of the Great Waterways scandal. Lieutenant-Governor Bulyea immediately called upon the Hon. A. L. Sifton, Chief Justice of the Alberta Supreme Court, to form a new cabinet. He was sworn in as Prime Minister the same day. He accepts office on the understanding that his cabinet and supporters will cancel the Great Waterways contract.—In order to facilitate the organization of the new Canadian navy the British Admiralty has lent Engineer-Lieutenant P. Howe, of the Admiralty Dockyard Branch, to Canada for service on the Ottawa Headquarters Staff.

Industrial Training in Canada.—Realizing that the future industrial efficiency of Canada depends upon skilled artisans, the Ottawa Government, on June 2, appointed a royal commission to investigate in Europe and the United States methods of industrial training and technical education. It will consist of James W. Robertson, of Montreal, formerly principal of Macdonald College; John N. Armstrong, of North Sydney, N. S.; Dr. George Bryce, of Winnipeg, president of the Royal Society of Canada and founder of Manitoba College; Gaspard Deserres, president of the Technical Institute of Montreal; David Forsythe, principal of the Berlin, Ont., Collegiate and Technical Institute; Gilbert M. Murray, secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association; and James Simpson, of Toronto, who was recommended by the Dominion Trades and Labor Congress. Mr. Thomas Bengough, of Toronto, has been appointed secretary. The Minister of Labor, Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King, through whose efforts legislation for the establishment of the Commission was enacted, states that the first step will be a tour of Canada from coast to coast.

Roman News.—The Biblical Commission has issued the following decision with the Holy Father's approval:

1.—The appellations, Psalms of David, etc., used in the Councils of the Church and the opinion of many Fathers and Doctors ascribing all the psalms to David alone have not such force as to oblige one to hold him to be the sole author of the one hundred and fifty psalms.

2.—From the concordance of the Hebrew text with the Alexandrine Greek and with other versions one may rightly conclude that the titles prefixed to the Hebrew text are older than the Septuagint version, and have been derived, if not from the authors themselves of the psalms, at least from ancient Jewish tradition.

3.—These titles as witnesses of Jewish tradition may not prudently be called in question when there is no grave argument against their genuineness.

4.—The not unfrequent testimony of the Sacred Scriptures concerning the natural skill of David, illumined by the Holy Ghost, in the composition of religious canticles, the institutions laid down by him for their chant, the attribution of psalms to him by both the Old and the New Testaments, the inscriptions of the psalms and the agreement of the Jews and the Fathers and Doctors of the Church make it imprudent to deny him to be the principal author of the psalms, and forbid one to affirm him to be the author of only a few.

5.—The Davidical origin cannot be denied of those psalms which both in the Old and New Testaments are cited expressly under David's name.

6.—It is possible to admit the opinion that some psalms, either of David or of other authors, which for liturgical or musical reasons, the carelessness of amanuenses or other causes, have been divided or united; and that other psalms have been slightly revised or modified by the omission or addition of a versicle or two, saving however the inspiration of the whole sacred text, in order to adapt them the better to the historical circumstances or solemnities of the Jewish people.

7.—The opinion of some more recent writers drawn from merely internal indications or from inaccurate interpretation of the sacred text, that not a few of the psalms were composed after the time of Esdras and Nehemias, or even after that of the Macchabees, cannot be maintained as probable.

8.—From the manifold testimonies of the New Testament, the unanimous agreement of the Fathers and the admission of Jewish writers, several prophetic and Messianic psalms are to be recognized and are not to be twisted into mere predictions concerning the future lot of the Chosen People.

Great Britain.—In receiving the freedom of the city, Mr. Roosevelt assumed the rôle of admonitor recommending to the Government greater vigor in Egypt. His remarks have generally been received favorably or unfavorably according to the politics of those commenting on them. Mr. Balfour, who was in the audience, is said to have applauded.—Capital, political and otherwise, is being made out of the late king's death. Unionists countenance the opinion that it was hastened by the Government's pledging itself to insist on his creating peers to carry their reforms through the Lords. Liberals, on the other hand, attribute it to his displeasure at the rejection of the Budget by the Peers. Certain Anti-Vaccinationists and anti-vivisectionists say it was due to a vaccine treatment he received to prevent influenza and pneumonia. The Royal Family are hardly able to interfere in the very unbecoming dispute between the political parties, but Queen Alexandra has given an unqualified denial to the last assertion.—Mr. Roosevelt delivered the Romanes lecture at Oxford on the 7th inst., when he also received the honorary D.C.L. degree.—The Scott Antarctic expedition has sailed. Captain Scott will join it in New Zealand. He hopes to reach the south pole next January.—The dispute concerning wages that threatened to end in a strike in the Lancashire cotton mills has been put off for three months. The mill owners undertake to maintain the existing schedule for that period, holding that such differences should be suspended during the present national mourning.—The Hon. C. S. Rolls crossed to France in an aeroplane and returned in a virtually continuous trip. His feat has caused great enthusiasm in England, though it is hardly to be compared with the flight of Curtiss from Albany to New York.—King George's clemency to prisoners is not so extraordinary as it was reported to be. He has merely granted a slight reduction of sentence from a week in those that have a month to run, to three months in those that are yet five years or more from their term.

Ireland.—The complete accounts of the rival meetings held in Cork City on the same day by Mr. O'Brien on the one hand and Mr. Redmond and the Irish party on the other, show that there was no foundation for the press stories of riots and disorder. The Dublin Leader says: "At the height of a party contest in England we doubt if two rival meetings such as these at Cork on Sunday, could have been held in the one town without a riot." It also appears that Mr. Redmond got a better reception in Cork and produced a better impression than Mr. O'Brien. The cabled reports of "murderous rioting" a few days later were founded on a brawl at a village fair in which one man, a non-combatant, was accidentally shot by a policeman.—The Treasury estimates of the increase of Irish taxation due to the Lloyd-George Budget are now raised from $2,100,000 to $3,100,000. As the tax was so constructed as to be gradually expansive, it is held that in a year or two the original increase will be more than doubled. Meanwhile Mr. T. W. Russell, Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture and Industry, complains that he finds it difficult to extract from the treasury any money for necessary improvements.

Egypt.—The sentence of death passed on the murderer of Boutros Pasha was, according to Egyptian law, submitted to the Mufti. He refused to approve it, the Daily Telegraph says, for three reasons, viz.: because the Koran says nothing about revolvers as instruments of murder; because the victim was a Christian; and because his family did not appear among the prosecutors. It considers this to imply an active sympathy of the head of the Mohammedan religion with the revolutionists. The Times, on the other hand, makes light of the matter, saying that the reference of a capital sentence to the Mufti is a mere matter of form, and that this sentence will be confirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Rioting in Hunan Province, China.—Our Correspondent in Shanghai sends AMERICA the following account of the recent Chongsha rioting: "All foreign property, missionary and other, has been totally wrecked. No lives lost. The outburst, though finally due to scarcity of rice, seems to have been planned and carried out with great thoroughness. The rioting lasted four days and nights, during which officials were in hiding, the army sided with the populace and the new model police kept within barracks. Foreign gunboats were the first to reach the scene of disaster, the Chinese came only later on. Order is now restored. The Governor of the province has been dismissed. The foreign gunboats, though requested to leave, refuse to do so. The Powers are trying to reach the guilty disturbers, gentry, literati and patriotic students. Unrest still persists in other places of the province and fear is entertained it will spread along the Yangtse valley."

French Parliament.—The newly elected French Chamber of Deputies held its first sitting on June 1. Before the opening of the session a lively scene took place between Abbé Lemire and M. de Baudry d'Asson. The former, a Catholic priest whose political stand is not approved by ecclesiastical authorities, changed his seat from the Right of the house to the Left, where he received an ovation in consequence. The latter, who is familiarly known as "le vieux chouan" on account of his royalist zeal, rushed towards the Abbé in a threatening way and called him a renegade. Some deputies helped to preserve the peace and the incident had no further consequences. This first meeting, which was opened as usual under the presidency of the oldest member, M. Louis Passy, was devoted to the election of the provisional committee. M. Brisson was elected provisional president by 332 out of 478 votes. In order to affirm their independence of other parties the unified Socialists, who now number seventy-five and who sit on the extreme left of the chamber, refused to vote for M. Brisson and cast blank ballots. June 3 was spent in examining the validity of each election, and 505 elections were declared valid. On June 4 the special committees were sifting the voluminous evidence in 93 contested elections. The majorities of M. de Gontaut-Biron, Liberal, of M. Duplessy, Bonapartist, of M. Paté, Radical, and of M. Devèze, Independent Socialist, have been attacked as due to corrupt practices. It is alleged that each of these deputies has promised to distribute among those who voted for them six thousand out of the fifteen thousand francs yearly indemnity for deputies.

Two Teachers' Conventions in Germany.—Extended accounts are given in Germania of two conventions of Teachers' Associations recently held in Germany. No doubt to emphasize its attitude towards Bishop Fritzen of Strasburg, who some months ago, as AMERICA noted at the time, sharply criticized its tendencies, the General Association of State Teachers held its meeting in Bishop Fritzen's Episcopal city. Readers of AMERICA's educational notes in this issue will recognize the serious grounds which impelled the Bishop to speak as he did in his criticisms early this year. The Germania account notes with regret the evident strength Socialistic principles seem to have attained among the State teachers. The second convention, that of the Catholic School Teachers' body, was held on the same dates as that of the State Teachers' Association,—the men teachers convening in Bochum and the women in Koblenz. The feature of this second gathering was the vigorous protest made against coeducation and a strong endorsement of the resolution asking that "no married women should be permitted to continue to teach." Bishop Korum, of Treves, was present during the Koblenz meeting and delivered a splendid address on the teaching vocation.

Kaiser William's Allowance.—Last week the Government informed the different party leaders of the Prussian Landtag of its purpose to introduce a resolution increasing the "civil list" of Kaiser William as King of Prussia to about $5,000,000. The present allowance granted the King amounts to $3,925,000, no increase having been granted since 1889, when $875,000 was added to the sum then received by him. The reason of the proposed increase is the high cost of imperial living now that the Emperor's son and daughters are no longer children, the generous support he allows the opera and the court theatres of Berlin and Wiesbaden, and the expensive maintenance of his many town and country residences. All parties except the Social Democrats appear willing to accede to the Government's wishes. These latter, probably because their opinion had not been asked in the matter, announce that they will enter strong protest against the measure.

Election Results in Hungary.—As forecasted last week the Government has won a majority in the next Diet. Contrary to expectation, however, the victory of Graf Khuen-Hedevary and his party is a mighty one. The policy governing in Hungary's elections, as explained in the Chronicle last week, no doubt gives decisive advantage to the party in control, but it seemed scarcely possible that the defeat of the parties headed by Kossuth and Justh would prove to be as overwhelming as reports make it. Probably the deplorable attack made upon the Premier and his associates in the cabinet at the close of the last parliament has influenced the Hungarian electors. Advices from Budapest at the time declared that such would prove to be the case.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Tercentenary of the Visitation

The three hundredth anniversary of the Visitation Order, which occurred on the 6th inst., will remind those who have read the Lives of St. Francis de Sales and St. Jane Frances de Chantal how all the circumstances surrounding the foundation of that great Order were stamped with the seal of a special Providence. When God wishes to save a nation or to reform His Church, he sends an extraordinary outpouring of grace. This was apparent during the sixteenth century which witnessed the birth, marriage and widowhood of Jane Frances. Italy had its Pius V, Charles Borromeo, Philip Neri; Spain produced Ignatius of Loyola, Teresa of Avila, Peter of Alcantara, John of the Cross; the British Isles had their legions of martyrs and heroic confessors of the Faith; and France was soon to witness the sublime charity of St. Vincent de Paul, the apostolic life of St. John Francis Regis, the sanctity of St. Peter Fourier and Blessed John Eudes.

Thus the time was ripe for a new and great saint, who was to be trained by another wonderful saint. The meeting of these two chosen souls was prepared by a vision which each had of the other several years before they met face to face and instantly recognized each other. Jane Frances was ardent and impetuous; Francis de Sales wise, gentle, patient. She longed to break with the world and enter some austere cloistered order; but he quietly kept her waiting two entire years until he had thoroughly matured his plans and could feel that they were approved by the Holy Ghost, and even after he unfolded to her his project of a new religious order, he waited three years longer before he finally, and conjointly with her, founded it.

Providential, too, was her own remote preparation for this great work of her life. God bestowed on her a remarkable strength of character, that "admirable force of spirit" for which the Church praises her in the collect for her feast. He also dowered her with a compelling beauty, somewhat severe in its fortitude and holy ardor, but so tempered with sweetness and humility that she won all hearts and overcame all obstacles. Her mother died when Jane was only eighteen months old. This early loss is often a serious handicap in a child's development; but in the case of one who was destined to so arduous a labor as the foundation of a religious order, this withdrawal of a mother's fond caresses enabled her father to give her a thoroughly virile education. Bénigne Frémyot, one of the staunchest Catholics of his day, an inflexible but just judge, initiated his daughter into that life of faith, generosity and self-sacrifice of which she was to be in the seventeenth century so shining an example. To this invaluable paternal training was afterwards added the spiritual paternity of St. Francis de Sales, who completed her father's work, moderating by his meekness the zeal and energy she had inherited from M. Frémyot.

Moreover, as the Order of the Visitation was destined for maidens and widows, God led her in the paths of holiness as maid, wife, mother and widow, so that she might have the widest possible experience. And because the religious state is a life of interior trials and crucifixion, she was prepared for it by great crosses. As wife, she loses her husband quite young; as mother, she sees almost all her children and grandchildren die; as a nun, she suffers from strange diseases and horrible temptations; as foundress, she is confronted with almost insurmountable difficulties, harassed by vile slander, but she never loses heart. Being called upon to give up everything for God, she had received from Him a noble lineage, illustrious friends, beauty, great wealth, parents whom she loved, and four charming children of her own; all of which she leaves for the lowliness of the cloister, thus proving to the world that its most lawful joys cannot compare with the happiness of loving God and living for Him alone.

Meanwhile the Lord Himself was preparing the first companions of St. Jane Frances de Chantal: Marie Jacqueline Favre, daughter of the president of the parliament of Savoy; Charlotte de Bréhard, of a wealthy Burgundian family; Marie Péronne de Chatel, whose mother became a novice of the Visitation at the age of eighty with her own daughter as superior; Marie Aimée de Blonay, whom St. Francis de Sales had known from her cradle and whom he had trained for the Order, one of whose chief glories she was to be. These four cornerstones of the Visitation were like the foundress, women of noble origin. It seemed fitting that the nobility, which had well nigh ruined France in the corruptions of the courts of Francis I, Henry II, Henry III and Charles IX, should now inaugurate and foster the Catholic revival of the seventeenth century. And in point of fact the Order of the Visitation, with more than a hundred monasteries scattered all over France before the end of that great age of faith and fervor, was one of the principal factors in that renewal of piety which bore its fairest fruitage in Paray-le-Monial, where Christ Himself revealed to a Visitation nun the devotion to His Sacred Heart.

Jane Frances with Marie Jacqueline Favre and Charlotte de Bréhard—the two others were to follow later—took possession of their humble abode, "la maison de la galerie" at Annecy, in the evening of June 6, 1610, which that year was Trinity Sunday, and received from St. Francis de Sales a first draught of their constitutions. The Order of the Visitation was intended for pious women who wished to practice self-denial and to lead a life of retirement and prayer, but whose bodily strength was not sufficient for such austere orders as were common at that time. In creating this new type of religious congregation St. Francis de Sales and St. Chantal evidently met one of the most urgent needs of their time and may be said to have taken "le grand siècle" by storm. Even the saintly Bishop of Geneva was almost frightened at the growing popularity of his Order nine short years after its foundation. The type would have been a still newer one, it would have been an uncloistered congregation of women, then an unheard of novelty, had he and the foundress been allowed to have their own way. But when first the new community was introduced from its cradle at Annecy, Savoy, into France, the Archbishop of Lyons, Cardinal de Marquemont, insisted upon the enclosure and would not allow the nuns to visit the sick and poor as they, forestalling the foundation of St. Vincent de Paul's Sisters of Charity, had already begun to do. In the whole life of St. Francis de Sales nothing is more edifying than his yielding on these points to the man whom he recognized as the greatest bishop in France, although his own respectful remonstrances, supported by no less an authority than Cardinal Bellarmine, are much more convincing than the groundless fears of the Archbishop of Lyons. However, the subsequent history of the Visitation shows that Francis was right in yielding and that the sweetly contemplative character of the Order is ensured by the enclosure. The Holy Father, Pius X, in a brief, dated December 13, 1909, addressed to the Monastery of the Visitation of Annecy and to all the religious of the Order, insists on the contemplative character of the Institute: "You," he says, "who have chosen the better part, keep it; and do not allow yourselves to turn away from your holy resolution under pretext of procuring the salvation of your neighbor, in the false notion that the stormy period we are passing through requires not a life dedicated to contemplation, but a life of action."

Before the recent persecutions in France there were more than two hundred Visitation convents in the world. There are still about one hundred and eighty-seven, twenty-one of which are in the United States. Very commonly in Europe and here boarding schools for girls are directed by the Visitation Nuns. There are, however, in this country two monasteries without academies, one at Wilmington, Del., and the other at Riverdale-on-Hudson, New York. May this third centenary of their foundation intensify, as the Holy Father says, their fidelity to "the rule fixed for them by the Holy Bishop of Geneva and his blessed disciple; so long as the authority of this legislation will remain in force among them, their Institute can subsist in its integrity."

LEWIS DRUMMOND, S.J.

Creeds and Screeds

A creed should express one's belief, a screed may express what one does not believe. The distinction was suggested by reading the report of the sixteenth quadrennial session of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, which was held at Asheville, N. C., and came to a close on the eve of Trinity

Sunday. The meetings of the Conference were appropriately held during Pentecost week, and the closing exercises were conducted by the senior bishop, who expressed the belief that safe, sane and conservative measures had been adopted, and that the church would in the next quadrennium "go forward with leaps and bounds."

The last day of the conference, say the press reports, brought more confusion than any other session. Late in the afternoon the question of revising the "Apostles Creed" came up. In common with most Protestant professions of faith, that of the Methodist Episcopal Church South still preserves the wording of the ninth article of the Roman creed: the "Holy Catholic Church." The question of substituting the words "Church of God" for "Holy Catholic Church" precipitated an animated discussion, and led to a parliamentary tangle that was not settled till the whole matter was declared out of order. The proposition to make the change was reported unfavorably. Then were heard the first rumblings of a mighty storm. Those who were in favor of the change moved to reject the report and adopt the proposal. "Counter motions, points of order and parliamentary maneuvers followed each other in such rapid succession that for a time the conference did not know just what it was doing." Some advanced as a reason for the change that the words "Holy Catholic Church" in the Creed were confusing, especially to "young people who interpret them to mean the Roman Catholic Church," unwittingly bearing witness to the truth of what St. Augustine said long ago: "Although all heretics wish to be styled Catholic, yet if any one ask where is the Catholic place of worship none of them would venture to point out his own conventicle."

The older folks naturally knew better than to be misled, for when they say "Holy Catholic," whatever else they may mean, they are sure not to exclude holy Protestant. But it was of supreme moment that the unsophisticated should be safeguarded from error. At length the vote was taken on the proposition to make the change and it was carried by 77 to 72. It was here that the "deus ex machina"—we cannot believe it was the Holy Spirit—intervened to save the situation. The point was made that the whole proposition was out of order, as the proposed alteration did not specify the article by number as required by the basic law of the church.

To an outsider an appeal to the Bible would seem the proper procedure at this juncture. Bible Christians were at sea regarding a tenet of their belief and for Bible Christians the Bible we thought was the sole rule of faith. Instead of that the appeal was made to the basic law of the church, to something higher therefore than creed and other than Bible. Not one of the seventy-seven who favored the substitution thought of amending the motion by adding the number of the article. The existing state of confusion may explain the oversight. But the presiding bishop had his wits about him. He promptly passed the steam-roller over the insurgents by upholding the contention and throwing the whole question out. So the words "Holy Catholic Church," though not expressing the sentiments of the majority at the Asheville General Conference will remain as before, and for the next four years, if not longer, the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South will profess, with due mental reservation, that they believe in the "Holy Catholic Church."

It may be noted here that this decision nowise binds the Methodist Episcopal Church (North), the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the Colored Methodists of the Reformed Zion Union Apostolic Church, the Union American Methodist Episcopal Church, the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the African Union Methodist Protestant Church, the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, the Methodist Protestant Church, the Wesleyan Methodist Connection of America, the Congregational Methodist Church, the New Congregational Methodist Church, the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church, the Primitive Methodist Church in the United States of America, the Free Methodist Church of North America or the Reformed Methodist Union Episcopal Church.

The convention of these latter-day apostles offers a striking contrast to that gathering of the faithful who at the first Pentecostal season "were persevering with one mind, in prayer with the women, and Mary, the Mother of Jesus, and his brethren." The Apostles there assembled were of one mind as to their mission and the means of accomplishing it. Only a week before they had received their commission from Christ himself. His words were ringing in their ears: "Going therefore, teach ye all nations . . . teach them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Had the Apostles been called upon to decide what name would most fittingly describe the character of the organization or church which they were commanded to spread throughout the world, there would have been no division of opinion, for they were of one mind. They were of one mind because they believed the same revealed truths. "Church of God" or "Holy Church" or "Holy Catholic Church" were synonymous to them, for there was no rival organization to claim allegiance. But were those primitive Christians to express their belief in a formula to-day they would unhesitatingly stand for belief in the Holy Catholic Church exactly as Catholics understand that article of the Creed. The mission with which they were entrusted was Catholic—not Catholic in the sense that the Church is an institution invested by Christ with unlimited power to add to its number but with no power to expel, nor Catholic in the meaning that the Church should ban nothing which a rational creature wishes to believe, nor again Catholic in various loose interpretations expressed by modern sectaries, but Catholic in the meaning conveyed by the Lord's original command to His Apostles to teach all nations, to teach "them to observe all that I have commanded you," wherein is implied catholicity or universality of doctrine as well as actual diffusion of the Church throughout the world. Therein He laid down a definite standard of belief according to which men were to be baptized and according to which "he that believeth not shall be condemned." These conceptions are far from exhausting the comprehensiveness of the word Catholic, for Catholic also embraces all peoples and implies perpetuity in time. To "teach all nations," to "preach the Gospel to every creature" is to exclude no race or condition of men; a work which was taken up by the Catholic Church on the First Pentecost Sunday, has been carried on without interruption to the present and will continue until the sands no longer run in the hour-glass of time. It was therefore on that great day which the Methodist brethren were commemorating by subjecting to examination their claim to the title of Catholic that the Apostolic Church received substantially from the lips of Christ Himself the title of Catholic, which has been her glory and her sole prerogative from that day to this.

Right reason demands that any religious organization should first know or determine what it stands for, and then adopt a term that will truly represent its nature or its mission. If it is not Catholic in the obvious and general acceptance of the word and is sailing under false colors, it should be honest enough to haul down its flag.

The Congregationalists in New Haven, at the same time as their Methodist friends in Asheville, were debating a like proposition, namely a change in their declaration of faith. They, with sterner logic, voted to drop their creed altogether, and to substitute a covenant by the confession of which members would be admitted in future without the subscription to any creed or the admission of any belief in the divinity of Jesus Christ. They knew they bore no commission from Christ and they frankly confessed it. Far away in Honolulu other Congregationalists, nominally Christians, have also been tinkering with their standard of teaching, finally adopting a new basis of membership which Hawaiians may accept without any radical modification in their primitive beliefs. The Congregationalists of Honolulu are not of one mind with the Apostles, but they are of one mind with the wealthy Congregationalists of New Haven. They have done away with a creed as they have done away with Christ. The aspirant to church membership has only to say: "I do now covenant and agree to associate myself together with you for greater effectiveness in serving men and for the progress of God's Kingdom throughout the world. To this end I promise to seek the peace of this Church, to promote its welfare and efficiency and faithfully to help in maintaining its worship, enlarging its activities and increasing its gifts."

We have no fault to find with anyone merely because he comes out in his true colors. We simply deplore the fact that these men are fast receding from the Sun of Justice, whose rays have enlightened them with the modicum of Christian revelation they possess, to be plunged again like their pagan ancestors into the world of exterior darkness. So too with our Methodist friends. Surely if the Methodist Episcopal Church South believes in the Catholic Church it is eminently proper for them to have it so stated in their formula of belief, that is, if the formula stands for a creed. If it does not believe in the Catholic Church and yet declares that it does, their so-called creed is merely a screed. EDWARD SPILLANE, S.J.

A Difficulty for George V

When Japan banished all Catholics from its shores it granted the Dutch a privilege of very restricted trade; and, lest any Catholic should share in this, the Shogun required every trader, so histories tell us, to trample on the Crucifix. Dutchmen and Englishmen too, having just finished half a century or so of Crucifix-trampling in Europe, found no difficulty in doing the same in the East; for Englishmen occasionally managed to buy at the appointed price a little bit of the Japan trade. Nevertheless, the ceremony, as a preliminary to huckstering, is so revolting to any decent mind that modern Englishmen and Dutchmen call the fact in question, doing their utmost to show it to be a fiction of malignant Spaniards and Portuguese.

The Shoguns thought lightly of salt-encrusted, sea-battered mariners who would deny their God for a little gain; and one can conceive them exacting the ceremony and despising its performers. Could they, on their side, have understood a Christian nation requiring a similar ceremony from its kings? Yet the Declaration against Transubstantiation imposed upon its sovereigns by the British Parliament, is an analogue of the Crucifix-trampling demanded from the traders by the Shoguns. These said to the merchants: "As some of you may be secretly Christians,"—to these perspicacious princes Christian and Catholic were one and the same—"Prove you are not by insulting what Christians most revere." Parliament, as Mr. Gairdner the historian, observes, says to the king: "You may be a secret Catholic. Prove you are not by outraging what Catholics hold most sacred, the Blessed Virgin Mary and the Saints, transubstantiation and the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass. Be good enough to say plumply that with regard to all these Catholics are idolaters." The traders obeyed the Shoguns and the kings obeyed Parliament. And traders and kings found, no doubt, a common justification; they were simply making their own the teaching and practice of Protestantism. This holds the Crucifix to be an idol no less than the Host, or the Blessed Virgin as venerated in the Catholic Church; and the trader manifested by his act that abhorrence of idolatry the king expressed in words. They, then, who are forced by a sense of decency to take from the memory of dead traders the stain of Crucifix-trampling, should be compelled by the same sense of decency to free a living king from the obligation of reviling Catholic faith and worship.

Parliament goes farther than the Shoguns did, and requires the king to declare that he has no dispensation from the Pope to lie. The Japanese intellect is acute. Had this ingenious device to secure absolute candor been suggested to a Shogun, he would possibly have answered: "To admit the possibility of such a dispensation would be to nullify the test. If the Pope can permit his servants first to lie and then to violate their religion that men may believe the lie, he can also give them permission to lie about such a dispensation and to deny its existence. I decline to stultify myself. Either the test alone or no test at all." Should one have insisted that the English demand such an assurance from their king, the answer would have been to the point: "Only barbarians could accept one capable of lying as their king: only a barbarian could wear a crown after such humiliation: only fools could believe a suspected liar assuring them that he does not lie."

The shameful test and still more shameful guarantee originated in the reign of Charles II. He was secretly a Catholic: his brother and heir, the Duke of York, was such openly. The Protestantism of the country took alarm. The Test Act passed in 1673 required from every public officer the oath of royal supremacy and a declaration against transubstantiation, as pledges of his renunciation of the Catholic religion and of its visible Head. The Duke had to resign his office of Lord High Admiral. His enemies were able to procure his temporary banishment. But they could not touch the royal dignity. Strong as they were, Parliament and the country would allow them neither to exclude the Duke from the succession, nor to impose the test upon the crown with a view to his taking it on succeeding to the throne.

Two years later the first outrageous story of Popish plots, De Luzancy's, fell to the ground. But in 1678 Titus Oates appeared, and, supported by Shaftesbury, kept the people for three years on the verge of insanity with his absurd perjuries of plots, murders and Papal dispensations. To this vile wretch's calumnies is due the offensive wording of the royal declaration, which, when the Revolution had degraded the majesty of the Crown, was introduced into the Bill of Rights and incorporated in the Act of Settlement of 1701; and has since been uttered by every English sovereign.

Catholic Relief Bills have abolished the oath and declaration for subjects generally, and the situation to-day is the exact reverse of what it was at the accession of James II. Then every subject in office had to take the Test: the sovereign was exempt. Now virtually every subject is exempt: only the king and one or two officers of the crown intimately connected with his official person have to take it.

Why does it survive? This is not an easy question to answer. We have shown that, if the theory it involves be true, it is absolutely worthless. On the other hand, the Act of Settlement which requires the king to be a Protestant, and forbids him and his heirs to embrace the Catholic Faith or to marry a Catholic, under penalty of deposition in one case, of exclusion in the other, amply guarantees the Protestant succession. Its language, offensive and absolutely unwarranted as every reasonable person knows, is a scandal to the Catholics of the Empire. It is an insult to the king, making him a liar by putting into his mouth words that are not true; for whatever Catholic worship may be it is not idolatrous, as Dr. Johnson sanely observed more than a hundred years ago. It is a further insult to the king inasmuch as it compels him to declare solemnly that he is not a liar, and to stultify himself by offering his word as the only guarantee of his truth. There are a few madmen who still think it a bulwark against Rome. But its Protestant supporters generally, English, Scots and Irish, objecting not only to its abrogation but also to any change in its terms, do so, we believe, through their inherited dislike of Catholicism. They have a vague notion that, though many Catholics of their acquaintance are good fellows, the religion as such is getting to be too bumptious. It ought to recognize its inferiority to Protestantism; but instead of this it asserts its superiority. They would not make conditions more onerous for us; but when there is question of relief on its own merits, that notion produces the adverse vote. And so all efforts made during the last reign for a moderating of the language of the declaration were fruitless. When Mr. Redmond's Bill was withdrawn last year because the narrow majority of ten by which it was referred to Committee could not be depended on to carry it through, the minority contained men of the best families of the three kingdoms, Liberal as well as Conservative, who, if asked why they had voted against the Bill, would have found it hard to give a reasonable answer.

There is some talk of a change before George V meets Parliament. They say he desires it. Certainly Catholics demand it. Lawyers find constitutional difficulties. A change requires an Act of Parliament. An Act is effective only when it has received royal assent. The king cannot give the assent before he has made the declaration. This, however, has to be proved, and we think it will not be hard to find examples since the Revolution, of sovereigns exercising analogous constitutional functions before making the declaration. Anyhow, it is not impossible to solve a constitutional difficulty. The Revolution and Pitt's Regency Bill are examples. Parliament is about to reassemble. Will anything be done? We can answer only in words which have become classical: "Wait and see."

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

A Model Catholic Congress

Some weeks ago a letter written to AMERICA gave interesting details regarding the annual Katholikentag to be held next August in Augsburg, Bavaria. The thoroughness marking every feature of the preliminary preparation for this yearly outpouring of German Catholics suggested useful hints to those charged with the economy of similar gatherings in the United States.

Last week AMERICA received a report of the proceedings of a Dutch Catholic Day held in Venlo, a city of the Diocese of Roermond in the province of Limburg. The statement will have its own interest and convey similar useful lessons to the committee now actively at work preparing for the annual convention of the Federation of Catholic Societies in our own country during the coming summer.

The idea of a general annual assembly made up of Catholics representing the entire kingdom has not yet been accepted in Holland. Nevertheless the fact that a well-attended convention forms each year a feature of Catholic activity in three of the country's dioceses assures us that the Dutch people recognize the help to be found in such gatherings in the development of united action for the promotion of Catholic interests.

Particularly in Roermond is this true. In this diocese the Catholic Day idea has found very fruitful ground. The active directors in the organization of the work here have long since learned the lesson that the purpose of such a congress is not a mere external show of strength but rather a mapping out of practical work which shall make for genuine progress in Catholic religious and social life.

Years back the Roermond meeting was wont to fritter away its strength in manner akin to that which still holds sway in Catholic meetings nearer home. There was then evident every year in the Dutch assembly, on the part of those in control of important Catholic works and movement, a marked desire to have the Congress recommend their interests to the public. Hence the consequence that an astonishing number and variety of things were submitted to the assembly's committee on Resolutions. The very multiplicity of commendations resulting from the subsequent report of the Committee made practical and effective work in the carrying out of measures approved by the assembled Catholic delegates almost an impossibility.

With the meeting held in 1908 there came a complete change of tactics. Probably the practical workmanship shown in the annual congresses of their neighbors, the Catholics of Germany, had made wholesome impression on the shrewd common sense of their coreligionists in Holland. Whatever be the reason, in the assembly of that and of succeeding years the impossible multiplicity of projects has ceased to be put to the fore and the united strength of the Roermond delegates has been fixed on the study of some one measure deemed especially needful to the Catholic cause, and ways and means have each year been sought to secure such action on the part of the organization as will effect results.

The Dutch Catholic Congress which met in Venlo during the Pentecostal days in May last was not unmindful of the superior advantages of such a program. The general topic chosen for the addresses made during its sessions was Catholic Charity, and the particular themes developed and insisted upon were the care of the sick and the means to be used to bring about improvement in the hygienic conditions of the people. To express the sense of the assembly the resolutions drawn up at the close of the meeting were few and embodied suggestions for a simple and effective propaganda to be pursued by the Catholic organizations of the province of Limburg during the coming year. To this end the work of a well-known charitable association of the Netherlands, the Green Cross, was warmly commended and active co-operation in its purposes was urged upon all. This association, as our readers may know, is a strong and well-organized body in Holland whose efficiency runs to a threefold object: first, it aims to establish alike in cities and country districts a nursing system and to spread the knowledge of its convenience and of the competency of its trained nurses; secondly, through a small tax of from one-half to two gulden paid yearly by its members it is enabled to distribute medical supplies and required sick-room necessities to the needy poor (a gulden equals about 35 cents); thirdly, through the spread of hygienic literature and by means of free public addresses and popular instruction it does valiant service in the betterment of health conditions everywhere in Holland.

Of course the presence of Church and lay dignitaries, the usual solemn Church services, a civic parade and similar outpourings of the people were not lacking in Venlo to arouse the passing enthusiasm that marks every Catholic Day. The feature, however, that ought to impress us in the United States was the unvarying attention bestowed upon the one practical object insisted upon in every session of the Congress. In fact, if one excepts an earnest talk on popular retreats by a Jesuit present, Catholic charity in the special phase already indicated was the sole and exclusive topic discussed during the Congress.

May one venture the suggestion that it might be well for the Federation of Catholic Societies in the United States to learn from the experience of kindred associations which have established in other lands a reputation for practical results? Germany's Katholikentag with its remarkable influence upon Catholic life—social, political and religious, has built its strength upon this precise policy. Year after year it elects to take up some one definite idea and to hammer this home. We all know the solidarity that rules among German Catholics in consequence. As was said editorially in AMERICA in the issue following last year's gathering of the Federation of Catholic Societies in Pittsburgh: "Evidently there must be a limit to the resolutions drawn up at these conventions. It is already a question if the very multiplicity of the resolutions does not defeat, in great measure, the purpose for which they are made." Agreeing upon a few very definite and practical points the whole machinery of a mighty organization could then be turned upon their accomplishment. Were this the agreed policy a succeeding convention could then be called upon to show results in the spirit of the resolutions reported in each year's assembly. M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

Aeronautics and the Catholic Clergy

II—IN MODERN TIMES.

Roger Bacon, the famous Franciscan (1214-1294), who was interested in many questions of the physical world, speaks also of a flying machine. In his work "De Secretis Artis et Naturæ Operibus," he writes that a machine could be constructed in which a man, sitting in the center, might, by means of a crank, move wings, and thus, in the manner of birds, fly through the air. He endeavored to construct such a machine, but discouraged by failures, gave up the attempt. Three centuries later, a certain Father Mohr (1575-1625), of the Premonstratensian monastery of Schusselried, in Württemberg, became known as the "flying monk of Schusselried," on account of his experiments in which he used wings made of goose-feathers. Meerwein asserts that Father Mohr flew from his monastery to his parish, two leagues distant; but this is evidently an embellishment and improvement on the story of Mohr's repeated attempts at flying.

The first successful flight known is attributed to Faustus Veranzio, a bishop in the Hungarian Comitatus of Csanat. In 1617 he let himself down from a tower by means of a sort of a parachute. It may seem strange that a bishop should be engaged in such experiments, but, in the case of Veranzio, it is not improbable. For he was a rather odd character, became entangled in difficulties with the Hungarian court, on account of some appointments to ecclesiastical benefices, traveled extensively, wrote a "Dictionary in Five Languages," a "New Logic," and a book entitled "New Machines, with Explanations in Latin, Italian, French, Spanish and German." His "Logic" was severely criticized, and deservedly so ("Biographie Universelle," vol. XLIII). A manuscript history of his native country, Dalmatia, was, according to a clause of his will, laid in his coffin. It is not at all unlikely that such a man, though a bishop, should make the venture mentioned above. Another cleric who is credited with a fairly successful flight, is the Abbé Desforges, who experimented at Estampes, in France (1772), with a machine which he called "Orthoptère" (Straightwing). In all the experiments, mentioned hitherto, the wings of birds furnished the model; but mechanical flight was destined to become successful only in very recent times, by means of aerocurves and aeroplanes.

Aerial navigation was not placed on a practical basis until the discovery of the balloon. The story of the Montgolfier brothers need not be told here, but without minimizing their great work, we have to call attention to the fact that several Catholic clergymen, long before, came very close to the idea which, after the discovery of hydrogen gas, was to meet with success. As early as the fourteenth century the monk Albert of Saxony suggested that "a ship of light wood" might be constructed, which, filled with "elementary fire," would rise into the air. In spite of the old erroneous opinion concerning "elementary fire," the plan contains the correct notion that a vessel filled with something lighter than air, would rise. This idea appears more clearly in a work of Lauretus Lauro, S. J., (1610-1658), where a machine is described made of bags fastened together and filled with gas lighter than air. Two other Jesuits, Gaspar Schott (1608-1666) and the celebrated Athanasius Kircher (1602-1680), speak of rarified air as means of raising machines. All these were surpassed by Father Lana, S. J. (1631-1687), who in his "Prodromo," published 1670, gives a detailed plan for building an airship. The American aeronaut Wise, in his "System of Aeronautics," says of Father Lana: "This judicious writer deduced from the new discoveries the real nature and pressure of the atmosphere, and is the first who established a theory verified by mathematical accuracy, and clearness of perception, which placed him far in advance of his predecessors in the science of aerial navigation. He very truly inferred that a vessel exhausted of air would weigh less than when full of that fluid." Lana proposed that a light boat, furnished with sail and rudder, should be attached to four hollow globes, each twenty feet in diameter, made of thin copper. Of course, the scheme was impracticable. The copper globes, to be light enough to carry the "boat," or car, and a passenger, would have to be made so thin that, when empty, they would not have withstood the pressure of the atmosphere. Yet the idea of vacuum balloons, has repeatedly been tried, even in recent times. The importance of Lana's work consists chiefly in having inspired others to make experiments along the line of aerial navigation. That part of the "Prodromo" which deals with this subject, was later reprinted, in 1784, and a German translation of it appeared the same year, by Lohmeier, professor at the Academy of Hesse-Schaumburg.

One of those who tried to profit by the suggestions of Lana, was Lawrence de Gusmao, born in Brazil, 1685. Various errors concerning him are found in books; some call him a "friar" (Wise); others a "Jesuit Father" (Herder's "Konversations-Lexikon," vol V, col. 1,032, II). But as Father Wilhelm, S. J., of Feldkirch, Austria, has shown, he was a Jesuit novice, who left the noviciate in 1701 and then went to Portugal. He had great confidence in the machine which he invented, and in 1709 addressed a petition to King John V, in which he requests the privilege of being the sole possessor of his machine, "which is capable of carrying passengers and navigating through the air very swiftly." Wise quotes the king's answer, as contained in a letter published by a Parisian scientific paper: "Agreeably to the advice of my council, I order the penalty of death against the aggressor"—certainly a sufficient protection for a "patent." "And in order to encourage the suppliant to apply himself with zeal towards improving the machine which is capable of producing the effects mentioned by him, I also grant unto him the first professorship of mathematics in my University of Coimbra, with the annual pension of 600,000 reis" (about $650; of course the money value then was much greater than now).

The description of his proposed air-craft contains some details which are fantastic, but the machine which he actually used for demonstrations, and with which he also made some modest descents from elevated points, was of a different construction. There is no reason to call him, as Wise does, "a pretender without ingenuity," although in his application for the king's favor he promised a great deal more than he could accomplish. In 1722 Gusmao became chaplain to the Portuguese court. A story was circulated afterwards that he was persecuted by the Inquisition which had forbidden him to continue his aeronautic experiments. This is probably an invention, or at least a perversion of the fact that "information was laid against him before the Inquisition, but on quite another charge" (Wilhelm, in "Cath. Enc." VII, 90). It would have been disappointing to some, if in the long series of Catholic clergymen, making attempts at solving such a problem, there had been missing a case of a poor victim of the Inquisition!

In 1755 a booklet was published anonymously at Avignon, and two years after republished under the title: "L'art de naviguer dans les airs, amusement physique et géométrique;" the second edition bore the author's name, that of Joseph Galien, a Dominican Father, and professor in the University at Avignon. No doubt, many strange views were proposed, for which reason writers on aeronautics deal very severely with the author. They seem, however, to overlook that the author, as he indicates in the title, did not mean his work so very seriously. Still, it contains some ideas which have led others to judge far more favorably; thus Wise says: "Had Galien been acquainted with hydrogen gas, the honor of the discovery of aerostatic machinery would no doubt have fallen to him." As Father Wilhelm points out, Galien's "chief claim to importance lies in the fact that the Montgolfier brothers were acquainted with him, or at least with his booklet; his birthplace was very near theirs . . . the elder of the brothers made a first ascension at Avignon in 1782." This is the year in which, according to one account, Father Galien died at Avignon. The history of aeronautics then entered upon a new phase; in fact, most writers begin the history of aerial navigation with Joseph and Étienne Montgolfier. What has been said in these lines deserves to be known, as proof that, long before this time, interest was not lacking, nor earnest endeavor, although it was not crowned with success.

This sketch of the part Catholic clergymen have taken in the early experiments does not reveal any startling discoveries. We do not want to exaggerate the importance of their achievements. Sometimes claims are made which cannot be substantiated; thus, at the time when a Frenchman succeeded in crossing the English Channel in a flying machine, a Catholic paper asserted, and several repeated the statement afterwards, that a Jesuit long ago had accomplished the same feat. The statement is probably incorrect. Unfair as is an undervaluation of what Catholics have done along scholarly and scientific lines, the opposite tendency of seeing everything through a magnifying glass, is equally to be avoided: In the present case, although the final solution of the problem of aerial navigation was not due to Catholic clergymen, it is at least worthy of notice, that secular priests, Benedictines, Premonstratensians, Dominicans, Franciscans and Jesuits have taken a lively interest in the pursuit of this difficult and fascinating problem.

ROBERT SWICKERATH, S.J.

A Literary Curiosity

A rambling search through the library of St. Andrew-on-Hudson recently brought to light a dusty little tome, vellum-bound, that would rejoice the heart of the bibliophile, especially were he scientifically inclined. The modest inscription on the title page speaks for itself: "Bernardi Zamagnae, S. J., Navis Aeria . . . Excudebat Romae . . . Anno MDCCLXVIII." Oh for twentieth century advancement! A Latin poem on the airship written one hundred and fifty years ago!

Your classical student would linger with delight over its 1500 hexameter verses, which flow with as smooth and rich a melody as Virgil's own. Indeed, in point of allusion to mythological lore, of classic diction, and of the flavor of antiquity which pervades the whole, one might easily imagine the "Navis Aeria" a relic of the Augustan age of Rome.

Delving beneath the placid surface of poetic eloquence the lover of the antique is rewarded with a rich treasure of interesting finds. He is struck with astonishment upon beholding a poet treating, as freely and confidently as you please, questions about which modern science, in not a few instances, has not yet said the last word; among other points of a similar character, he touches upon the law of gravitation, the depth of the earth's atmosphere, the presence or absence of air about the moon, deviations of the magnetic needle. These topics occur incidentally in the course of the first half of the poem, which is devoted to the exposition of the theory of aerial navigation that Mr. Zamagna poetically exploits.

It is not a pure creation of the fancy, he informs his reader, but the invention of Father Francis Lana, S. J., of Brescia, a noted scientist of his day. A brief investigation reveals the fact that this Father Lana (1631-1687) was the author of a number of works on physical and mathematical science. A volume published in 1670, "Short Tracts on Some New Inventions," contains his treatise on the airship, which he declares to be the fruit of long research. About the same time claim was laid to the invention by one Professor Lohmyer, but it has been clearly proved that the publication of Lana's book antedated that of Lohmyer's by at least nine years.

In view of present interest in aerostation and of the success achieved by modern experts, Father Lana's theory is worthy of note, marking, as it does, the first real advance in the development of an art which has tempted the cupidity and exercised the ingenuity of man through long ages. Briefly it is as follows: the power of ascension is gained by exhausting the air from four large copper globes, beneath which is suspended a light car. The dimensions of the balls and their lifting power are very carefully calculated. Nor has the inventor overlooked the danger of collapse after a vacuum had been created, consequent upon making the globes so large and at the same time so extremely thin as the exigencies of the case demanded; his expectation was that the immense pressure of the outside air would bear equally upon every point of the surface, thus rather strengthening than crushing the frail shells. For the rest, an ordinary sail serves as propeller. In the engraving which accompanies the poem all these details are faithfully adhered to; nay, the poet makes it more realistically an air-ship. His car is a boat, and a skillful worthy in the stern manipulates a long oar or rudder. Ropes and ladders hang about in approved fashion; even types of passengers appear one enjoys his pipe in perfect serenity; another, utterly woe-begone, is apparently suffering from an acute attack of "mal d'air."

The evident crudities of the scheme render it, of course, quite impracticable, especially the fatal error of expecting to secure perfect sphericity in the huge globes, the collapse of which must have been inevitable. But the faults in no wise detract from the general value of the invention as a contribution to physical science, for, according to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," it was the first theory ever advanced that was founded on correct scientific principles. From the days of Daedalus on men of every age and clime had made futile efforts to extend their dominion over the airy wastes; and although many, notably an Augustinian monk and two other Jesuits of the seventeenth century, Francis Mendoza and Caspar Schott, made some little progress, it remained for this now forgotten religious to elaborate the principle that is substantially embodied in the modern airship, as distinguished from the aeroplane or flying-machine.

President Taft says that Socialism is a national problem. Victor L. Berger, the Milwaukee Socialist, says that the final conflict of Socialism will be with the Catholic Church. Both are right. Socialism contradicts Christianity, which is the foundation of existing society. Christianity has but one real defender, the Catholic Church.

Vandalism Voted Down

STOCKHOLM, APRIL 30, 1910.

In the golden book of the Saints, before whom pale the most glorious names of profane history, there shines forth a Scandinavian name, one of the most illustrious, that of St. Bridget. Not only in Sweden is it known but it has been venerated everywhere for the past five hundred years and its splendor has contributed, perhaps more than anything else, to make Sweden known to the rest of the world.

In general history St. Bridget of Sweden figures as one of the most eminent persons in the Middle Ages, fruitful though these were in great characters. In literature her works, and especially her "Revelations," now translated into all European languages, ensure her an important place among the writers of her time. Finally, in Church history she ranks with St. Catherine of Siena, for both were called by Providence, in those days of schism, to raise aloft the standard of union and obedience, to revive in Christendom love of the Church and submission to the successor of St. Peter.

The work begun by St. Bridget was carried on by the order she founded, the Order of St. Saviour, commonly called Brigittines, approved by Urban V in 1370 and by Urban VI in 1378. In the period of its greatest prosperity the order counted about seventy houses in Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Poland, Germany, England, Holland, Italy and Spain. Vadstena in Sweden, the most celebrated of these monasteries, the mother-house, was founded about 1346. Like the other houses of the order, Vadstena comprised a convent of sixty nuns under an abbess and a completely separate monastery of seventeen monks under a confessor-general.

According to their rule the members of the order, besides their spiritual exercises, had to engage in manual labor, in gardening, in translating and copying books, etc. And the fact that the monastery of Vadstena became the chief nursery of culture and civilization in the north of Europe is a sufficient proof that the sons and daughters of St. Bridget worked with zeal and energy.

At Vadstena, as in the other monasteries, the monks and nuns fostered the development of gardening and agriculture. Even in our own day the traditions of the work done and taught by the nuns survive in the bobbin-lace industry peculiar to the women of Vadstena and its neighborhood.

But above all, intellectual and spiritual culture found its chief centre in the monastery of Vadstena. Before the invention of printing it was the indefatigable pens of the monks and nuns that perpetuated valuable books, while the more learned Brothers and Sisters composed original works. The treatises, translations and transcriptions of these religious constitute the most important part of medieval Scandinavian literature, just as the annals composed in this monastery from 1344 to 1545 concerning the most notable contemporary events, annals published under the title of "Diarium Vatstenense," form our principal source of information for the history of the Middle Ages in Sweden.

This nursery of Swedish civilization was suppressed by the Reformation. The monks were scattered far and wide. The nuns, continuing to occupy the building, remained faithful unto death, in spite of the efforts of Lutheran preachers. All the property of the monastery was confiscated and the buildings were, later on, used as a house of correction and a lunatic asylum. It is under this latter aspect that we now view the venerable remains of what was once one of the most glorious creations of our Middle Age. Evidently such ancient buildings are not precisely hygienic or comfortable. Methods of heating and lighting which sufficed for those who wished to be crucified with Jesus Christ do not answer the exigencies of modern medical authorities. So this year the Swedish Government presented to the Riksdag (Parliament) a request for an allowance of 250,000 crowns (about $66,600) to equip the old monastery with up-to-date heating and electric-lighting apparatus, pending the construction of a new lunatic asylum. The reason why the estimated cost was so high is that the insertion of pipes and wires would entail the piercing and partial demolition of vaults and walls sometimes almost ten feet thick.

Happily Sweden in our day has experienced an awakening of respect for the monuments of its ancient civilization. Men of learning and renown have studied our medieval culture, and official institutions such as the Academy of History and Letters watch over the protection of our ancient monuments. These institutions and in particular one of their chief representatives, the Royal Antiquary, protested strongly against the Government project, which would seriously damage the old buildings.

The press also intervened. Many of the most influential journals, among others the Svenska Dagbladet, showed that if that allowance were voted its only effect would be to prolong for a short time an arrangement already recognized as insufficient, since the construction of a new asylum was imperative. The Stockholms Dagblad, conservative and supporter of the present government, said in part: "One of our best informed historians of the Middle Ages has told us that during that period the monks formed almost the sole link between the civilization of Scandinavia and that of southern Europe. The intercourse between our monasteries and those of southern countries was, so to speak, the artery that poured into our country the life of a higher civilization. The literary treasures amassed in our Swedish convents and especially at Vadstena were not mere ornaments. Who-soever peruses the works of our medieval authors cannot help marvelling at the profound research shown in the very numerous quotations.

"Nor is it only the name of St. Bridget that is connected with the monastery of Vadstena; we must also recall that of the wife of King Magnus, Queen Blanche of Namur, who was the donor of the land of Vadstena, that of Queen Philippa, and many other great names. In a country like the United States of North America, where the memories of the past are most lovingly cherished, people would make any sacrifice to protect and maintain in decent repair a convent dating from the fourteenth century, if only they had one. As for us, we should at least be careful not deliberately to destroy what remains to us."

All this agitation bore its fruit. The Government proposal met with strenuous opposition in the chambers. Among its opponents in the Lower House was the Chancellor of the Swedish Universities, Count Frederic Wachtmeister. On the other hand, among the partisans of the Government project was a high dignitary of the Lutheran state Church. But their advocacy failed, and the proposal was rejected by 73 against 42 votes. In the Upper House the debate was still more lively. Notable amid the opposition speakers were Dr. Thyren, a very famous Professor of Penal Law in the University of Lund, and Dr. Fridtjov Berg, former Minister of Public Instruction and Worship, known as a radical. The latter reminded his hearers that those ancient buildings were our best preserved convent ruins, and closed with these loudly applauded words: "No one has a right to require filial piety from his sons if he himself has none for his fathers. No people can have confidence in its future, if it cares not for its past." The Government proposal was rejected without a formal vote.

This parliamentary decision, which saves an ancient monument from vandalism, was welcomed with satisfaction in all enlightened circles, and drew from one of the most celebrated journalists in Sweden, Mr. G. Stridsberg, an article that appeared in the Svenska Dagbladet and is the more remarkable because he is not a Catholic. By way of conclusion a passage therefrom is here quoted: "In Spain, Holland and England the Order of Bridget still subsists. There the vesper bell calls to pious exercises according to the ritual elaborated by the wife of the 'lagman' (seneschal), Ulf Gudmarsson, two centuries before the Reformation. There a Swede can still feel that he is in presence of Bridget! When, in the Swedish Parliament, members show how important it is that Swedes and strangers be not excluded from our most notable monument, it is a bishop of Sweden's State Church who says that Vadstena must be modernized as an asylum instead of being only 'an old house that people visit.' This has been said.

"For us a Vadstena saved is not merely that. For us, it is a witness of that faith which could move mountains. For us, it is a joy to think that the day may dawn when Swedes and strangers, with very different creeds and very diverse ways of viewing life, will be glad to set their feet on Bridget's soil, and to consider with respect, despite the heavy hand of time and men, how many of the teachings of the gospel of charity have become realities within these walls, how much learning, in an epoch of obscurity, has been gathered and garnered with care in the scriptorium of Vadstena."

The Race Problem in Cuba

CIENFUEGOS, MAY 24, 1910.

A hitherto neglected question in Cuba threatened to develop in the last few weeks into a very perplexing problem. It is, of course, easy to explain the growth in importance of the Race problem. The bureaucratic system has wide influence in the island,—hence the well-known ambition of Cubans to win place in some or other of the official departments controlled by the government. The Liberal party, to-day in power, has been unable to favor all who presented claims and quite a number of discontented hangers-on have been voicing their complaints in consequence. Among these is a certain Evaristo Estenoz, a negro and a man of some education, who gathered about him other dissatisfied politicians of his race to form an independent party of colored men.

In the meetings leading up to the organization of the new party much wild and revolutionary talk was indulged in and rabid threats against the whites were made. Here about Cienfuegos it appeared quite likely that the negroes would take to the field in an armed foray. The Secretary of Justice took prompt measures to meet the situation. He sent an official notice to the Head of the Supreme Court denouncing the growing activity of the party as criminal. He characterized the movement as an organization of colored men, which though pretending to be associated for merely political aims was conspiring to use unlawful means against the welfare of the white population. The Secretary in closing his communication enumerated a long series of unlawful acts perpetrated by the organizers of the Colored Men's party. The Supreme Tribunal, appreciating the gravity of the situation at once designated a special Judge to take cognizance of the case thus brought to its notice. Many of the chief actors in the movement were thrown into prison, among them Señor Estenoz.

Is it at all certain that the movement portended a new revolution in Cuba? If one may believe the declaration of some of those who were active in its development, the new party had no such purpose in view. In fact these men were quite frank in their condemnation of the subversive speeches of Estenoz and his immediate following. Whatever be the judgment regarding their assurances the condition of things just now is this: the principal heads of the movement are in jail and the disturbances which threatened to renew the anarchy which long destroyed the island's peace have been entirely quelled.

A matter of some consequence may be noted, however. Socialistic ideas once altogether unknown among us in Cuba appear to be filtering in among the workmen. The destruction by fire of an immense sugar factory a short time since is reputed due to the new notions taking possession of the natives. On the whole the recent racial trouble is not a happy sign, even though it be certain that any division on color lines is frowned upon just now by the better class, at least by the more instructed class of negroes in Cuba.

Notre Dame du Puy

In spite of religious persecutions France remains the theatre of grandiose manifestations of faith which prove the indomitable vitality of true Catholics. Le Puy, chief town of the department of Haute-Loire, possesses a shrine of the Blessed Virgin that was, during many centuries, the most celebrated in France. Lourdes has, in the past fifty years, eclipsed it. As early as the tenth century, according to many historians, the Holy See granted to Notre Dame du Puy a solemn jubilee every time Good Friday, falling on March 25, coincided with the Annunciation, patronal feast of the shrine. The year 1910 brought back this jubilee, and, as in the days of yore, great throngs foregathered at Our Lady's feet.

They came not only from all the parishes of the diocese, but also from many departments, especially from the Cantal, Puy-de-Dôme, Loire, Rhône, Ardèche, La Creuse, Allier. There were more than one hundred thousand pilgrims. Love of the Blessed Virgin inspired, as formerly, acts of heroic self-denial. Bands of peasants made long journeys over the mountains, fasting and on foot. Hundreds of the inhabitants of Langogne walked twenty kilometers (between twelve and thirteen miles) through deep snow. The fervent dwellers in Bouchet-Saint-Nicolas started at half past two on a bitterly cold morning, and after wading through the snow for several hours, reached Le Puy half frozen, but glad to do homage to the Blessed Mother.

Begun on March 25, the Jubilee closed on April 10 with a solemn benediction in the open air by six bishops.

The monumental staircase of the cathedral with its 140 steps, the Rue des Tables which leads up a steep incline to those stone steps, and the neighboring streets were literally packed with fifteen to twenty thousand people. It was a magnificent sight.

The next morning, April 11, on one of the three pinnacles of volcanic rock that made Le Puy one of the most picturesque towns of France was inaugurated a colossal statue of St. Joseph. It corresponds to St. Michael's Chapel, built in the year 1000 on the rock of that name, and to the gigantic statue of Notre Dame de France on Mount Corneille. Standing erect, St. Joseph with his right hand points to heaven, while his left encircles the Infant Jesus resting on a carpenter's workbench. Designed and constructed by a Jesuit lay-brother named Besquet, a prize-winner of Rome and Paris, the statue is fourteen meters seventy centimeters high and five meters sixteen centimeters wide, while the Infant Jesus measures five meters seventy centimeters. With the pedestal, the statue is twenty-two meters twenty centimeters (72 feet 9¾ inches) high.

This statue of St. Joseph is in reinforced cement, while the statue of Notre Dame de France was cast from cannons taken at Sebastopol in the Crimean war. This statue of Our Lady is taller still; seventeen meters in height, it rests on a pedestal of six meters seventy centimeters. We do not think that any other town in the world can, from a religious point of view, boast of two such groups of statuary. CHAREL.

Morals in the New Hong Kong University

SHANGHAI, MAY 1, 1910.

In organizing the new Hong Kong University, it is much to be regretted, from a Catholic standpoint, that the moral teaching imparted to the young men will be entrusted to Protestant missions. If the Catholic Church were represented in Hong Kong by English or American priests, they would insist on a share of the work and would get it. Too much cannot be said to rouse the English-speaking countries to take up mission work in China, especially in the large Open Ports where their nationals are found and desire their ministry, and where the numerous Protestant societies monopolize the field for themselves. What New China wants is a higher standard of life and above all the true religion, but she will not get it through tainted sources. When will the Catholic Church in China establish a Catholic University for the Chinese?

As to the moral welfare of the students, the Governor, in his speech at the laying of the foundation stone, said: "that the training of character and the providing of general ethical instruction, will be placed in the forefront. Safeguards are provided by insisting that the students will reside in the University itself or in hostels, controlled as the externs, by members of the staff. Some of the masters will also reside among the students, visit the play-fields and take part in public sports. By this means, and by the selection of the very best men for the staff, together with the collateral assistance of the Chinese gentry and of various Associations and Missions (Protestant undoubtedly), it is hoped to ensure that the best possible tone and feeling shall exist among the undergraduates, and that the University shall never be open to the reproach that it provides a secular and materialistic education to the neglect of what is infinitely more important, character, integrity and a high standard of life."

Having sketched the work through the various phases of its development, and stated its aim, program, resources and administration, we have now to describe briefly the laying of the foundation stone. This ceremony took place on March 16, and was performed by the Governor of the Colony in the presence of a large and representative gathering of foreigners, including also representatives of the Viceroy of Canton and Nanking, the two most powerful satraps of Southern and Central China, whose rule extends over a population of 110,000,000.

At the opening of the ceremony, the Governor gracefully thanked the contributors and paid a special tribute to the generosity of the Chinese. From the speech then delivered the following extract deserves recording. "We are forging," said he, "a link in a chain which will bind us in friendship and good-will with the Great Empire on whose confines this Colony is situated. We are endeavoring not only to afford the highest educational facilities to the citizens of Hong Kong, but to hold out the hand of fellowship and assist China to educate her sons without exposing them to long exile and the risk of denationalization by sending them to Europe and America. Shall we by so doing create skilled rivals to compete against ourselves? I refuse to believe that men of the British race have come to be afraid of fair and honest competition, or that we are so shortsighted as to think that our own interests may be prejudiced by leading the way in the development which is to take place in China." In the course of further remarks, the Governor added: "Peace has its conquests no less than war, and if this Colony becomes the centre of educational progress in South China, we shall achieve a nobler extension of principles far superior to any territorial expansion."

At the issue of the Governor's speech, the representative of the Viceroy of Nanking said that he had been commissioned to deliver a message of cordial good-will and sincere sympathy in the Colony's great undertaking. "The University," he added, "will be a near-by tree of knowledge from which the leaves of learning may easily be plucked and passed from hand to hand among the people of South China. It will afford the grateful shade of erudition to the young men of China who may not be able to go further afield for it, and it will by its benefits quickly convince the still unconvinced among the Chinese that education is a mighty factor in promoting national greatness, and the only fulcrum that can be used with any chance of success to raise the people as a whole to the plane of enlightened and progressive life, which is the great aim of China's rulers. For these reasons, the University in Hong Kong is appreciated and supported by the thinking section of the Chinese, and the Viceroy joins with that section of their countrymen in wishing lasting prosperity to the great work now started."

These two speeches amply show that Great Britain and China are going hand-in-hand in the new educational move. A feature which appeals specially to China is, as said previously, that many students will find technical education near home, a benefit highly appreciated by a people hitherto little accustomed to travel abroad. National customs will be also better respected. Foreign dress will not be assumed, rice-gruel, chopsticks, fragrant pickled eggs, the rice-fed pig and soy sauce will be abundantly supplied to the undergraduates, and the ornamental pig-tail will be sported in the halls and play-fields of the institution. Doubtless, the University will have a beneficial effect on the political as well as on the commercial relations of the Colony with China.

Tuberculosis and Enlightenment

A speaker at a national conference last month in Washington made certain statements which, in our opinion, merit careful attention. He referred to a crusade carried on in his State during the previous year by the health authorities. An official lecturer, giving magic lantern exhibitions that depicted the horrors of the white plague before farmers' institutes and gatherings of teachers and school children, was turned loose upon the people at their own expense for the purpose of spreading enlightenment concerning the condition of their interiors. "People left these exhibitions greatly depressed," said the speaker. Of course, they did. There are tuberculosis exhibits in New York that we cross the street in order to avoid. But a free exhibit, no matter how grisly it may be, seems to have the fascination of the flame for the moth; for we have observed considerable success on the part of the hideous placards outside the exhibiting booths to attract a wide-eyed crowd of all ages and kinds. But let the speaker we have introduced continue his story: "With many this depression was turned into terror from perusal of the weekly scare bulletins which the State tuberculosis lecturer furnished the newspapers. The result was that many people, predisposed to consumption, readily fell victims to it." And he adds the startling announcement that the dread disease in question increased more than 120 per cent. since the campaign of enlightenment was started.

Making every allowance for exaggeration and overstatement we have no difficulty in accepting the main idea contained in these observations. Self-diagnosis, even on the part of a skilled physician, has always been recognized as the very worst menace to health. No man is a good judge of his own symptoms. The imagination can play most unexpected tricks. The faithful reading of patent-medicine advertisements can undermine the hardest constitution. It is one of the mysteries of pathology that the most fertile seed of disease is a faint suspicion that the disease may exist.

Are we, therefore, violent reactionaries and scrupulous cultivators of ignorance? We have no wish to be. Let the doctors study germs and bacilli until they learn their very last characteristic. But let the layman keep his hands off. He pays the doctor to engage in the dangerous work, and the doctor approaches his task panoplied in the most elaborate precautions. And sometimes even thus equipped a sensitive physician has been known to succumb to the terrors which beset the imagination in the quest and treatment of disease. The layman need only know a few cautions which could be printed on a visiting card. To introduce him, especially in his youth, to the naked and crude horrors of disease in a hundred repulsive details is a crime that calls for prohibitive legislation.

The Carnegie Foundation

What is the ultimate purpose of the fund for the advancement of education which is beginning to exert influence apparently widely removed from the benevolent aspect it first assumed? Originally it was heralded as a mere grant in aid of teachers who had outgrown their usefulness in the educational field and who were through its beneficence to be pensioned, so that in honorable comfort they might make way for younger and more capable men. Is this praiseworthy benevolence all its purposes, or has it anything to do with a proposition that has before cropped out in school politics? Is there underlying its open aims a secret attempt under the pretense of educational unification to create a trust whose powers shall be absolute and universal in directing all the schools of the country, both public and private? The Springfield (Mass.) Republican notes in a recent issue that a certain high school teacher in the East asked a college president whether his three-year training course would cover college admission requirements. The president replied he would have to consult the Carnegie Foundation before giving definite answer. Whereupon the Republican remarks: "A curious situation is it not? If such powers were assumed by the government through a 'Minister of Culture' there would be a great outcry over the usurpation of authority. But great is the power of the purse! A Foundation invested with power to inflict what amounts to a heavy pecuniary fine, may exert autocratic powers in fields which neither state legislatures nor Congress would venture to invade. Such incidents, not important in themselves, give a striking lesson as to the dangers that may arise from great philanthropic foundations in perpetuity." Meantime, in direct opposition to a fundamental element in the Carnegie plan, general assemblies of Church bodies throughout the country continue to condemn in no uncertain tone large universities as having vicious surroundings and Godless teachings, whilst they commend the smaller colleges as giving more Christian training.

Slandering Latin America

Signs multiply that the habit of slandering Latin America in print is no longer comfortable or profitable. It is hardly necessary to refer again to the malodorous details of the recent Speer incident. In this connection, however, it will be somewhat of a surprise to find the staff of the New York Evening Post offending. That paper is usually fair to Catholics, but, as the following letter from one of our Chicago subscribers indicates, its weekly literary annex, The Nation, has not exercised even ordinary careful editorial supervision:

JUNE 1, 1910.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of May 28th you call attention to an omission of The Nation in its comment on "honesty and efficiency of the German cities," in failing to mention Vienna, a Catholic city, splendidly governed, and the comment brought to my mind a note which appeared in the same publication of April 21st in a review of several recent books on Mexico. It said of one of the books: "It is not so delightful as Charles Macomb Flandrau's 'Viva Mexico,' the best appreciation of Mexican character that has appeared in English." The writer of the article must have given the book only a casual review, for otherwise he could not have made such a mistake as he did in his statement.

An author who undertakes to write something of interest or value about a Catholic people would hardly begin in this way: "In 1519 Spain and the Roman Catholic Church affixed themselves to Mexico's throat, and were with extreme difficulty detached from it only after three hundred years." (Page 59). This is only one of many examples that might be given to show the spirit in which the writer approached his subject.

The book may have been written to amuse, although it seems to have been taken seriously by the reviewer, and there is, perhaps, not much to be said to one who finds material for his fun and ridicule in grossly misrepresenting religious practices and places of worship, and in holding up for laughter a simple, friendly people, many of whose habits could be studied to advantage and adopted by travelers of the stamp of the writer of the poorest book about Mexico and her people that I have read.

It is surprising to me that a publishing house of standing (D. Appleton & Co.) should have printed a book that is such an insult to Catholics generally.

If there had been any desire to be truthful in the mind of the writer, and to understand the character of the people and the position of the Catholic Church to-day in Mexico, he would have been fortunate if he had met Mr. Guernsey (a non-Catholic), editor of the Mexican Herald, who has lived in the country many years. It has given me much pleasure to read his letters from Mexico to the Boston Pilot, extending over several years. Mr. Guernsey's letters contain the ideas of a thoughtful man who sees things as they are, above and below the surface, not as Flandrau and many people from the United States see them, because they visit the country full of prejudices, and will not open their eyes and minds to see fairly one of the most attractive countries in the world in climate, customs, architecture and scenery; a country of striking contrasts and one to awaken our broadest sympathies if there is anything like a human heart left in us; a country that is showing great development along normal lines and a people who have a great many things to recommend them.

It was my good fortune to visit many of the cities and towns of Mexico five years ago, and my experience during those pleasant days will always be among the happiest memories of my life. I went with a great deal of curiosity, because of the many strange tales I had heard of the people and their ways, and I came away satisfied that most of them were false, and that we should be more fortunate if we had less of our boasted material prosperity and more of their simplicity and faith. My own experience leaves me with little patience for the past and present misrepresentation of our neighbor and the patronizing attitude of some people who have money enough to enable them to visit Mexico, but not enough education or refinement to appreciate her.

Yours very truly,

THOMAS F. DELANEY.

4719 Kenwood Ave., Chicago, Ill.

We trust our Chicago subscriber sent this, or a similar protest, to the editor of The Nation, and got all his friends to do likewise. This is the only practical way to bring offending editors to a realizing sense of their transgressions.

A Lesson Out of the Past

It is more than a hundred and fifty years since an unwise policy brutally destroyed the flourishing Jesuit Reductions of Paraguay. The fame of their peaceful founding as well as of their civilizing influence upon the savages has in our day impelled the rulers of Argentina to imitate the system. In 1900 the government of that country made over to the Franciscans 200,000 acres of uncultivated land, on condition that they settle upon it 250 Indian families and educate them in Christian and civilized ways. Each family was to receive from the beginning 250 acres in full right of ownership and the remainder of the grant was to be divided among the colonists after they had been trained into habits of civilized life. To defray the initial expenses of the project the Argentinian Government voted an allowance of $20,000. Opening with ten families the Reduction now numbers one hundred and fifty-six families within its limits. White laborers and traders are rigidly excluded and the sale of alcoholic liquors is forbidden. Until they shall have mastered the elementary notions of land-tillage and of barter and sale of products the Indians are employed by the missionaries and carefully instructed by them. In 1909 one hundred and twenty-eight families are reported settled on their own farms and tilling their own lands with satisfactory results. Agricultural implements are furnished by the Mission. The Mission, as a rule, buys the grain that is harvested, maintains a little steamer on the river to keep up communication with the near-by city, superintends the building of commodious roads and bridges and provides workshops and mills driven by steam. The skilled labor required in all these enterprises is drawn exclusively from the Indian community. In two schools the children receive a good elementary education, the girls being specially trained in domestic branches and housekeeping. During the rainy season there is a night school for the adults. Religious instruction is imparted every day to the men, women and children in separate classes. Beyond this no special influence is used to win over the adults who are still pagans, but all the children are baptized and brought up Christians, and there is every reason to hope that the entire Reduction will speedily be Christianized. This interesting experiment may well be termed a lesson out of the past. Situated near Formosa, a city on the Paraguay River in northern Argentina, the San Francisco del Laishi Reduction is a proof that one modern state at least has fullest confidence in the civilizing powers of the old Church. And the gratifying results that have already followed the experiment offer evidence that the religious orders have not lost their importance or usefulness in our day.

A Glorious Testimony

A Royal Commission is considering in England the advisability of granting the County Courts jurisdiction in divorce cases. His Honor, Arthur O'Connor, Judge of the Durham County Court, was examined and answered as follows:

THE CHAIRMAN. What is your view in regard to the proposal for jurisdiction in some local form?

JUDGE O'CONNOR. I do not believe there is such a thing as divorce. I am a Catholic.

To Judge Tindal Atkinson Judge O'Connor replied: "If an Act of Parliament was passed conferring on me jurisdiction to declare dissolved a marriage once validly contracted, I should regard it as I would an Act purporting to repeal the ten commandments.

JUDGE ATKINSON. You do not recognize the right of all classes to get the benefit of the Act of 1857?

JUDGE O'CONNOR. I do not recognize either the right of anybody to get divorce or of any Parliament to enable a tribunal to decree it.

THE CHAIRMAN. I should like to know the foundation of your view of the indissolubility of marriage.

JUDGE O'CONNOR. The foundation of my view is, that marriage was instituted from the beginning to be indissoluble—before man fell.

THE CHAIRMAN. Whence do you derive that view?

JUDGE O'CONNOR. That is like asking me where I learned my A. B. C.

THE CHAIRMAN. It is important for us to know a layman's view as to whence that idea is derived.

JUDGE O'CONNOR. I should prefer to leave the theological point to a theologian. The view rests on the primary institution of matrimony in the Garden of Eden.

A testimony, glorious in Judge O'Connor, enlightening to the Commission,—for the Anglican Archbishop of York, who persists in sitting on the Commission, was it a reproach or merely a piece of sound instruction?

Orange Credulity

At the annual meeting of the Grand Orange Lodge of British North America, Dr. T. S. Sproule, the Grand Master, spoke of the proposal to modify the Declaration against Transubstantiation, in the following terms:

"Until the Pope cancels the oaths taken by the Jesuits, he has no right to ask for a change in the oath of the sovereign of Great Britain. The Jesuit bishops are made to swear that they believe the Pope has the right to depose kings and governments."

It is disheartening to hear of a man, presumably sensible and well informed, talking nonsense in contempt of facts, logic, repeated categorical denials of the supposed oath, and the official exposition of the oath bishops really take. Nevertheless the Grand Orange Lodge of British North America, found Dr. Sproule worthy of its confidence. He was reelected Grand Master. Orangemen have very decided opinions on the credulity of Catholics who will not think for themselves, but accept blindly the words of their priests. If this be true, Catholics are blameworthy. Blind credulity is a vice. But who would have thought of finding it in an Orange Grand Lodge?

We are informed on excellent authority that the author of "Letters to Pope Pius X," renounced his faith and his priesthood some time ago.

"On Friday I went to a moving picture show and saw in one of the pictures how a man broke into a store and robbed it and then got away from the police. It looked easy and I thought I would try it myself." Such is the naïve explanation given to the police by a lad, thirteen years of age, when arrested a day or two since in New York after doing, as his captors affirmed "a job that would have been a credit to a veteran cracksman." Prevention is better than a cure and we suggest, in view of incidents like this which are not at all uncommon, that the gentlemen who form the Moral Education Board in Baltimore take up the question of the suppression of moving picture shows which lure school children into evil association and criminal conduct by the slides they carry. Were the Board members to use the funds at their disposal thus to safeguard the little ones of the country, they might help the cause of moral training of children in a measure never attainable by the lantern slide lectures on morals now favored by their organization.

A PATTERN AND A PILGRIMAGE.

There are, in Ireland, two shrines, places of pilgrimage which are without parallel in northern latitudes, and one of which is unique the world over. The twenty-fifth of July is the feast of Saint Finbarr, and it is on this day that the pattern of Gougane Barra takes place. The pilgrimage of Saint Patrick's Purgatory may be made at any time between the beginning of June to the feast of the Assumption, but for it, too, July is the favorite month.

The Shrine of Saint Finbarr is not unlike some such places in foreign countries, but there is nothing to compare with Saint Patrick's Purgatory, which is a pure piece of Medievalism, handed down to us intact, and practically unchanged from the fifth to the twentieth century. On the high road from Glengariffe to Cork, when that splendid bit of mountain scenery, the Pass of Keighmaneigh, has been traversed, there is a rough, narrow roadway leading into the very heart of the mountains. Following this for nearly a mile, the traveler comes suddenly to a semi-circular arena of high hills, with no wider path on their bare sides than a goat track here and there, and at their feet nestles a tiny lake with a single islet dotting its still waters.

The scene is grand and wonderfully wild; not a tree is in sight excepting those that grow around the shrine of Saint Finbarr, not a building except the tiny chapel on the island. A stone causeway connects this with the mainland and before crossing over the pilgrim visits the holy well that supplied the hermit with water, and that is said to be the source of the river Lee, on which the City of Cork is built, and the mouth of which forms the Harbor of Queenstown.

It was along this river that Saint Finbarr traveled when he was called from his solitude to be the first Bishop of Cork, but before leaving Gougane Barra, he erected a church and a monastery on the island for the disciples who had gathered round him there. Of the church, a circular piece of wall is still standing, and in it are eight recesses that are called the cells or beds of eight saints, who either visited the spot or lived there at some period. The Stations of the Cross have lately been erected there and after visiting the little modern oratory that has been built on the site of the saint's own hermitage, the pilgrims make the round of the stations, repeating five Paters and Aves and one Credo at each of the cells and the same at the foot of the stone cross that stands in the middle of the circle.

Hundreds of people perform these devotions at Gougane Barra and it is most edifying to see the numbers of men and women who kneel and pray at this ancient shrine, not alone on the patron day, but on every summer Sunday afternoon, such as was the day on which we knelt amongst them and prayed for faith like theirs. The brilliant sunshine, the gay holiday attire, the mountains parched under the almost tropical rays of a late July sun made Gougane Barra appear to us almost like a southern shrine of France or Italy.

Very different was the June day on which we visited Saint Patrick's Purgatory. Here, too, are mountains but none of great height. A lake larger a dozen times than that of Saint Finbarr and an island, too, but over them all were scuds of driving rain that made the six-mile drive from Pettigo a truly penitential exercise.

Saint Patrick's Purgatory has been recognized and indulged by many of the Popes, and many millions of pilgrims have availed themselves of these graces, for it is now fifteen hundred years since the devotion was started, and that by Saint Patrick himself. To this little lonely island the apostle retired for solitary prayer and tradition relates that he was here shown a vision of Purgatory which so awed him that he begged his disciples to redouble their prayers and penances in this world, so as to atone for sin and escape such punishments as he had seen foreshadowed. The Christians of the fifth century and their descendants for hundreds of years came in great numbers to carry out Saint Patrick's injunctions on the very spot where the vision had been shown to him.

For six, and sometimes for nine days they remained on the island, eating nothing but oatcake, moistened with water from the lake, and this but once a day. The daylight hours they spent in prayer, barefooted and bareheaded, and the nights were passed in vigil in the cave where the saint himself had knelt. The passing of centuries has changed nothing of this routine, except that the time of penance has been shortened to three days' prayer and one night's vigil in the chapel, for the cave was pronounced unsafe and was filled in during the last century.

There are two churches on the island, Saint Patrick's, where Mass is said at five each morning and where the Blessed Sacrament is kept, and Saint Mary's, which is the chapel where confessions are heard. Here from the first of June to the fifteenth of August two or three thousand people kneel on the bare mud floor and wait their turn at the confessional, and in Saint Patrick's this same number, more than half of whom are men, receive Holy Communion on the last day of their stay.

For three days they have been praying, bareheaded and barefooted, walking from one cross that stands on the rocky ground to another, reciting at each one fifteen Paters and Aves and three Credos. There are six of these crosses each named after some saint who has performed the pilgrimage, and besides the prayers said kneeling before these, the Rosary is recited walking round the church and prayers are said at the foot of the altar for the Pope's intention. Many find walking barefoot on the rough, stony ground their greatest penance, others dread the long night hours spent in vigil in the church, but to us the fast was the hardest to endure, and the morning hours were very long until, at one o'clock, the single meal of the day was served, consisting solely of oatmeal mixed with water and baked in sheets in the hot embers of the cottages around.

A hospice on the same plan as that at Paray-le-Monial has now been erected, for the cottages were not able to accommodate all those who wished to perform the pilgrimage. When we were there only about fifty others were on the island, but the day we left a band of a hundred and forty were expected to arrive. Since 1860 an exact record of the number of pilgrims has been kept and they have been found to vary between 2,000 and 3,000 annually, and in the last few years, many names inscribed on the register are followed by addresses in the United States, for those who return to visit their friends in the north of Ireland like to go again to such a centre of faith, and to take part in the devotions that are a relic of medievalism, a link with the early days of fervent Christianity, such as, travel where they may, they will find in no other place.

In olden days there were monks upon the island and upon another larger one that lies in the same lake, but nowadays the pilgrimage is attended by secular priests belonging to the Diocese of Clogher, the Bishop appointing a Prior and as many assistants as required. Masses begin at five o'clock and are said every half hour according to the number of priests on the island, and during the day public prayers are said three times, and two sermons or instructions are preached. There is a wonderful feeling of remoteness on this island, of nearness to another existence that is felt nowhere else in the same degree. The pilgrims are so absolutely engrossed in their devotions for the three days of their stay that the world is just this little island, their own souls, and God.

The pattern of Gougane Barra has come to be a holiday for the body, although many good prayers are said at the station itself, but the pilgrimage of Saint Patrick's Purgatory is, if one may so call it, a holiday for the soul. In spite of the penances these three days come to most of the pilgrims as a rest, to some it is the turning point which is needed to break off bad habits and to begin with new ones that are good, and looking at the peaceful faces not of the women alone, but perhaps even more of the men, one realizes that they have gained fresh strength to struggle on and upwards through the trials and temptations of the coming year.

LITERATURE

History of the Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century (1789-1908). By REV. JAMES MACCAFFREY, Lic-Theol., Ph.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History, St. Patrick's College, Maynooth. 2 Vols. Dublin: Gill & Son, Ltd. Price 12s. 6d. The Canonisation of Saints. By REV. THOMAS F. MACKEN. Dublin: Gill & Son, Ltd. Price 5s. The Ulster Land War of 1770. By FRANCIS JOSEPH BIGGER, M.R.I.A. Dublin: Sealy, Byers and Walker. Price 3s 6d.

English-speaking students all over the world will be indebted to Rev. Dr. MacCaffrey for his admirable "History of the Catholic Church in the Nineteenth Century." Its success has been instantaneous, so much so that a second edition was at once called for. In his two volumes Dr. MacCaffrey has presented a critical and orderly conspectus of the leading events not alone in European countries, but also in America and Australia during the last century. Even to compile the documents necessary for such a work must spell unwearied industry, but to marshal the facts and to give in limpid English a scholarly narrative of the multitudinous events that fall within the period is an achievement on which the learned Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Maynooth College is to be genuinely congratulated. Naturally, American readers will be most interested in the chapters dealing with the development of the Catholic Church in America, as also with the concluding chapters on Socialism and the Catholic Labor Movement. There is a full index, a boon which will be much appreciated. The work can be had through Herder, of St. Louis, Mo.

Canon Macken, Administrator of Tuam, has given a long-looked-for book, namely, a popular work in the English language on the "Canonization of Saints." It is an able theological treatise in which the whole subject of beatification and canonization is lucidly set forth, according to the most recent sources. Not infrequently do we find educated lay Catholics who are quite unacquainted with the steps taken in connection with the "making of a saint," and therefore the need of the present work is obvious. In a prefatory letter, Cardinal Logue, Archbishop of Armagh, aptly styles Canon Macken's book "very learned, accurate and interesting," and with such commendation the work is certain of a large audience.

Mr. F. J. Bigger, M.R.I.A., is well known as the editor of the Ulster Journal of Archeology, and he is perhaps one of the ablest living authorities on aught concerning the province of Ulster. The history of the movement known as the "Hearts of Steel" has never been told in adequate fashion, but that desideratum is now supplied. Mr. Bigger has spared no pains in piecing together ancient records and extracts from old documents so as to make his narrative authentic, and he has welded his material in a delightfully written, though forceful, narrative. The book makes a special appeal to American readers, because it tells of the Ulster exodus to the United States, commencing with the year 1727, and of the deeds of valor to the credit of Ulstermen in the War of the Revolution. We read: "When Washington's army was starving at Valley Forge, McClenaghan subscribed £10,000; Sharp Delaney, from Monaghan, put up £5,000; John Murray, of Belfast, added £6,000; John Donaldson, of Dungannon, gave £2,000, as did James Caldwell; George Campbell, of Stewartstown, added £2,000, and another Caldwell, Samuel, added £1,000; John Nesbitt subscribed £5,000. Nor does this end the list." Again we read: "Andrew Jackson, twice President of the United States, was the son of Ulster evicted parents, who had been forced to leave their country, sailing away in the great exodus of the year 1765 from Belfast Lough." Mr. Bigger's book is one of exceptional interest, based as it is on first-hand materials, and it is bound to command a reading public abroad as well as at home.

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

Under the Maltese Cross: Antietam to Appomattox. Campaigns of the 155th Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteers, narrated by RANK AND FILE. (7x10 in.; 817-xiii pp.) Pittsburg, Pa.: The 155th Regimental Association.

Their ranks are sadly thinning as the years roll by. "Fall in" must be followed by "Close up" as the aged and enfeebled survivors of Father Abraham's boys in blue set out on their Decoration Day march. This annual commemoration is not what it once was. The second generation since the call to battle sounded has reached man's estate. What do they know of fond ties severed, of young lives sacrificed in blood and agony, of all that is summed up in the one word, war? Youthful, thoughtless, they see in this yearly memorial observance only a day of sport and revelry. To the veteran it means fond remembrances of heroes who are no more.

That the bowed survivors may recall and that patriotic youth may learn at how great a cost the Union was preserved, one chapter in the mighty struggle is set before them in "The Campaigns of the 155th Pennsylvania Regiment." Day by day its course is traced with grateful tenderness for those who blithely marched forth and bravely fell in the cause to which they had given their lives. Recollections by those whom the fortune of battle favored make up a goodly portion of the book. War-time photographs and latter-day groups at happy reunions are scattered with a prodigal hand throughout the volume; but to us the picture that appeals most strongly is that of William Montgomery, a mere child of fifteen, yet very soldierlike in his bright zouave uniform, who fell at Appomattox when the flag of truce was already advancing.

The Right Honourable Cecil John Rhodes, by Sir THOMAS E. FULLER, K.C.M.G. Longmans, Green & Co., London, New York, etc.

This monograph confines itself to Cecil Rhodes' public life in South Africa, or, we might say, to the psychological aspect of his imperialism and the building up of Rhodesia. Though devoted to the memory of this famous man, the author is not blind to his many shortcomings. He gives us, therefore, a very fair idea of his character; and from this point of view the work is valuable. One would have been glad, nevertheless, to have had more of a record of his political life. The account of the plan Rhodes had of a South African University, whither English and Dutch would resort from all parts of South Africa to return to their homes indoctrinated with the imperial mission of the English-speaking people and bound together by the love of their common alma mater, is peculiarly interesting, since, though it was never realized, it was the foundation of the Rhodes scholarships established in Oxford for the same purpose and apparently doomed to fail in procuring it. Another useful lesson to be drawn from this book is that one who does not seek first the Kingdom of God and His justice dies after having frittered away his life. The author does not intend to inculcate this lesson, but it is there all the same.

Philo-Judaeus of Alexandria. By NORMAN BENTWICH. Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America.

Philo, the chief light of Hellenistic Judaism, by a strange fate was rejected and forgotten by his own people, while he was taken up by the Christians and almost adopted as one of their own. This difference of attitude towards him on the part of Jews and Christians is easily explained. Philo was alien in spirit to the narrow rabbinical Judaism which became universal among the Jews in the second century after Christ, and hence was suspected as unorthodox and put under the ban. On the other hand, his philosophy and exegetical method appealed to the early Fathers, especially those of the Alexandrian school, and even much of his religious teaching was more in sympathy with Christian than with later Jewish thought. In modern times, however, Jewish sentiment towards this illustrious coreligionist has undergone considerable change. In the volume before us Mr. Norman Bentwich has undertaken to make him better known among his own people, and to remove any prejudice that might still exist against him by showing that, after all, he was a true Jew. Though the work is written for Jews, and, as the author frankly tells us, from a Jewish standpoint, by reason of its subject it is likely to attract also some Gentile readers. The chapters that will be of more immediate interest to these latter are those on "The Life and Times of Philo," "Philo's Works and Method," "Philo's Theology," and "Philo as a Philosopher." The two last named chapters, which treat of the topics the most important in the eyes of a scholar, will prove disappointing, and will furnish little enlightenment to the reader who has the patience to peruse them. This, no doubt, is to some extent due to the difficulty of the subject. Philo never gathered his ideas into an ordered system; they are scattered over a number of works. He followed no one system of philosophy exclusively, and habitually expressed himself in highly figurative language. Hence it is not always easy to grasp his true meaning. But after due allowance has been made, a good part of the want of lucidity must be attributed to the author's somewhat wandering thought, and a diction that at times calls for an interpreter. As we read our mind is haunted by Boileau's dictum, "Ce qui se conçoit bien s'énonce clairement." Judged by his book, Mr. Bentwich is neither a clear nor a close thinker.

In spite of obscurities, it is apparent that the author, who is an admirer of Spinoza, intends to represent Philo as an idealistic pantheist. It is true he repeatedly makes use of expressions which seem to imply that Philo held the real distinction between God and the universe; but these are meaningless when viewed in the light of other statements. Thus he tells us (p. 176) that Philo impugns the (pantheistic) Stoic view of the universe "because it confuses the Creator with His creation," and Aristotle's theory of eternal matter "because it denies the creative power of God," and yet in the same paragraph he attributes to him a view, which, if words have any meaning, is plainly pantheistic. If any doubt were left that the author means to present Philo as another Spinoza, it would be settled by what he says on pp. 238-39, where he compares the two. We need hardly say that Mr. Bentwich does not give us Philo's views, but his own.

It is hardly possible to speak of Philo's influence, as our author does in the concluding chapter, without touching his influence on the early Christian Fathers. What he says on the subject is much exaggerated, and betrays little knowledge with great dislike of Christianity. Christian dogmas are the result of a perversion of Philo's teaching (pp. 218, 248 seq.). Christianity is a system of dogmas without any relation to conduct (pp. 250-251). It rejects monotheism by its dogma of the Trinity; this latter "not only meant a departure from Judaism, it meant a departure from philosophy. The supreme unity of the pure reason was sacrificed no less than the unity of the soaring religious imagination," whatever this may mean. "The one transcendental God became again . . . an inscrutable impersonal power, who was unknown to man and ruled over the universe by His begotten son, the Logos" (pp. 252-53). Hence Christianity is not only inferior to Judaism, but to the higher form of Greek paganism. "Nor should it be forgotten that the Christian theology and the Christian conception of religion are a falling away also from the highest Hellenic ideas; for to Plato as well God was a purely spiritual unity, and religion a system of morality based upon a law of conduct and touched with emotion. . . . Christianity was a descent to a commoner Hellenism—or one should rather call it a commoner syncretism" (p. 254). And more of the same sort. But enough. What has been said is sufficient to show that the book is not one that commends itself to a Christian. But even conservative Jews have reason to distrust it; for the monotheism which it advocates is not the traditional monotheism of Israel, but monism or pantheism. In conclusion we may remark that if Mr. Bentwich's explanation of the name Philo, "the beloved one," is a sample of his knowledge of Greek, this is exceedingly limited. A strange deficiency in one who attempts to explain the teaching of an author who wrote in Greek.

F. BECHTEL, S.J.

Missa pro Defunctis, according to Vatican edition, transcribed into modern notation, with accompaniment. By EDUARDO MARZO. Boston: Oliver Ditson Co.

As excellent arrangements of the official requiem service are already at hand, the present issue cannot be said to fill a long-felt want; yet as, besides the Mass, it contains in an unusually convenient form everything needed for the services which follow the Mass, it will doubtless find a ready sale. The accompaniments are carefully written, simple and restrained, and, in accordance with sanest usage, leave all needed freedom to the melodic phrase. It is a hopeful sign to find our own choir-masters giving scholarly attention to the interpretation and accompaniment of Plain Chant. Such work as Mr. Marzo's, implying, as it does, a painstaking study of the Chant itself and of its ablest exponents, not only deepens the personal knowledge of the editor, and thus tends to increase the all too-limited number of qualified choir-masters, but exerts a stimulating and far-reaching influence for good in the formation of public taste.

Mass in B Flat. J. G. ZANGL. Op. 90. Boston: Oliver Ditson Co.

A serviceable little Mass, simply and correctly written, easy to sing. It contains no surprises, the parts move in ancient grooves; there is not a trace of distinctively modern harmony in it, not a progression that was not current coin in the days of Mozart and Haydn. It is an eminently respectable little Mass: reminiscent and obvious in every phrase, yet from that very fact tranquilizing and devotional. It will be effective as a festal Mass for little choirs, and as a rainy day Mass for large ones. We heartily commend it as unpretentious, correct, singable and soothing.

Mass in A. JOSEF RHEINBERGER. Op. 126. Boston: Oliver Ditson Co.

The Kyrie of this Mass is charmingly written in a smoothly flowing style, with rich and skilfully employed harmonies. It is decidedly the most attractive number in the Mass. The Gloria and Credo move with a forceful swing which can scarcely fail to prove effective. The Sanctus is a rather harsh bit of writing. Neither Benedictus nor Agnus Dei is pleasing in theme; the development, however, is musicianly, and with tasteful interpretation the numbers will not be noticeably unattractive. The Mass is of medium difficulty, and, in the present dearth of attractive permissible Masses, may be safely added to choir repertoires. All of these Masses have received the approval of the Music Commission of the Archdiocese of Boston.

Blessed Joan of Arc. By E. A. FORD. New York: Christian Press Association Publishing Company. $1.00 net.

The reopening of the cause of canonization of Blessed Jeanne d'Arc gives timeliness to this new story of her life. It is a handsome book of 314 pages, with numerous illustrations, well selected and artistically executed. Though the subtitle calls it the "complete story of her wonderful life, her tragic death, her rehabilitation, her beatification," the preface says it is not much more than an outline, and this better defines its scope, except in regard to the trial, which occupies half the book. The religious and patriotic character of the Maid is well brought out, but in certain conjectural developments and dramatic effects the writer seems too much under the influence of Mark Twain's "Personal Recollections," which, being presumptively fictional, permitted unhistorical adornments. The story of the alleged recantation is not clear. The writer makes Blessed Jeanne recant the apparitions and revelations in a set form of words. There is no such form extant, the six lines that she agreed to sign having been immediately burned, and a study of Canon Dunand's works would have convinced the author that the burned document was not a recantation. We would also take exception to "Joan." It was the name given her by her enemies; it has since fallen out of English usage; Andrew Lang, Miss Anthony, and most of her recent biographers call her "Jeanne," and she has made it sufficiently distinctive to be allowed to retain it. But in spite of occasional shortcomings, this is the best life of the Maid from the Catholic view-point that we have seen in English, and we trust that a demand for a second edition will enable the author to perfect it. Psychology of Politics and History, by REV. J. A. DEWE, M.A., etc. New York: London, Bombay and Calcutta: Longmans, Green & Co.

We are anxious to speak well of the books of Catholic authors, especially when they treat of science, because we sympathize with both the author and the publisher. The former ought to be encouraged if possible; the latter, if he be not a Catholic, takes a risk rather blindly. The first thing he must learn is that the formula nihil obstat in the permission to print, is of purely negative value. It means only that the book is free from errors against faith or morals, and is no positive testimony to its worth. The work we have to notice is, we are sorry to say, an unsatisfactory one. The author promises much but gives little, and this little incomplete in itself. His views on social origins and the relations between religion and society are inadequate, and his generalizations from particular cases are not always justifiable. We should like to add the formula: "We recommend the work as a text-book to Catholic Colleges," but we cannot.

The Purpose of the Papacy, by the RIGHT REVEREND JOHN S. VAUGHAN, Bishop of Sebastopolis. London: Sands & Co.; St. Louis: B. Herder. 45 cents.

This is a brightly-written piece of popular controversy. The first part deals with the Roman Pontiff as the centre of unity, his infallibility and authority. The second part discusses the Anglican theory of continuity by way of contrast between the actual facts of the Church in England before the Reformation and of the Established Church after that event. It is exceedingly useful to help Episcopalians looking for the truth.

Our Faith is a Reasonable Faith. Translated from the German of E. HUCH, by M. BACHUR. Techny, Ill.: Society of the Divine Word. 50 cents.

Good reading for the people is absolutely necessary; and in these days our people, hearing every day attacks upon their Faith, should be provided with means, suited to their capacity, to overcome such. This book, as the introduction tells us, is for ordinary people. Any criticism, therefore, that it does not touch the very latest developments of the attack, may be met with the answer that the popular attackers are themselves hardly acquainted with them. Thus, though Evolution is not the Monkey-Theory, it is commonly presented to the popular mind under this name. Of course things are met here and there in this book which it would have been safer to omit, assertions that should have been qualified, but on the whole it seems to us useful for those for whom it has been written, and as such we recommend it.

LITERARY NOTES

It is too bad that the better sense of the public does not wake up to the harmfulness, not to say the Teutonic gloom, of Ibsen. His vogue would have died out long ago, if indeed it would ever have been born at all, without the artificial nursing of influential coteries. Ibsen was a testy old man with a life-long private grievance. His forbidding character and unsociable temper drove him to solitary playing with his sombre and atrabilious fancies. He acquired much skill in the lonely play, and it was this skill—merely an accident, after all—which kept him out of the madhouse or, at least, shielded him from ridicule. We wish more of our critics were as honest as Mr. Winter. "A tiresome incident of the season," he writes in one of the Harper publications, "is the spasmodic regurgitation of Ibsenism. Several doses of the Ibsen drama have been administered, and a considerable audience has swallowed them. The influence of that pontifical expositor of misery, as exercised through the medium of his 'sociological dramas,' is distinctly pernicious, for the reason, in general terms, that those dramas are, with little exception, morbid, tainted, unhealthful, and distressingly diffuse of dulness, doubt and gloom."

The announcement of a new novel by Henryk Sienkiewicz is made. Its name is "Whirlpools" and it deals with modern themes. A short time ago a friend sent us an extract from La Quinzaine, in which the Polish novelist made some interesting confessions about his literary habits. The most striking of these was that in which he declared his interest in the Latin classics. "I used," he says, "for many years to read the Latin Historians before I fell asleep. I did this as much out of a liking for the history itself, which interested me exceedingly, as for the sake of the Latin which I did not wish to forget. This custom of mine brought me to read not only the prose writers, but the poets, too, with more and more facility, and it stirred in me a constantly increasing love of the ancient world. Among the historians I liked Tacitus best."

The May number of the Fordham Monthly contains a literary curiosity in the reproduction of a Latin poem by Edmund Halley, better known in connection with a certain comet than with gems of poetry. The Latin hexameters appear at the beginning of Newton's "Principia" and are eulogistic of that work. Mr. E. P. Tivnan, S.J., gives a spirited translation of the verses and prefaces them with some brief and interesting observations concerning Halley and Newton.

EDUCATION

An interesting point is being discussed in Philadelphia. The University of Pennsylvania finds itself in need of additional land for expansion. Between its present holdings and the Schuylkill river there lies a strip of land now owned by the city corporation. The University authorities petitioned the Philadelphia City Councils to cede seventy-five acres of this strip to them as a gift and for educational purposes. In consideration of the gift the University pledges itself to grant seventy-five free scholarships. The bill prepared for and actually being discussed by the City Councils provides that the Mayor of the city shall distribute the scholarships awarded in return for this grant of land, either to public, private or sectarian schools. No restriction binds him to consider public schools alone; he will be free to recognize deserving students in any school of Philadelphia.

* * *

It may be that the matter will be settled in Councils shortly, but the situation at the present writing is as noted above. The great interest manifested in the bill as outlined ought to attract more than local attention. Underlying the bitter opposition which it has aroused in Philadelphia because the scholarships are not restricted to the public schools, there is an insistent claim which should not be overlooked by those who for conscience' sake do not choose to avail themselves of the benefits of the public school system. The claim, as will be recognized, adds a new injustice to that already existing in the obligation these latter are under to pay their share of the public instruction tax.

* * *

Probably the best exposition of the claim referred to is that which one reads in an editorial of the Public Ledger of June 2. At least the writer is perfectly frank in stating his contention. "The land to be ceded to the University," he says, "is the property of the city and the public schools are the legal agency of the city—as the delegated representative of the State—for training the youth of the community for citizenship. It in no way alters their status in this respect that a certain portion of the community prefers to utilize other than the public schools for the education of their children. The scholarships will be purchased by the cession of the city's property, and however kindly disposed the municipal authorities may be to private and other schools, it would be clearly a diversion of public property to allow scholarships thus treated to be taken away from the pupils of the public schools."

One rarely finds a more candid statement of a "stand and deliver" policy. We offer you school privileges, so it says; use them if you will; but if conscientious scruples, ordinarily recognized in every other relation in this free land, forbid you to accept them, then you must perforce submit to the penalty that follows your unwillingness. You will bear the burden of a double tax in order to maintain your freedom of choice regarding schools, and you will, moreover, be excluded from a share in these special privileges which in the very nature of the case ought to belong to the whole people.

* * *

The Mayor of the city, whilst avowing an absence of all personal interest in the decision which the Councils may hand down, is equally frank in stating his position, certainly a broader and fairer one than that of the Ledger.

"As I regard the matter, these scholarships are for the whole people. In my opinion there are other interests that have as much right as the children in the public schools to share in the distribution of the scholarships. This is a situation which we must face boldly. There are 60,000 boys and girls being educated in the parochial schools by the Catholic churches. The parents of these children pay their taxes and aid in the maintenance of the municipality and its educational system. Why should they be deprived of the benefits that will come to the city through the transfer of this city land?

"We give to sectarian hospitals and other institutions. Why should we not give to sectarian educational institutions? The question does not confine itself to Catholic children, but applies itself as well to the graduates of Girard College, which is practically a municipal institution. Under the present method of distributing scholarships the graduates of Girard College would not participate, no matter how well the boys in that institution fit themselves. There are other institutions, both of a sectarian and non-sectarian character, that are entitled to a share of free scholarships given to the city."

Whatever be the outcome of the controversy, it should be recognized as one of a long series of reasons calculated to bring Catholics to a closer study of the burden they are unfairly asked to carry by the present school-tax laws of the land.

In a London, England, interview generally quoted by the American press, Miss Cleighorn, vice-president of the British National Union of Teachers, gives her views on mixed schools. She sharply arraigns coeducation on educational lines, on moral grounds and physical and professional grounds. On educational lines Miss Cleighorn rightly urges: "Difference of sex demands difference of preparation for different work in a distinctive sphere." On moral grounds her objections to mixed classes is thus stated: "Girls are self-conscious, fond of idealizing, apt to err, very apt to go wrong through want of a timely word of warning.

"That is what I specially mean when I talk of the moral side. People point to the home, where boys and girls are brought up together. There the girl comes into contact with her own brothers and not other people's." As for the physical side of the question, Miss Cleighorn's judgment is summed up in these words: "Teaching boys and girls together is liable to take away some of the latter's softness and make the former too soft."

The complete control of the State in educational matters is advocated in no uncertain way by the General Association of State School Teachers in Germany. The organization held its annual meeting two weeks ago in Strasburg, and some of the resolutions adopted in its sessions will make conservative thinkers gasp. "School inspection is the sole and exclusive right of the State." "The school is to be freed entirely from the guardianship of the Church." Even parental influence is to be minimized, if not eliminated, if the suggestion of a leading spirit in the body be heeded. As Germania reports, this worshipper of State control affirmed parental influence to be "a heterogeneous element in school training, since we all know by whom parents are inspired." A mere reference to a speech delivered by a member of the Reichstag shortly before, in which the "natural and supernatural rights of the Church in educational matters" had been dwelt upon, aroused, Germania tells us, a storm of indignation. One would suppose that the wretched experience through which France is passing ought to serve as a salutary object lesson to the school teachers of the Empire. Fortunately a rival organization, made up of the Catholic Teachers of Germany, which met during the same days, is able to cope with the situation.

The Japanese are thinking of giving up their syllabic alphabet, based on Chinese ideographs, for a less complicated system of writing. Several learned men of Tokio have agreed on an alphabet, containing the twenty-four Latin letters, together with forty-seven simple signs and twenty-five diacritical marks. The Japanese sounds not expressed by these letters, signs and marks, will be expressed by thirty-four combinations of characters. So far this is only a private venture, but the founders and directors of the "New Japanese School," a review started for the diffusion of the new alphabet, are actively striving to obtain official approval. Scientific as well as commercial circles in Japan are favorable to this interesting venture.

THE EUCHARISTIC CONGRESS—LETTER OF CARDINAL GIBBONS.

His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons has issued the following circular letter on the Eucharistic Congress:

At their annual meeting at the Catholic University of April sixth, the Archbishops of the United States expressed their heartfelt interest in the Eucharistic Congress which is to be held in the City of Montreal during the second week of next September. Realizing also the great importance of this event for Catholicism at large and especially for the Church in America, they requested me, in their name and in my own, to invite the attention of the Hierarchy and laity of our country to the scope of the Congress and to its characteristic features as a public manifestation of our Catholic belief.

It is indeed a matter of rejoicing that the central purpose of this gathering is to offer our homage and thanksgiving to the Author and Finisher of our Faith, our Saviour Jesus Christ. For thereby we proclaim in the hearing of all men that He is the same divine reality for us as He was for those to whom He declared: "Behold I am with you all days even to the consummation of the world." This abiding presence, which each Catholic realizes at the foot of the Altar, is likewise the chief source of our spiritual life, the bond of our unity, the unseen yet unfailing cause of the countless activities whereby religion is spread, through sacrifice and organized effort, to the uttermost ends of the earth.

It is therefore not surprising that each announcement of a Eucharistic Congress should meet with an enthusiastic response, and that this means of honoring our Lord should have spread so quickly from country to country, in the New World as well as in the Old. If the last three decades have been marked by trial and struggle for the Church of God, they have also been singularly fruitful in consolation and encouragement; and it is surely significant that our own age, so noteworthy for scientific advance and material progress, should have witnessed so general an increase in devotion to one of the profoundest mysteries of our holy religion.

The impulse of faith which has hitherto found its center in Europe, directs the great Catholic movement of this year to Canada. The Congress will be held upon ground that is rich in memories of the early days when Christianity and civilization came together to these shores. To the work of the Catholic pioneer, the heroism of the missionary and the sturdy faith of the people who erected the altar wherever they went, the entire continent of America is forever indebted. It is not merely as discoverers and explorers or as the builders of new nations that their names are written in our history; but above all as the heralds of the Kingdom of God and as bearers of the Cross of Christ. It is fitting therefore that we should hold their memory sacred, and there is no worthier tribute we can pay them than that of our loyalty to the Faith for which they lived and for which so many of them died.

This is our common heritage, and we may well be thankful that in Canada and in the United States it has not only been preserved but has increased a hundred-fold. Through it unnumbered blessings have been brought to our homes, our social relations and our public life. Of these benefits each of us in his private thought and his personal experience is conscious and appreciative. But to estimate them at their full value it is needful that we should feel from time to time how thorough is the community of our religious interests and how strong the ties which bind the Catholic people.

I accordingly regard the approaching Congress as a most favorable occasion both of quickening our own zeal for the service of Christ and of giving new evidence of the vitality which the Church unceasingly draws from the Eucharistic Source of all grace. Together with the Archbishops of the United States, I earnestly commend to our clergy and faithful this reunion so Catholic in purpose and so replete with advantage for our spiritual welfare. It is most desirable that we should further its aims by every means in our power and especially by taking part in its proceedings. I am confident that the object of the Congress appeals to every Catholic heart, and I sincerely trust that as a result the Church of our country will be fully represented at Montreal by laity and clergy alike.

Our presence and cooperation will be a source of joy to the Catholics of Canada, to the Hierarchy and in particular to the Most Reverend Archbishop of Montreal who has spared no effort in the arduous task of organizing the Congress. In sympathy with his endeavors and in response to the cordial invitation which he has extended to our people, I would regard it as most gratifying and as truly characteristic of our common Catholicism if the Eucharistic Congress should count among its members the faithful adorers of Jesus Christ in every diocese of our country.

J. CARD. GIBBONS,

Archbishop of Baltimore.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

Thirty thousand persons were present at the open-air military Mass which was celebrated on the Sunday before Memorial Day in the grounds of the barracks of the U. S. Marine Corps, Brooklyn Borough. Nearly one-half of the attendance were members of uniformed organizations, among them the Gloucester Camp of the United Spanish War Veterans, various camps of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Knights of Columbus, the Sixty-ninth, Forty-seventh and Fourteenth Regiments of the National Guard of New York, and associations connected with the Police and Fire Departments of the city. The Rev. Matthew C. Gleason, U.S.N., Chaplain of the U. S. battleship Connecticut, the flagship of the Atlantic fleet, was the celebrant of the Mass, and his assistants were the Rev. Thomas F. McGronen, Rector of St. Ambrose's Church, Brooklyn, and the Rev. Francis J. Sullivan, of St. Ann's Church, Manhattan. The Very Rev. John R. Chidwick, D.D., President of the Diocesan Seminary at Dunwoodie, preached the sermon.

Right Rev. Dr. O'Dea blessed the foundation of a new diocesan college in Galway, Ireland, May 26. Dr. Clancy, Bishop of Elphin, said that such a college was required to bridge over the period for which Maynooth did not provide, and also as a balancing influence for the future priests against the secular tendencies of the new universities in their courses of arts and sciences. Dr. O'Dea announced that the building of a new cathedral would be commenced in the near future on the site of the government barracks. Many jails have been closed recently in Ireland and turned over by the County Councils to religious purposes. It seems that barracks are beginning to be devoted to similar uses.

Two representatives of the Irish Christian Brothers in Australia, Brothers Joseph Barrett of Brisbane and Bonaventure Duggan of Kalgoorlie, were received in private audience by His Holiness the Pope, May 27. The pontiff expressed his satisfaction at the rapid development of the Brothers' schools and colleges in Australia. On the arrival of Brother Barrett, in 1871, they had only two institutions; they have now forty-five. Brothers Barrett and Duggan are on their way to Ireland to attend the General Chapter of the Christian Brothers in Dublin in July.

On the Feast of Pentecost, May 15, occurred the fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of the Rev. Hugh Gillis, a retired priest of the diocese of Antigonish, Nova Scotia. He was born in South River, N. S.,

December 6, 1836, studied in St. Francis Xavier's College, Antigonish, and was ordained priest in 1860. From 1863 to 1896 he had charge of the parish in Antigonish, where, at the cost of great labor and privations, he collected the funds for the erection of the present cathedral. In 1896 he became Pastor of Port Hawkesbury and remained there until his retirement in 1907. Throughout his long ministry he was known as a great apostle of temperance and an eloquent preacher in both English and Gaelic.

SOCIOLOGY

"The Constitutional Factory" is the title of a notice in Centralblatt and Social Justice. Thirty-five years ago, it states, Henry Freese, owner of a large factory near Berlin, Germany, granted a "constitution" to his employees. He instituted a "Parliament," which had to decide all questions regarding working hours, fines, etc. Any member of his working force may appear before it and give expression to his complaints regarding ventilation, heating or lighting, faulty machinery, treatment by the officials. The owner reserves only a few rights to himself. Yet he is more than satisfied with the system, since it brings him into close contact with his men, enables him to redress grievances before they grow into incurable sores, to notice and offset harmful influences from without. Mr. Freese thinks it would be very difficult to say who is more benefited, he or his laborers. There has been no strike in the factory in the past thirty-five years. The pecuniary sacrifices made for the system have not by far been so great as those suffered by other factories during the same time on account of strikes and lockouts, and they have been made for peaceful purposes, not for war measures.

In 1887 there were 483,069 marriages in the United States and 27,919 divorces, the ratio of the latter to the former being 5.8 per cent. In 1897 the marriages were 622,350; the divorces, 44,699, and the ratio had increased 7.2 per cent. In 1906 there were 853,290 marriages and 72,062 divorces, the ratio having grown to 8.4 per cent.

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin has affirmed the validity of legacies for Masses for the souls of the testator and others. One Kavanaugh having thus bequeathed his property, his relatives tried to break the will on the ground that it established a private trust with no one to enforce it. They won their case in the Lower Court, but on appeal the Supreme Court, better informed, on the Catholic doctrine regarding the ends for which the Mass is offered and those who benefit by it, reversed the decision of the Lower Court, declaring such legacies to be for a public charity.

The International Seamen's Union of America writes to us from Chicago concerning the strike on the Great Lakes. It asserts that the Steel Trust is unable to get a sufficient number of seamen for its fleet, and that in order to retain those it has, it no longer pays wages in coin, but by checks, which are given out after banking hours.

ECONOMICS

In 1889 52,584 farms in the arid States and territories were irrigated; in 1907 the number was 152,000. The expenditure for irrigation in these States during the latter year was $125,000,000. In 1909 50 million dollars were spent on works which when fully completed will have cost over 100 millions and will reclaim about 3 million acres of land. The cost of irrigation works in 1899 in the arid States was $8.85 per acre; in 1902, $9.14 per acre; in 1907, $12.08 per acre, while the last-named reclamation will cost about $34 per acre.

At its last general meeting the Cunard Company passed its dividend. Other steamship companies, such as the White Star, the Union-Castle, the Pacific Steam Navigation, the Peninsular and Oriental, have paid dividends as usual. This leads one to doubt whether twenty-six-knot mammoth steamers, notwithstanding the immense subsidy and other aid granted by the British Government, are a paying investment. After all they serve the luxury of but a few; and the few hours by which they shorten the mail service do not seem to be worth the vast expenditure they entail, both as regards the cost of building and the expense of running them. Moreover their vast consumption of the best fuel does not seem far removed from prodigality.

There are some who look upon Paulham's flight from London to Manchester and Curtiss's from Albany to New York, as corresponding to the first railway journey between Manchester and Liverpool, and judge that those assure the practical use of aviation, just as this made the railway practically certain. The two cases are very different. The first trains ran between Manchester and Liverpool under conditions that could be maintained, no matter how heavy the load should become; while as Pierre de Vregille points out in Etudes, the contrary is the case with aeroplanes. When a convenient form has been planned, and a motor has been invented suitable to the work, and the cooling of the cylinder provided for, and the propeller designed and its speed determined, one finds that to move the machine only twenty per cent. of the energy developed in the cylinders is available; 80 per cent. going to waste. To think of economical applications under these conditions would be like trying to work a special delivery express with a racing stable.

SCIENCE

Dr. L. Zehnder, in the Physikalische Zeitschrift, attempts a solution of the problem of the formation and constitution of comets' tails. According to his theory, as the swarm of meteoric matter, which constitutes a comet, nears the sun, the meteorites nearer the sun evolve gases and vapors which circle about the individual meteor or groups of meteorites as so many atmospheres. These atmospheres in turn refract the sun's light, and in proportion to their respective densities bring the rays to the foci at different locations back of them. On the supposition that a meteorite is at one of these foci, it may thus be lit up sufficiently to render it visible, or even heated to such a temperature as to evolve some or all of the latent gases. The masses so heated are in turn encapsuled by another atmosphere which focuses the light of the sun on the remoter meteorites and so the tail is the locus of the successive foci.

Father Algué, S.J., in charge of the Manila observatory, believes that the theory of a solid composition forming the nucleus of comets is now disproved. Exhaustive observations made from 3.30 to 11.30 A. M. on May 19, at the Jesuit observatories in Manila, Baguio and Antipolo, did not reveal any solid matter in the nucleus of Halley's comet. The weather conditions were most favorable for the observations, although there was a thin layer of clouds. The intense sunlight fortunately was shaded by three natural sunspots, which would have facilitated the detection of any solid matter.

Since Mr. Brennan's successful application of the gyroscope as a stabilizer, attempts are being made to apply the same principle to the steadying of aeroplanes in flight. Reynard, a member of the French Academy of Sciences, has designed an automatic device of this type, using a gyrostaf of a comparatively small mass. The gyroscope establishes electrical contact with the frame which carries it thus energizing small motors which operate the steering of the plane, whose function it is to restore the axis to its original position, when the system is tilted. The practicability of this device is yet to be proved.

In the death of Dr. Knut Angström, the Swedish physicist, physics has lost one of the ablest investigators in spectroscopic research, his specialty being the study of absorption phenomena in the infra red spectrum. He devoted much time to phenomena of solar radiation, and his contributions to the literature of this theme are recognized as classical. His pyrheliometer made possible many discoveries regarding solar energy. At the time of his death he occupied a chair in the University of Upsala.

Theodore Lerner, a recognized authority in aeroplaning, declares the proposed Zeppelin-Hergesell Arctic expedition to be a waste of time and money. He points out that the journey from Germany to Cross Bay, the proposed base on Spitzbergen, would take over eight days and would mean a consumption of 10,000 cubic meters of gas, the equivalent of 2,000 gas bottles, and also of 21,600 kilograms of bezine and lubricants. This weight, he says, is far in excess of the carrying capacity of the Zeppelin airship and its consort.

Prof. J. A. Parkhurst, of the Yerkes Observatory, has just published a series of 140 photographic prints of Hagen fields. These charts, which were undertaken at the suggestion of Father Hagen, Director of the Vatican Observatory, are prints on a scale of ten seconds to the millimeter, of all the Atlas fields in which the variable star becomes as faint at minimum as magnitude 13. In size, they are one-half a degree square, and are from negatives taken with the two-foot Yerkes reflector, showing stars to about magnitude 16.

OBITUARY

Mother Frances Alton, a religious of the Sacred Heart, died in San Francisco on May 13. She entered the novitiate at the age of seventeen and devoted the fifty-five years of her religious life to the cause of education. Her name is associated with a splendid record for work in San Francisco, Chicago and St. Louis.

The well-known painter, Henry Lauenstein, long Professor in the Royal Academy of Arts of Düsseldorf, died in that city, May 17, at the age of seventy-four. A convert to the Catholic faith in his boyhood years, Lauenstein devoted practically his whole life to the development of religious art. As pupil in the Düsseldorf Academy, later as instructor, and since 1881 as professor, his reputation was ever a distinguished one in that famous school. In 1897 the chair of ecclesiastical painting, till then filled by the eminent artist Carl Müller, became Lauenstein's, since which date his work has been almost uniformly along religious and church lines. He will be best remembered by his "St. Cecilia with the Angels," his "Christ on the Cross," his "St. Elizabeth," and his "St. Joseph with the Christ-Child"—paintings copied again and again and made familiar to Catholic devotion by their general spread. Lauenstein was not without fame in other directions as well, his portraits bringing him considerable reputation in a feature of artistic endeavor in which few excel. The Kölnische Volkszeitung deplores his death as a loss to Germany of "a distinguished artist and a charming, Christian man."

Mrs. Kevin Izod O'Doherty, better known as "Eva," the pseudonym under which she contributed poems and ballads to the Dublin Nation, died in Brisbane, Australia, May 20, in her eightieth year. Born in County Galway, 1831, at sixteen May Eva Kelly was writing for the Nation, then edited by the late Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, and was a welcome contributor of national and religious lyrics and essays until its suppression in 1855. She transferred her services to the more advanced Irish Tribune when John Mitchell established it, and became engaged to another contributor, Dr. K. I. O'Doherty. O'Doherty was arrested for treason, but was informed that a plea of "guilty" would secure him pardon; the alternative was penal servitude. Unwilling to plead guilty, he left the decision to "Eva," who said: "Make no apology; no matter how long the sentence, I will wait." He was transported as a felon to Australia and at the end of his ten years' term returned to Dublin, where he was married to Eva late in the fifties. They settled later in Brisbane. O'Doherty became a leading member of the Queensland Parliament, and returned to Ireland for a few years as a member of the Irish Party. Eva's interests were never divided; her muse always remained Irish and Catholic only. When Dr. O'Doherty died in 1905 a fund was raised to provide suitably for his illustrious widow, and a new edition of her poems was issued by Seumas MacManus, with a touching preface by Justin McCarthy. "She might be described," he said, "as a living symbol, an illustration in human form of Ireland's noblest characteristics in poetical imagination and in patriotic zeal." She was also an illustration of the ardent faith and stainlessness of Irish Catholic womanhood.

PERSONAL

Miss M. K. Letterman, who has been appointed Mrs. Taft's social secretary at the White House, was educated by the Sisters of Charity at old St. Joseph's, Emmitsburg. She is a niece of the Right Rev. Mgr. Thomas S. Lee, of St. Matthew's, Washington. Her maternal grandmother was one of the Maryland Carrolls, and she is related to several others of the old Baltimore Catholic families.

A statue of Dr. Samuel Johnson, dedicated to the "Philosopher, Poet, Lexicographer, Moralist," was recently unveiled in London by the Duchess of Argyll before a distinguished gathering. The statue, a full-size figure in bronze on a black granite pedestal, is considered a striking representation of the famous doctor. It is the work of Percy Fitzgerald, the versatile Irish lawyer, journalist, sculptor, novelist and author of over 200 books on a great variety of subjects. He had already wrought a bronze statue of Boswell, Johnson's biographer, and busts of Cardinal Manning, Dickens, Irving and others. Catholics are particularly indebted to Mr. Fitzgerald for his Jewel series, including "Death Jewels," "Eucharistic Jewels," "Jewels of the Mass," and other religious books. Though in his seventy-sixth year, Mr. Fitzgerald is still actively engaged in literary work, chiefly on Catholic subjects.

On hearing of Father McErlane's death the prisoners in the Missouri Penitentiary petitioned the Warden to be allowed to make up a purse to have Masses offered for the repose of his soul. The editor of the Western Watchman challenges "all the chronicles of the Church's past to produce an incident of pious gratitude similar to this."

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your Davenport, Iowa, correspondent in the issue of May 28th, strikes a good note. Why should our Catholic people or Catholic organizations purchase books for public libraries, sustained by public taxes? Let me suggest a plan that worked very successfully in this community. Shortly after the appearance of Vol. I of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," we had a petition prepared, directed to the officials of the public library, signed by the members of the local council of the Knights of Columbus and every Catholic tax-payer of the place. This petition was submitted to the proper officers of the library; asking that the Encyclopedia be purchased by them, in the meantime the prospectus having been sent to them. The result was an immediate compliance with our request and the volumes as they are published are placed in the library.

CHRONICLE

Traffic Rates Stand.—A conference at the White House, in which President Taft and the managers of the Eastern railroads took part, resulted in an agreement by which no traffic rates in the entire section of the Atlantic Seaboard to Chicago, and north of the Ohio River will be increased until the Interstate Commerce Commission can pass on the reasonableness of any proposed advance. This agreement is similar to the one already made with Western railroads. As a result the shippers throughout the entire country are protected from immediate advances in rates and the railroads are saved from the expense of extensive litigation and the depreciation of their securities had they entered into a judicial conflict with the government. President Taft sent a special message to Congress in which he recommended that the clause in the new railroad bill which gives the Interstate Commerce Commission power to investigate and suspend increased rates filed by the railroads be modified so as to take effect directly upon the signing of the act. It was officially stated that recent advances in passenger rates are not covered by the President's pact with the railroads.

Postal Bank Bill Passed.—Signs of returning harmony in Congress appeared in the adoption by the House of the Postal Savings Bank Bill, every Republican voting for its passage. The Democrats contributed twenty-four votes to the majority, which was 195 to 101. The vote followed a day of debate, the defeat of a Democratic substitute and a motion to recommit the bill without instructions. The bill as passed by the House creates a board of trustees, consisting of the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General, who shall declare what postoffices shall become postal savings banks. Deposits in these banks made by one person shall not exceed \$100 a month, or a total of \$500. An account may be opened with \$1, but stamps of 10 cents each will be issued for those desiring to accumulate money to be deposited. On deposits 2 per cent. interest is to be paid. The money received by the postal savings banks is to be deposited in both National and State banks in the vicinity of the postoffice in which the money is deposited by the people, such banks to pay $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. interest. The bill passed by the House differs from the Senate measure chiefly in respect to the nature of the securities that may be given by banks for the deposits of postal savings funds received by them. The bill now goes to a conference committee.

Chamizal Zone Dispute.—Mexico has agreed to submit to arbitration the Chamizal Zone controversy, which arose over the boundary between this country and Mexico at El Paso, Tex. The details of the arbitration agreement will be formulated by Secretary Knox and Señor de la Barra in the near future. A Canadian jurist, whose name has not yet been announced, will, it is said, be the arbitrator. The dispute resulted from the shifting of the Rio Grande, leaving a large zone known as El Chamizal on the American side of the river, which Mexico claimed on the ground that it formerly belonged to that country. The zone takes in the southern portion of the city of El Paso and contains about five thousand American inhabitants. Its value has been estimated at $5,000,000.

United States of Colombia.—The National Congress met in special session last month to consider certain amendments to the Constitution which were placed before the body by President González Valencia.—A correspondent writing from Pasto, the capital of the State of Nariño, describes a beautiful ceremony held in that city on last Easter day, when, by vote of the civil authorities, the State was solemnly consecrated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. In memory of the solemn act it has been decreed to erect a statue to be paid for out of the public funds.

Civil Strife in Nicaragua.—A flood of contradictory reports from the warring factions proves that Estrada has not triumphed and Madriz has not crushed the revolution. Madriz levied a forced loan of $400,000 on the citizens of Granada, who are disaffected towards his administration, and is trying to ward off a famine by prohibiting the exportation of foodstuffs. His issue of paper money has so depreciated that $11.60 are worth only one dollar in gold. Ex-President Zelaya is in London, where he is trying to interest capital in an inter-oceanic canal by the Nicaragua route. Estrada has proclaimed the independence of the eastern half of the republic.

Canadian Militia.—General Sir John French, who is now in Canada inspecting the militia, is making a thorough job of it. In the afternoon of June 4 he reviewed a field exercise between the Forty-third regiment and the Governor-General's Foot Guard, just outside of Ottawa, and on June 5 passed in review the church parade of the Ottawa militia garrison. As one of the most successful officers in South Africa, General French has been the recipient of much cordial attention, and, although in appearance much smaller and less commanding a figure than his soldierly companion, General Henderson, he has given advice to militia officers which shows a full grasp of the situation. While prudently withholding his opinion of the actual efficiency and training policy of the Canadian militia until the publication of his report to the War Office, he took care to say on June 3 to the cadets of the Royal Military College at Kingston, Ont.: "How to obtain an adequate supply of officers has long been one of the most difficult problems in all countries, and the question is of greater importance now than it ever was before, owing to the supreme necessity of getting the highest measure of intelligence, knowledge and education among those who in any capacity, high or low, have to lead troops in war as it is carried on to-day. The character and capabilities of the officer are the corner-stone of real military efficiency. A country which, like Canada, has adopted the principle of giving to a goodly portion of its brain power the opportunity of military training and education has thus provided in the best way for its national defence."—On June 9 he reviewed the local troops at Halifax, Nova Scotia, parading a total of 2,265 officers and men. General French, afterwards addressing the field officers, said he was very much pleased with the number and physique of the men.

Great Britain.—In Parliament, June 8, Mr. Asquith announced a possible agreement between the Government and the Unionists on the question of the reform of the House of Lords. It is hardly likely to lead to a permanent settlement.—Sir Charles Hardinge, Permanent Undersecretary for Foreign Affairs will succeed, it is said, Lord Minto as Viceroy of India.—Sir Francis Seymour Haden, the eminent engraver, is dead. He married a half sister of Whistler, the artist.—The enquiry into the stranding of the Minnehaha on the Scillies ended in attributing it to the default of the master in laying a course too near the Scillies under the circumstances of weather and defect of observations. His certificate was suspended for three months.—Mr. Roosevelt's Romanes Lecture at Oxford was well received. He avoided touching any very raw spots.—The Duke of Norfolk presented to the King a letter from the Pope sympathizing with him on the loss of his father and wishing him a prosperous reign.—The Glasgow, a new cruiser of 4,800 tons and 22,500 H. P., averaged 25.8 knots on an eight-hours' full speed trial.

Ireland.—The long-agitated question of the position of the Gaelic language in the National University of Ireland has been practically settled and in favor of the advocates of Gaelic. The Board of Studies met June 1 to consider the motion of Dr. Douglas Hyde that Irish should be made compulsory at and after the Matriculation Examination of 1913. Several members of the Board who had not been advocates of compulsory Irish considered that the recent action of the Senate in prescribing a knowledge of Irish for graduation logically demanded its requirement from the beginning. Hence Dr. Hyde's motion was carried by 18 votes to 6, and the recommendation of the Board for the approval of compulsory Irish for matriculation will come before the Senate at its next meeting. As the Senate had deferred the matter to the Board of Studies May 5, its approval may be taken for granted. The importance of the decision lies in the fact that (1) most of the County Councils made their financial support of the University and the foundation of scholarships conditional on making Gaelic an essential study; (2) Gaelic will now be taught efficiently in the primary and secondary schools, since its knowledge is a necessary condition to winning University scholarships.—The question of the Coronation Oath is actively discussed. The Orange Lodges have been threatening the Irish Times and several Irish Unionists M. P.'s, who have taken up a reasonable attitude on the matter.

Australian Elections.—In the general elections of 1906 the Anti-labor vote of New South Wales was 191,000; the Labor vote was 152,000. In the general elections just finished, the former was 210,000, an increase of only 19,000, and the latter was 261,000, an increase of 109,000. The corresponding figures in Victoria were Anti-labor in 1906, 250,000; Labor, 111,000. Anti-labor in 1910, 230,000, a loss of 20,000 votes, and Labor 217,000, a gain of 106,000. In the two colonies combined the Anti-labor vote remained practically unchanged, while the Labor vote increased by 215,000.

India.—The deaths from disease of the white troops averaged during 1909 6.23 per thousand. During the decade of 1893-1903 the average was 17.18 per thousand. The average of yearly cases of enteric fever during that period was 1,476, with 380 deaths. During 1909 there were only 636 cases and 113 deaths. In the former period the death rate from this disease was 25.7 per cent. and in 1909 only 17.6 per cent.—The Perseus has taken on the Persian coast 2,500 rifles and 250,000 cartridges bound for Afghanistan.—Loddha Ram, late editor of Swarajya, has been sentenced to ten years transportation for sedition. His paper had already been suspended for failing to deposit the guarantee money required by the Press Act.

South Africa.—Judging from the appointments being made by the Botha Cabinet, the Unionists conclude that the hopes of administering the new Dominion otherwise than on strict party lines are doomed to disappointment. The wonder is that such hopes were ever entertained.

Religious Orders in Spain.—Premier Canalejas has issued a royal order to the effect that the present ministry contemplates "a reduction by adequate measures of the excessive number of religious orders and congregations in Spain and their subjection to regulations in conformity with their nature and the prerogatives of the civil power." Commenting on the decree, which is issued in the name of the King, the Diario de Barcelona calls it the first mistake of the ministry in the religious question and likens it to a bomb, "of which the terrorists furnish enough." El Universo shows that in proportion to its Catholic population Spain has fewer religious than Belgium, France, England, Germany or Ireland. A ministerial crisis is expected at any moment.

Elementary Schools in Italy.—The supreme control of elementary training by the State with an absolute exclusion of religious influence, seems to be the purpose in Italy. Louis Credaro, Minister of Instruction in the Luzzati cabinet, a rationalist free-thinker in training, in 1891 founded the Unione Magistrale Nazionale (National Association of School Teachers) and has seen it grow to a powerful body of 40,000 members under his direction as president. The open aim of the Association is the suppression of all private schools and the banishment of anything savoring of religious instruction from the elementary school program. In its annual meeting held in Pentecost week in Rome the organization called upon its former president, now Minister of Instruction with power to act, to carry out the purpose of the Union. Correspondents describe the session as tumultuous,—loud demands were made for increased pay and shorter hours, and the program recently published by the Socialistic Confederation of Labor was enthusiastically applauded. As in Germany the outlook would be dark indeed were it not that there is in Italy another Association of Teachers whose principles differ toto coelo from the Credaro program. Its membership is made up of 18,000 firm believers in the need of religious instruction in elementary schools, who do not mean to allow Credaro's aim to be realized without energetic protest.

French Parliament.—On June 9 M. Briand communicated to the crowded and eagerly expectant Chambers the program of his government. He began by expressing his pleasure at the triumphant return of a great number of Republicans, despite his opponents' general policy of favoring revolutionary rather than radical candidates. He next insisted on the necessity of electoral reform, deprecating, however, a hasty solution of this important problem, and recommending a careful study of the different plans proposed. The Proportionalists loudly applauded this part of his address. On the other hand, the Radicals were somewhat disappointed when the President of the Council affirmed that the income tax was to be realized but without exposing the taxpayer to any inquisitorial process. M. Briand concluded by saying that the work of laicization undertaken by the Republican party would be continued. A Paris despatch of June 10 says that the Radical-Socialists are highly displeased at the moderation of M. Briand's official program. They are preparing an interpellation demanding more precise declarations on the income tax and the defense of lay schools. Meanwhile the Chamber of Deputies, continuing its examinations into the validity of each recent election, declared with practical unanimity, in spite of General Pelayo's bitter attack on M. Delcassé, whose election, he said, called for a very special inquiry, that the former Minister of Foreign Affairs was duly elected.

Belgium.—The collapse of the anti-clerical campaign in the late elections has had a disheartening effect on the press of the party. Hardly a reference is made to the program and plans of the party since the official announcement was made of the victory of the Government and the Catholics. Not in years had the anti-clericals been so confident of success, not in years have they made such supreme efforts to overthrow the Catholic party.

True, the Government majority is small—they hold 86 seats as against the 80 won by the anti-clericals,—but a wise discretion on the part of the Catholics will find the number sufficient. Naturally it will not be part of such a wise discretion on the part of the Government to introduce legislation which is calculated to split its party. The experience of the last parliament shows the ill results likely to follow any such action. At all events a Catholic majority is assured for four years more, for although one-half of the members of the Chambers will be elected in 1912, the seats to be then contested for are in districts in which Catholic influence prevails. The one-half chosen this year come from those parts of Belgium in which anti-clericalism has its stronghold. Another ground for favorable forecast lies in the fact that in 1912, owing to the great increase of population within the decade, there will be a considerable number of new constituencies, and in these, it is admitted, the Catholics predominate.

The Borromeo Encyclical.—Interpellations made in the Reichstag by non-Catholic representatives of leading German parties in reference to the recent Encyclical on the centenary of St. Charles Borromeo marked the beginning of an extraordinarily heated debate last week. The Osservatore Romano explains the unreasonableness of the exceptions taken by the speakers to the passages quoted from the papal document. It shows that the Encyclical attacks only the errors of the Modernists, and in no way reflects on the non-Catholics of Germany or their princes. The letter, it continues, views the epoch of Borromeo historically, and without naming directly any prince or people, concerns itself only with the conduct of Catholics of that day who rebelled against the teaching and authority of the Pope. The sentiment of the Holy Father, it concludes, regarding Germany and its princes is too well known to need defense. It is but a few weeks since public expression was given to it by the Pontiff on the occasion of Cardinal Fischer's visit to the Vatican with the German pilgrims.

Emperor William to the Abbot of Beuron.—On the occasion of the presentation of the beautiful bronze "Crucifixion" donated last month by Emperor William to the Arch-Abbey of Beuron, Prince von Fürstenberg, the Emperor's representative, handed to the Arch-Abbot the following autograph letter: "Right Reverend Lord Abbot: To give you and the Benedictine community a new proof of my regard and esteem, I have been moved graciously to have cast an heroic bronze 'Christ on the Cross,' which I have entrusted to my Court Marshal, Prince von Fürstenberg, for presentation to your Arch-Abbey of Beuron. I trust my choice of a gift will bring you special pleasure; it is, after all, an image to which those who believe as you do as well as those who believe as I, equally look up to with reverence, representing as it does Him from whom measureless blessings flow out upon all mankind. May this cross, erected in your Arch-Abbey, be a source of rich blessing, and may it bring to the faithful, who in humble prayer bend their knee before it, strength and comfort from heaven. I remain, yours sincerely, William I. R." The Imperial gift is three meters in height and a work of art. It has been placed in the vestibule of the Abbey Church.

Kaiser William's Allowance.—The anticipated Socialist opposition to the Government's measure increasing the royal civil list was realized when the measure was sent to committee in the Prussian diet. Herr Hoffman, speaking for the Socialists, sharply arraigned the Emperor's habit of luxurious living whilst his majesty advised economy to the working people. He declared that all state servants, even the chief, should be elected by the people. Shouts of disapproval followed this sentiment, and the presiding officer called Hoffman to order, charging that he was giving utterance to treasonable sentiments. Upon resuming his speech Herr Hoffman proposed that, in the same manner in which members of the Reichstag are remunerated for their services to the state, the King of Prussia should be paid a daily allowance when on duty. The proposition provoked new cries of "treason," and the speaker was again reprimanded. As indicated last week the measure calls for an increase of $875,000 in the Emperor's annual allowance. All parties of the diet, with the exception of the Socialists, are in favor of the increase.

Kaiser to Open Hungarian Parliament.—Announcement is made that Francis Joseph will in person deliver the royal address from the throne and open the Reichstag on June 25. Last week the monarch held a long conference with Graf Khuen Hedevary, no doubt to discuss with the Premier the new aspect of affairs arising from the unexpected strength of the Government following the late elections. It is probable that it is the fair prospect of harmony and the consequent peaceful solution of problems that have been disturbing Hungary for years past which have induced the venerable Emperor-King to agree once more to undergo the fatigue this second visit to Budapest within two months will entail.

Turkey.—The Albanian rising has been checked, whether it has been put down remains to be seen. It is complicated now with the Cretan question. In the Cretan Legislature all the Mohammedan deputies have been excluded because they refused to take an absolute oath to the King of the Hellenes, since by the European understanding he is only to administer its government.—Many deputies especially of Arab blood suspected of desiring to restore the old regime, complained in the chambers of the continual espionage exercised over them by the opening of their letters and telegrams and the frequent retaining of them by the officials of the new Government.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Calling Voice

It was shrewdly observed by Aubrey De Vere that "for some persons the supernatural retains its charm, only provided it can be dissociated from the glory of God and the good of man." This is the reason, we surmise, why spirit-rapping and the silly tricks of deft masters and mistresses in occultism are so popular and awe-inspiring in an age that swaggers with sophistication and worldly wisdom. The world—and by the world we mean the persons who call the simple piety, which is God's due from man, either stupidity or mysticism—has, thanks to Protestantism, conceived a strong repugnance to belief in a supernatural life. It will entertain a feverish interest in the state of subliminal consciousness at the instance of some groping scholar spinning webs from the vitals of his own hallucination. It will bend its solemn brows or hush its mocking laughter to listen wide-eyed to a cunning old lady who fools it to its bent by incoherent ravings concerning animal magnetism. It will carry charms and have the superstitious terror, which we associate with a savage, of Friday and the thirteenth day of the month. And all this on grounds of chance coincidence and gossip, stimulated no doubt by a fundamental knowledge of personal helplessness in crises. Whenever this self-knowledge is stirred, the panic that ensues flings reason aside and gallops madly for the outstretched hand or the protecting skirt of every mountebank. We doubt whether in any age of the world the superstitious fears of men have been traded on so lucratively by experts in sharp practice as in these enlightened times.

We need not ask this foolish world with the coward's fear in its heart what it thinks of religious vocation. It cannot distinguish between Christ and Confucius; between a Catholic priest and a Chinese bonze; between a monastery in Thibet and one in Spain. It can understand and sympathize with the man who starves himself to death to paint a picture, or to discover a rhyme or the north pole, but it falls into a bewilderment of pity, scorn and rage at the news of a promising lad or a marriageable maid entering the priesthood or the religious life. It scouts the idea of vocation, and seeks other causes for such a course of folly. It must be disappointment in love, or absence of ambition, or a defect of temperament, or a passing whim, or callow inexperience. It can be any thing except a call from God to the soul. This is too absurd! The voices of Domremy over again! And in this twentieth century!

But notice how the tune changes after the lad has become a priest or a monk. As a rule, the world says its last, tearful farewell to the prospective nun at the convent gate. After that it tries to forget her except for the purposes of sentimental poetry and art. Her life is one of prayer or of quiet ministrations to men, and she does not roughly intrude upon the hostilities of the world by vigorous antagonisms and stern, uncompromising impeachments. So, if the maid must needs, at the urgency of a most lamentable illusion, bury herself alive, the world will be gracious enough not to pursue her too vindictively with its wrath, and in a pathetic mood will, maybe, drop a tear over her memory and her grave. But it is not so with the promising lad who in the hey-day of life spurns the world that would hold him back with tempting offers and rose-tinted visions. "You are burying your talents, my lad," it says. "A career lies before you if you stay with us. You will have money and power and friends and honor. But, in heaven's name, get rid of this fool's notion about a vocation. What good can possibly come to you or your fellow-men from mumbling Masses or contemplating skulls and cross-bones? Let the world's failures go in for that kind of thing. But don't tie up and paralyze your God-given gifts by a life-long alliance with mean-spirited and snivelling weaklings." In some such wise does that Mentor, the world, address itself in pain and deep concern to the promising lad. The years pass, the youth has grown accustomed to his cassock, and, lo! the world addresses him again. It tells him that he is a grasping, tyrannic, avaricious ecclesiastic, or a lazy, self-indulgent, jolly monk, plethoric with the good things of life. He gorges himself with rich toll levied upon an over-worked and half-fed world. His smirking hypocrisy is a cover for the foulest passions. The life he leads is one that sybarites might envy. The frenzied, grey, old world proceeds to draw such a picture of the pleasures and riches and power of the sacerdotal and monastic state that, knowing human nature to be generally weak and inclined to easy enjoyments, we experience a mild surprise that Catholic seminaries and monasteries are not besieged night and day by eager applicants for admission to a beatific existence never dreamt of Circe.

Our authority for this description of the world's attitude towards the religious life is literature passim, not merely English literature but all modern literature. For literature, as Cardinal Newman pointed out, is essentially human and the natural expression of a very natural and unsupernatural world. From Chaucer to Tennyson the lover of English letters will find plentiful material wherewith to form a clear conception of the world's view of vocation to the higher supernatural state. When, as in the case of Robert Browning, there is an inherited flavor of the Dissenting chapel, the estimate of the world is envenomed to a degree that borders on violence and vulgarity.

We do not maintain, of course, that there never was and never will be an avaricious priest, an ambitious ecclesiastic, or a monk whose courage failed him and who fled cravenly down by-paths of mitigation and ignoble ease. Why must the world, however, have eyes only for the rare and the exceptional? Is it not the sign of a degenerate instinct to condemn a rose-garden in June because a single rose covers a worm with its petals? Men and women do not forswear the luxuries of life, nor voluntarily multiply laws that hamper freedom, in order to become millionaires, politicians, or epicureans. A generous impulse—so generous the world cannot understand it—drives them on; and if, in the life-long momentum afterwards, the frictions of a balking nature drag at the heels of this one or that, or turn him for a spell from the orbit of his heroism, is it just to cackle over the failure and condemn the impulse? The world has a keen scent for sin except in its own house. Nothing pleases it so much as to discover a hypocrite or a voluptuary in pew or pulpit or convent close. It should be a matter for tears and for the waters of oblivion to all who applaud the struggle of the human soul to break through the chrysalis of the earthy.

But why stop to argue with the world, that baleful sorcerer than Comus more skilled in sly enticements?

"Thou hast not ear, nor soul, to apprehend
The sublime notion and high mystery
That must be uttered to unfold the sage
And serious doctrine of Virginity;
And thou art worthy that thou shouldst not know
More happiness than this thy present lot.
Enjoy thy dear wit, and gay rhetoric,
That hath so well been taught her dazzling fence;
Thou art not fit to hear thyself convinced."

Plato is said to have derived a Greek word meaning "to call" from a similarly spelled word meaning "beautiful," not for a mere likeness in the spelling but because of an affinity of signification. For beauty, he declared, is always calling to human eye and heart. We recognize something of the like in the common phrase, "compelling beauty." The call of beauty in one or another individualized form is always ringing in the ears of the soul. In many instances that form may be lovely to none but him who hears it calling. But, if the form of beauty perished from our minds, or its voice grew faint for all of us, dying away utterly and becoming the empty echo of an early memory, all the wheels of life would stand still. Our fires would remain unkindled, our lamps unlit, our fields unsown and the silent desolation of Sahara would enwrap the planet.

We speak about the most solemn and finest thing in life when in prosy fashion we discuss a man's calling, or, to use the Latin equivalent, his vocation. Not to all men is the curtain drawn in the same measure from the vision of beauty, and not to all men are the accents and the message of that call the same. The more unveiled has been the vision, the purer and the rarer has been the inviting ideal, the more arduous will be the mountain road that climbs up to it, the more instant will be the fall of its calling upon the ear, and the more perilous will be disobedience and harkening to voices in the depths.

In no excess of emotional transport, but simply restating a truth to which faith and reason contribute, we say, that no vision of beauty is so pure and so compelling as that which dawns upon the inward eye of youth and maid, leading their young feet into Catholic chancel and cloister. The Beautiful for them has no peer among the visions of men. Its calling, Its vocation, Its tender pleading, is as gentle as the first wind of morning, but not less audible than the voice of thunder. It is the Creator calling for volunteers among His creatures to a higher service. It is the Redeemer calling for a body-guard. And the calling Voice is the breathing of the Holy Spirit. The Voice is a grace; and the strength to answer it and to follow it is a grace. The Voice is not heard by many as numbers go. But it is a Calling that may not be denied. The one who hears it and is deaf, or having heard it for a space concludes that he is wearied of it, may well say:

"At my feet the abyss is cloven then,
With deeper menace than for other men,
Of my potential cousinship with mire."

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

Mr. Speer Heard From

It is with reluctance that we again touch on the question of the authenticity of the letter which Mr. Robert E. Speer, in his wanton attack on the Catholics of South America, claimed to have been written by Leo XIII to the clergy of Chile, and in which that Pontiff was represented as casting serious reflections on the morality of "the prelates, priests and other clergy of that country." In view of the proof given in AMERICA that such a letter never was written we had hoped that the incident was closed. After a silence prolonged for several months, Mr. Speer addressed to AMERICA, on June 3, a long communication which was received on June 7, and which in courtesy we notice.

A great part of this communication is a renewed attack on the South American Republics generally and specifically, with a new array of statistics about illiteracy and illegitimacy in Bolivia and Venezuela, Chile, Porto Rico, Uruguay and Brazil. The columns of AMERICA are not open to vilification of the clergy, or unjust inferences regarding the morality or ignorance of the laity. That portion of his letter which is an answer to our oft-repeated challenge to tell us the authority for the extract he quoted, we here willingly reproduce.

"My authority for this quotation," writes Mr. Speer, "was 'Beach's Geography of Protestant Missions,' page 126, with collateral evidence of the authenticity of such a letter found in an editorial in the New York Independent for March 17, 1898, in which the Independent referred to this letter, and quoted from the reply of the Archbishop of Santiago. I have since received from the South American Missionary Society, of London, a copy of the encyclical and the Archbishop's reply, printed by that Society in 1898, in which it is said that 'the Papal encyclical appeared in La Lei, the principal paper of Chile, for the 24th of last October' [that is, 1897]."

Here, then, we have the source from which Mr. Speer confesses he drew his information—in the first instance from Mr. Beach's "Geography of Protestant Missions," with the collateral evidence furnished by the Independent. Let us see what these authorities are worth. Mr. Beach is the "Educational Secretary" of an organization known as the Student Volunteer Movement; Mr. Speer was at one time the "Traveling Secretary" of the same, and is at present its leader. Mr. Beach is the author of the last four or five publications of the S. V. M., and his office is at the headquarters of its publishing house in New York. Thus they play into each other's hands. Mr. B. writes the literature and Mr. S. disseminates it. Mr. B. loads the gun and Mr. S. fires it. If the gun kicks, the fault is with the loading, or the ammunition. No living man knows better than Mr. Speer the value of the testimony of his partner and co-worker in missionary propagandism.

But, even in the supposition that there was neither collusion nor cooperation between these two eminent evangelicals, does it not seem strange that the best authority Mr. Speer can give for the genuineness of a Papal "Encyclical Letter"—the name given to it by Mr. Beach—is that of a Protestant in a work treating of Protestant missions? Every encyclical, or public document, issued by the Vatican is published at once in official organs, and the more important in the leading Catholic papers of every land. A public document that could find its way into a Protestant journal must necessarily, if genuine, emanate first from the Catholic press. There is no question here of some obscure record of the Middle Ages hidden in some remote library, or covered with the dust of centuries in sealed archives, but of a document issued as late as 1898.

There are a dozen daily and weekly newspapers in Rome of the clerical, as well as the anti-clerical press, in which such a document if it existed could be found. The biweekly Civiltà Cattolica, in close touch with the Vatican, and the leading periodical of the Catholic world, makes no mention of it, as is attested by the editor of the Literary Digest, who employed a man to examine its files. Nor can it be traced to any other of these reliable sources. With this array of negative testimony before us we are referred to Mr. Beach. The extract, it is true, is found on p. 126 of his book as cited, but Mr. Beach does not furnish the slightest clue to the original text of the passage. Mr. Beach's word for it is surely not sufficient. His "Geography of Protestant Missions" and his "Protestant Missions in South America" are surcharged with statements offensive to Catholics and travesties of the truth, of which the following are a few specimens: Auricular confession "corrupts the minds and hearts of both sexes and all classes;" "drunkenness, gambling, impurity . . . thrive in the favoring soil of Latin America's Romanism;" "Stupendous falsehoods of Romanism;" its "heathenish spectacles;" "Romanism divorces morals and religion;" "Romanism can only flourish in the soil of ignorance [author's italics]; its silly superstitions are revolting to a mind which can reason. Enlightenment is its seal of death. Hence education in any true sense is never fostered by the Popes;" and so on.

Such is the character of Mr. Beach's educational contributions to ecclesiastical history; yet we are asked to take the word of this professional libeler of the Catholic Church for the genuineness of a scandalous fabrication about the Chilean clergy.

Mr. Speer cites as "collateral evidence of the authenticity of such a letter" an editorial in the New York Independent for March, 1898, in which he says "the Independent referred to this letter and quoted from the reply of the Archbishop of Santiago." Mr. Speer does not add that the Independent, so far from bearing witness to the genuine character of the document, is forced to gasp in astonishment at the boldness of the archbishop's reply to the Holy Father. The archbishop is made to say, the Cardinal Treasurer "informed us that the yearly outlay of the Papal Court reached the enormous amount of 800,000,000 francs." This extravagant statement is too much even for the Independent to swallow and the editor says "$160,000,000 is, of course, vastly greater than the annual expenses of the Roman Court, or even of all the missions and organizations attached to it, and there appears to be some mistake about it." Then follow other excerpts in the Independent from the supposed letter, one more absurd than the other, in which finally the archbishop openly defies the Holy Father and tells His Holiness that he has the purpose of continuing to live exactly as heretofore in spite of the remonstrances of his ecclesiastical chief. No wonder the Independent says that the boldness of the reply startled its faith in the authenticity of the document. Yet Mr. Speer cites the Independent as collateral evidence!

There was an Apostolic Letter of Leo XIII, addressed that same year, 1897, in the month of April, to the hierarchy of Latin America; it can be read in the seventh volume of the collected Encyclicals, Letters and Allocutions of the late Pontiff. In it Leo XIII recounts with glowing satisfaction the glorious record of the Church in those regions, whose clergy, beginning with the discovery of the continent, had gradually extended their laudable work for souls until in our own times they carried civilization to the utmost limits of Patagonia, everywhere reaping in joy the fruit of their apostolic labors. Can this be the original of the Pope's letter that Mr. Speer is in search of? Quien sabe?

Mr. Speer says he has now a copy of the Pope's letter forwarded from the South American Missionary Society in London. The South American Missionary Society did not receive its copy from Rome or from any Catholic source, but it claims to have received it from La Lei, the principal paper of Chile, for the 24th of October, 1897. The utter worthlessness of the document has already been attested by two denials of an official source which have already been printed in AMERICA and are here reproduced:

El Mercurio, a liberal party paper of Santiago de Chile, in its issue of March 19, 1910, gives an exact Spanish translation of Mr. Speer's extract from the so-called "letter of the Pope to the Chilean clergy," and stamps the letter as a fraud and a calumnious attack on the clergy and people of Chile. It confirms this with an official letter from Rome received on March 21, 1904, by Archbishop Casanova of Santiago, in which the Sacred Congregation of the Council praises his Grace for defending the Faith and encouraging piety among the people (AMERICA, April 29, 1910).

On April 13, 1910, the following official communication was received from the archbishop's residence, signed and duly attested:

"I certify that, from the Archives of the Archdiocese of Santiago de Chile, it is certain that there never has been received from the Holy See a communication censuring the clergy for their behavior; on the contrary, the Holy Father has always praised their zeal for the salvation of souls and their upright lives."

A retraction from Mr. Speer is hardly to be expected and would benefit only himself. Will the Literary Digest that gave space to his slanders give equal space to their refutation? Again such action would benefit chiefly the Literary Digest.

Some Catholic Chaplains

One of the failings of "modern journalism" is the "good story." The idea is not new, for it is centuries since the tag, si non e vero e ben trovato was first affixed to the o'er true tale. When the up-to-date reporter or "rewrite man" turns in a "good story" he never lets himself be hampered by facts.

Thus worked the scribe from the New York Sun who attended the imposing military field Mass, celebrated Sunday, May 30, on the parade ground of the Brooklyn Navy Yard in memory of the Catholic soldiers and sailors of the United States who had answered the last roll-call. To give "human interest" to his report the Sun man invented a "Private Mulcahy who marched out in '61 with old Sixty-Ninth" and learned from this veracious veteran that he "had been at the first field Mass they ever had in this country back in the big war," and that "since then they've only had eight others"—all at the Brooklyn yard or the neighboring parish church. This is about as near actual fact as the average current Catholic historical item, but it is particularly hard on the services and records of the corps of splendid priests who went to the front in the war time, and followed their regiments all through the various campaigns, many of them without a cent of pay, or official recognition of "relative rank" or emolument. They offered up scores of Masses on fields surrounded by the panoply and accoutrements of real war. These were no holiday ceremonials, and, pleasing as it may be to every American Catholic to have the greatest naval station of the Republic now the annual scene of such an imposing function as that of May 30, they should not be forgotten in this day and generation. The first memorial Mass of which the Government of the United States took official cognizance was the requiem celebrated in St. Mary's Church, Philadelphia, on September 18, 1777, for General P. H. Du Coudray, the French officer who was accidentally drowned two days before. "Resolved," says the act of Congress passed September 17, 1777, "that the corpse of Mons. Du Coudray be interred at the expense of the United States and with the honors of war." The Congress attended the Mass, as it did also another on May 8, 1780, in the same church, for the repose of the soul of Don Juan de Miralles, the Spanish Agent, who died on April 28, 1780, at Washington's camp, at Morristown, N. J. "Do you know," said the traitor Arnold, in his address to his former comrades of the Continental Army, "that the eye which guides this pen lately saw your mean and profligate Congress at Mass for the soul of a Roman Catholic in Purgatory, and participating in the rites of a Church against whose anti-Christian corruption your pious ancestors would bear witness with their blood?"

Another notable requiem was that sung in St. Patrick's (old) Cathedral, New York, on January 16, 1863, for the dead of the Irish Brigade who had fallen in the Civil War up to that date. The congregation was very large and distinguished; the celebrant, the Rev. Thomas Ouellet, S.J., chaplain of the Sixty-Ninth, N. Y. Volunteers, and the preacher the Rev. Bernard O'Reilly, who had also served as a chaplain in the Irish Brigade, and later the monsignore so well known as the historian of Leo XIII and for his many other contributions to Catholic literature.

Mention of these two priests recalls the very honorable records the Catholic chaplains have made in the military history of the United States. It is not stretching the title too far to head the list with the name of John Carroll, the illustrious founder of the American hierarchy. His service with the commission to Canada in 1776 surely gives him a claim. There were not enough Catholics in any one body of the Continental Army to warrant assigning them a special chaplain. Congress had voted on May 27, 1777, that "for the future there be only one chaplain allowed to each brigade of the army and that such chaplain be appointed by Congress with same pay, rations and forage as a colonel."

Two regiments had been recruited in Canada which were called "Congress' Own." Colonel James Livingston commanded one and Colonel Moses Hazen the other, and with them came from Canada two priests, Father Louis Lotbinière, a Recollect, who, on January 26, 1776, was appointed to Livingston's regiment by General Arnold, with the pay of £14.10s. per month and rations, and Father Pierre Huet de la Valinière, a Sulpician. Both got into serious trouble with their ecclesiastical superiors in Canada for espousing the cause of "the Bostonnais," and both experienced the ingratitude of republics.

"Would to God that I had never known either the general Montgomery or arrived in Canada; I would not now starve with hunger and cold for not being paid according to the convention made between General Arnold and me the 26 Januarii 1776 and ratified in Congress assembly the 12 August 1776 for long my Life; to indemnify me for having lost my parish." So wrote the unfortunate Lotbinière in a complaint to Congress of his treatment. He died in poverty and neglect at Burlington, N. J., in 1786.

Father de la Valinière had a roving disposition. In the fall of 1785 he was at Fishkill, N. Y., where a number of these Canadian soldiers and refugees were located, then in New York City ministering to the French colony there; next in Philadelphia and finally he journeyed on to Kaskaskia in the Illinois, where he became, in 1786, pastor and vicar general. Here he met Father St. Pierre, a discalced Carmelite, who had served as chaplain in Rochambeau's army. Another name distinguished in the annals of this section is that of Father Peter Gibault whose influence saved Vincennes and the Western territory to the American cause. "Mr. Gibault, the priest to whom this country owes many thanks for his zeal and services," as Gov. Patrick Henry said in his instructions to Col. Clark. New Yorkers will also remember that Father Charles Whelan, an Irish Franciscan, who had been a chaplain on one of the ships of De Grasse's fleet, was the first regularly settled priest in the city of New York, and first pastor of St. Peter's congregation.

Until the Mexican War there were no more Catholic chaplains for the army, and then in 1845 there went into the service from Georgetown College, in June, 1845, two Jesuits, Fathers Anthony Rey and John McElroy. The former was killed by a band of Mexican guerillas, and the latter, after zealous work, returned to Georgetown and died September 12, 1877, in his ninety-sixth year. The next move in regard to Catholic chaplains was an offer made to Bishop Hughes, of New York, during the Polk administration, of an appointment for a chaplain in the navy. While gratified at the suggestion, the bishop had to decline because of the dearth of priests and other important reasons.

When the Civil War began and the consequent enrollment in the Union Army of thousands of Catholic soldiers there came a call from the War Department for chaplains. With the Sixty-Ninth, New York, one of the first regiments to go to the front, marched Father "Tom"

Mooney, pastor of St. Brigid's. After him, in the same regiment, and others of the Irish Brigade, Irish Legion, Sickles' Brigade and other New York commands were the Jesuits, Fathers Bernard O'Reilly, Thomas Ouellet, Michael Nash and Peter Tissot—detailed for these stations at the request of Archbishop Hughes by their Superior, Very Rev. Remigius Tellier, of St. John's, Fordham—O'Hagan, later Rector of Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., Gillen, Dillon and William Corby, the latter from Notre Dame, Ind. Father Corby was with the Eighty-eighth of the Irish Brigade and his general absolution to the Brigade, as he stood on a rock on the battlefield of Gettysburg, is one of the heroic episodes of that memorable conflict.

Father Laurence McMahon, afterwards Bishop of Hartford, of the Twenty-Eighth Massachusetts and Father "Tom" Scully of the Ninth, from the same State, were two New England members of this devoted band of splendid priests who have passed to their reward. Living still, among other chaplains who must not be forgotten are John Ireland, of the Fifth Minnesota, now Archbishop of St. Paul, and the Rev. Dr. Louis A. Lambert, of Scottsville, N. Y., of the Eighteenth Illinois, now editor of the Freeman's Journal.

Father Tissot, S.J., who was chaplain of the Thirty-Seventh New York, "Irish Rifles," kept a minute diary of his army experience which has been preserved through the efforts of his fellow Jesuit, Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, for the "Records" of the United States Catholic Historical Society. It is most entertaining reading now. He was captured with Fathers O'Hagan and Scully and sent to Richmond. There were three local priests with Bishop McGill in the Confederate capital, who treated them with kindness, and they avoided talking politics. The bishop he describes as "very kind but very strong in his Southern convictions." They were released after a short detention and returned to their duties with the army. During his two years' chaplaincy he says he seldom missed celebrating Mass. "Even when on the march," he relates, "if the regimental wagons reached the regiment in the evening, I would at once pitch my tent, drive into the ground three stakes and nail a board on them. That was the altar. . . . My cassock was without sleeves. The vestments, white and red, were of silk and hardly occupied any room. They were a present from Manhattanville Convent. One bottle of wine lasted me a full month."

Once he gave a mission to the whole regiment in a small A-tent he had for his quarters. Company by company he made the men come before him three at a time, each group three times a day and there, seated on a cracker-box, he instructed them, squad after squad, for three days, until every Catholic in the Thirty-Seventh "made the mission." When a battle was on he would sit astride his horse by the roadside as the regiment went into action and give general absolution to the men as they marched by. They knew what to do. The first ranks would doff their caps, say an act of contrition while he, with uplifted hand, absolved them; the next would do the same, and so on until the whole regiment had passed.

Nor should we forget the zealous men who ministered to those who wore the Gray, so well typed in the poet of the Lost Cause, Father Abram J. Ryan, Bishop Lynch, of Charleston, Fathers Whelan and Duggan of Savannah, Fathers Hubert, S.J., Bannon, Heidencamp, and many others. In the record of his eighteen months' detention in Confederate prisons, Sergeant S. S. Boggs, of the Twenty-First Illinois Volunteers, tells us that "the churches of all denominations, except one solitary Catholic priest, Father Hamilton, ignored us as wholly as they would dumb beasts. Father Hamilton was the only religious minister that I ever knew to come into the prison at Andersonville."

Presbyterian Diplomacy

The reports of the 122nd General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church North make curious reading. They aptly illustrate our statement in AMERICA regarding the Calvin Quadro-Centennial last year, that modern Presbyterianism while lauding its prophet ignores his preachments, and is now nothing more than a Calvinistic shell. Not even the shell was sound, and the last meeting has damaged it beyond repair.

The Assembly's deliberations lasted over a week and there was a multitude of words on many impertinent matters but when questions arose that fundamentally concern Christian belief, moral conduct and the stability of the family and nation, the Assembly was silent. Such matters were referred to a Committee who brought in a compromise report that determined nothing in many words—and the affair was ended.

The report of the Committee on Divorce and Remarriage is a strange document. It laments the continued increase of divorce, especially in such states as Pennsylvania, Illinois, Massachusetts and New York, the impossibility, through State jealousy, of enacting Federal marriage laws, and the existing laws' disregard of the sacredness of marriage; but still it hopes that the International Church Conference and National Divorce Congress will better things in the future, though it admits they have done little, and its figures prove they have done nothing, in the past. Quite unconsciously it supplies the reason for their failure:

"We cannot hope to influence public opinion or secure stricter divorce laws until the standards of our Churches are in conformity with the teachings of Christ and until the conduct of ministers and members of the Churches is in conformity with the standards of the Churches to which they have sworn allegiance."

Quite so; but the Assembly had just ratified a declaration which is directly contrary to the teachings of Christ and leaves the Presbyterian Churches no standard of any kind. The Interchurch Conference had permitted six causes for divorce with the right of remarriage. The Chairman of Committee was satisfied with two. Having been asked to state the scriptural grounds therefor, his only reply was—and this satisfied the Assembly—that the constitution of the Church permitted the remarrying of the innocent person when the divorce was secured on the grounds of infidelity or wilful desertion. And the Moderator added that ministers should use common sense in determining the grounds.

Of course it is clear from this that the Assembly Presbyters did not want to follow the teachings of Christ. Christ allows no cause for divorce with remarriage; they allow practically any. There are few cases, where divorce is wanted, which "infidelity or wilful desertion" may not be made to cover, especially when helped out by the "common sense" and discretion of the minister. When it is a matter of common knowledge that divorced Presbyterians of means find no difficulty in getting a minister to marry them, and they are not thereby disqualified for membership, such rulings are accepted as a blind and those who make them must know that they are nugatory.

Knowing all this one wonders whether it was marvelous audacity or marvelous obtuseness that inspired them to pen this self-evident but condemnatory Truth: "Unless the discipline of the Church will prevent its ministers from putting the seal of the Church upon unholy alliances and will prevent its members from making such unholy alliances it will be useless to expect the State to regard our protests or to listen to our appeals for reform." Which provokes the obvious retort: If the rulers of the Church decline to give scriptural ground for the exceptions they allow and deliberately refrain from determining what are and are not "unholy alliances," neither ministers, members nor State will consider their protests and appeals in earnest and, as far as they are concerned, unholy alliances will go merrily on.

They had good reason for not quoting the teachings of Christ on divorce. Another decision proves that they had little faith, if any, in the divine and infallible nature of the scriptures. The case was submitted of the three Union Seminary students who were duly ordained last year, with the approval of the New York Presbytery and the New York Synod, although they denied the inspiration of the Bible, the Virgin birth and the resurrection of Christ, the raising of Lazarus from the dead, and other miracles. The Assembly found that the young ministers were merely "not prepared to affirm these truths with the same positiveness as for some other doctrines," and therefore sustained them, and all the interests concerned! The advice that greater care should be taken in examination for the ministry was offered as a salve to the protestants and was gracefully accepted.

If men who disbelieve or doubt the Divinity of Christ and the divine inspiration of scriptures are permitted ordination by the highest authorities of the Presbyterian Church, and may pose as ministers of Christ in good standing, it is clear that a lax interpretation of the scriptural laws on divorce is a mere bagatelle. If the authority of scripture is questionable, much more so any ruling founded thereon. Hence the Divorce Committee was as logical in making their Church Constitution, and not scripture, their standard as they were disingenuous in referring to the teachings of Christ as authority therefor.

This laxity, or rather religious disintegration, is not confined to sectional lines. The Presbyterian Church South may differ definitely and vehemently in political matters from their brethren of the North, but in religious uncertainty of thought and action they are one. Two of their missionaries allowed an African disciple, a chief of some note, to continue in bigamy. The matter was brought before the South Carolina Conference on several occasions but was conveniently shelved. It was then referred to the General Assembly at Savannah last summer, but the ministers were so busy lauding Calvin and denouncing Romanism that they had neither time nor energy to tackle the difficulty from Africa. And so the bigamous African remains a good Presbyterian up to date.

Their Northern brethren were equally tactful. They could vigorously denounce the Russians of Kiev, but for their own ministers and members who reject or condemn God's word and approve or tolerate the system He condemned, they have not a word of menace. And such menace would be as futile as their denunciations of Russia. Having given away position after position, they have no definite creed, standard or authority left; little to enforce and nothing to enforce it with. They said last year that Calvin stood for the sovereignty of God and human liberty. His doctrines tended rather towards the dethronement of God and human license, and his heirs have developed the tendency. They invoke "the united influence of those who profess to reverence the laws of God and the morality taught by Jesus Christ" in order to secure righteous legislation. They themselves have first to profess and practice all the laws of Christ,—but then they will have ceased to be Presbyterians.

Earthlight

In AMERICA, Vol. III, No. 2, we reviewed an article by G. J. Burns in the March number of The Observatory on the total amount of starlight, in which it was said that there was also some light, called earthlight, which was not due to direct starlight, and which might be a permanent aurora or an extension of the zodiacal light. In the following or April number, the same writer presents some fuller observations and sums up the matter by saying that "The most probable explanation of earthlight appears to be that it is due to the same cause as the aurora borealis; that, in fact, an aurora is simply earthlight of abnormal intensity. If, again, the earth is surrounded by a thin, self-luminous nebulous envelope (as the observed facts seem to show), there is an obvious similarity between this nebulous envelope and the coma of a comet. The hypothesis that earthlight and comet-light may have a common origin receives some support from the unusual brightness of the sky on the night of the 30th of June, 1861, on which date the earth is supposed to have passed through the tail of Comet I, 1861. If earthlight is analogous to comet-light it naturally follows that the "gegen-schein" is analogous to a comet's tail.

"But besides earthlight properly so called, it seems likely that the zodiacal light may contribute its share to the general illumination of the sky. . . . If we accept the current theory that the zodiacal light consists of a ring of meteoric matter in the plane of the ecliptic, this ring must extend beyond the earth's orbit, for the apex of the light has been observed to extend for more than ninety degrees from the sun. But if this be the case, the earth must be immersed in the ring, and consequently must receive light from it in all directions. It appears, therefore, that the luminous background of the night sky may consist of four parts: (1) The direct light of telescopic stars. (2) The diffused light of the stars. (3) Earthlight. (4) Possibly a faint extension of the zodiacal light."

And again in the May issue the same writer, speaking of the brightness of the sky, gives us some more information, and ends by saying:

"The following is a summary of the results obtained by various observers for the non-galactic sky: Newcomb makes one square degree equal to the light of 1.15 times that of a fifth-magnitude star; Burns equal to 2; Townley 2; Yutema 5.76, and Fabry 1.46. If, as seems very probable, the brightness of the sky is a variable quantity, the results obtained by different observers are bound to differ from each other very considerably."

T. W. Backhouse then offers another explanation: "I have not seen any evidence contrary to the idea that it was not auroral but of the nature of the 'sky-colored clouds,' or, as Herr O. Jesse called them, the "night-shining clouds;" that is to say, the luminosity was caused by the sun actually shining upon something in the atmosphere, and so rendering it visible, although it is evident from the various accounts that the light was much more uniform than is usually the case with clouds. . . . It may be remembered that Herr O. Jesse ascertained the height of the 'sky-colored clouds' to be 51 miles. This threw doubt as to their being ordinary clouds, which are formed of either water or ice, and gave rise to the idea that they were formed from some other substance in the atmosphere; but this remains to be proved."

In this connection the present writer may be allowed to mention a cloud phenomenon he had himself observed at Omaha many years ago, which he reported as follows, in the Monthly Weather Review for December, 1904: "At about fifty minutes after sunset, on July 18, 1904, my attention was attracted to a cumulus cloud about ten degrees high in the east-northeast, which was pretty strongly illuminated by the sunlight. No other clouds, not even those near the point of sunset, showed the least trace of sunlight. The clouds were in detached bunches and covered about one-tenth of the sky. The brightness of the cloud diminished gradually, but it was still visible a full hour after sunset. The sun set on that day at 7:28, local time, or 7:52 central time. The data I am enabled to supply are probably insufficient to measure the altitude of the cloud, which seems to have been enormous, since the sun was about ten degrees below the horizon."

Browsing Among the Documents

The other day I found myself reading during office hours, and if in your school days you ever tried to finish a story under the watchful glances of a teacher, you know the feeling which pervaded me. This is how it happened.

I am revising the "Tables and Index," that uninviting but useful key to the Congressional documents from the fifteenth to the fifty-second Congress. As you are perhaps not a Washington official accustomed to thinking in political epochs with Congressional sessions for milestones, I will say instead, it is the only key to the documents printed by order of Congress from about 1820 to 1894, and these sometimes include reprints of what went before, sometimes a very long time before.

Well that day, I stumbled over a tempting volume, "Explorations of the Valley of the Amazon;" Part I is by Lieutenant Herndon, and was printed by Robert Armstrong, Public Printer in 1853. The readable type and smoothly finished paper show that Congress, in its struggles with its Senate printers and House printers, was coming out ahead, and the output in this case can stand comparison with the public documents of Europe. Up to this time our documents displayed more of printers' graft than printers' craft.

Part II of this interesting old book was printed by A. O. P. Nicholson (another firm patronized by Congress), in 1854, and Lieutenant Lardner Gibbon is its author. I had vigorously shoved aside these two travelers' tales, but not long after, in turning over many another volume bound in the same deadly uniform sheepskin, with the usual hieroglyphics on the back, "Senate document, 2d Sess. 32d Cong. 1852-53," opening upon an endless index to the eleven volumes of "Senate Executive Documents, etc., etc.," again I found the specific title page with its now familiar "Exploration of the Valley of the Amazon." This time I peeped longer. The tinted lithographs of the Cathedral of Lima, the natives and the Portuguese, the magnificent scenery of the Andes, the graceful llanos, the domestic spinning scene, the war-dances were to be enjoyed by even busy me. Scanning the text but too hastily, I saw the Lieutenant missing his way in the wilds of the equatorial forests, the natives growing insolent as he loses his strength. Falling drowsily asleep, while in the distance the native guides are roasting a monkey, he revives with the aid of a native drink, and the guides offer him a roasted "leg of monkey" which he greedily devours and is soon again on his way.

The book opens at another scene. He is assisting at a festival Mass where the Indians gather round, noisily enough, beating drums, to show honor to the occasion. The Lieutenant feelingly describes the poverty of the Catholic Church in that wilderness. He tells us the vestments are in rags, and, forgetting that use hallows the commonest article, he shudders at seeing the wafer for Mass placed in a shaving mug, and the wine taken from a vinegar cruet. He promises himself to make known this poverty on his return home. And so the zeal of this good old naval officer has gone on record, and we trust he is to-day benefitting by the prayers daily offered for those who have shown zeal for the decency of divine worship.

But he had lived with the natives long enough to understand the simple-heartedness of their religious devotions, and gives all credit to the wisdom of the padres for teaching them in their own fashion.

During the Mass the noise of the drums worries the Lieutenant, and he takes comfort when at last one drummer falls asleep—but alas! another beats the drum for the sleepy fellow, and the din goes on, even as in Cuba to-day where our Americans grow restless under the jangling of bells which torment the ears on every occasion of devotion or jubilation.

I forgot which of the two authors laments over the loss of a favorite bird, grieving because it was an affectionate and valorous bird which could with impunity take the food from the beak of larger birds, and grieving more because it was presented to him by one of the good padres.

Later on I accidentally saw the printer's bill for these books. Part I cost $28,636.83, and Part II cost $27,229.16, and I find that there are over a dozen copies on sale for about a dollar for the set, which is certainly one case where Uncle Sam is selling "below cost." If you are interested, a postal card addressed to the Superintendent of Documents, Washington, D. C., will bring you more definite information.

To-day I browsed among the reports of the army engineers sent out in 1852 to survey the road for a railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific. The result commercially we all know—the building of the Pacific Railroads. The result bibliographically is a set of eleven quarto volumes which appear in the Congressional or "sheep set" twice, that is, as Senate and House documents, and again they are shelved logically among the War Department publications; in the last place they are readily recognized as they bear the title "Pacific Railroad Surveys" on their cloth-covered backs.

These reports are a luxury in the way of illustrations of the wild west. The army engineers blazed the trail, sent in reports, and the scientists accompanying them gathered information by chapters, while the artists sketched the scenes, the natives, the Rockies, the rivers, the deserts, the birds and beasts. Uncle Sam later paid an enormous printers' and engravers' bill, $863,513, but if you look over the set in your nearest depository library, I think you will agree that the money was well spent. If the matter is arranged somewhat irregularly, it is because the scientific data on natural history were turned over to the Smithsonian Institution, just a few years old at that time, and after Mr. Baird filled one whole volume with Mammals, duly illustrated, and another with Birds, somebody called a halt, and Reptiles came forth with the plates, and not a treatise attached. Then the leftover data on zoology and botany were huddled together somehow, pretty much as the exploring party sent them in to headquarters.

I said above that Congress sometimes orders old documents reprinted. I stumbled over such a case in the Georgia-Florida boundary dispute, and found an extract from a document of 1670. Congress wanted all the documents bearing on the question, and wisely added that the matter should be so compiled that each document appear but once, a precaution against duplication which too often is neglected. The result is, in this boundary controversy case, a compact little volume full of the meat of history.

IN MISSION FIELDS

SERIOUS CHARGES AGAINST PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES.

That the Protestant Missionaries in Korea are teaching rebellion is the serious charge made against them in the Japanese press. This startling indictment we here reprint verbatim from the Manila Cablenews-American of April 15, 1910:

"Under the heading of 'Christianity in Korea,' the Tokio Mainichi of the 20th instant (sic) says:

"'If anyone desires to see a country which has a religion yet is irreligious, religionists without religion, and believers incapable of believing, the finger should be pointed to Korea, the protectorate of Japan. It is indisputable that such a condition is proving not only disastrous to Korea but also to the effective rule of Japan. The responsibility that has turned matters from bad to worse should partly be shouldered by Japan owing to her erroneous diplomatic policy, which has resulted in the present chaos. This unfortunate condition is gradually gaining ground and bids fair to disturb the Korean policy of Japan. Urgent necessity is therefore keenly felt for the clearing away of such a serious obstruction to the proper government of Korea.

"'It is in uncivilized parts of Korea that the most strenuous efforts are being made by the Mission Societies of Europe and America for carrying out their evangelist work, and Korea is perhaps a place destined for their efforts. We do not see anything to be excluded in the doctrine of Christianity, and as to its plan and logical reasoning we cannot but respect it. The characteristics of the Christianity according to Christ's teachings are very beautiful, but what is called Christianity by the Mission Societies is not the Christianity of Christ but that of the Whites only, which is used for their policy of expanding their own interests under the name of religion. Take for example the Christian missionaries in Korea. There can be pointed out many un-Christianlike acts on their part in opposing the national interests and rights of Japan, which have been carried out under the guise of benevolence. Jesus taught the people to "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," while the missionaries teach the Koreans to render to the missionaries the things that are Cæsar's. There are many cases which afford proof that the ownership of Korea has been temporarily transferred to the missionaries, who have caused their consuls to lodge protests and enter into disputes on their behalf. It is their common daily task to teach military training to the children, showing them the way to contend against their sovereign power and to turn the country into a field of battle by encouraging the idea of independence; and when it is considered that there are over 300 schools under the Presbyterian and over 800 schools under the Methodist churches it will be seen that the missionaries have power enough to teach rebellion to the Koreans in the schools belonging to the American Mission Society alone. The evil does not stop here.

"'An Fun-chil and his party, as well as the members of the secret association at Vladivostock, have had their names mentioned in the list of members of churches. It is undeniable from such a fact that the influence of the missionaries is not for peace, but for blood and war. The relation between the Koreans and the missionaries is thus not only a disaster to both Japan and Korea, but is an important question that cannot be neglected even for a little while if the peace of the world is to be considered. As already reported, the missionaries of all the Christian churches have met at Seoul and decided to act unanimously in carrying out their work, and it is reported that they will teach the people to improve their actual way of living. This is said to be actuated by the desire of benevolence, but it is a superficial reason. It was during last year that the American Mission Society decided to increase the fund for the missionary work in Korea by $800,000. This sum is to be allotted to win the favor of the Koreans by the unanimous action of the society, the American Government and the missionaries, and when opportunities come, it is to be turned to the interest of American diplomatic policy. Such is the real object of the work.'"

CORRESPONDENCE

From Erin's Isle

DUBLIN, JUNE 2, 1910.

It has not fallen to the lot of any previous contributor from Ireland to an American publication to chronicle a universal state of mourning in that country for an English monarch. Mourning was common in Ireland on similar occasions among the official classes and also among the various sections of the community who desire to be reckoned among the elite, but never has there been such a unanimous expression of sympathy from the great bulk of the people.

It is not very easy to account for this demonstration of feeling. King Edward was unquestionably popular in Ireland in a way that Queen Victoria never was, yet the Dublin Corporation refused him an address of welcome on the occasion of his visit in 1903 (an attention paid to his mother three years before) the view being held that while the national demand for self-government was still refused Nationalist Ireland should not officially identify itself with Royal demonstrations, whether of joy or sorrow. To this attitude the Nationalist Parliamentary Party have adhered on the present occasion and rightly so as it seems to me.

The immediate effect of King Edward's death on the great constitutional struggle between the two British Houses of Parliament has been to give it a decided setback. Should this delay prove of long duration the result may possibly be rather damaging to the Irish Parliamentary Party. Having voted for the Budget on the strength of Mr. Asquith's promise to proceed promptly in the matter of "tendering advice" to the Crown with respect to the required guarantees their position will be rendered uncomfortable in no small degree if this promise is not crowned with speedy performance. The Budget is not popular in Ireland and nothing save the prospect of an early settlement of the National Question would have obtained for it the support it received. If that prospect becomes more remote a falling off in subscriptions, if not an actual outbreak against the Party, is highly probable.

Catholics throughout the British Empire are keenly interested in the alteration which, it is understood, is contemplated in the words of the King's Accession Oath. As many of your readers are no doubt aware this declaration contains a number of objectionable and blasphemous expressions against the Catholic Religion. King George is reported to be strongly in favor of some change being made so that he may not be called on to insult millions of his subjects. The various bodies in Ireland which testified their sympathy at King George's bereavement are now busy passing resolutions calling for the deletion of the objectionable words from the Oath. It will be interesting to note whether their representations will have the result desired.

All eyes were fixed on Cork on Sunday, the 22nd of May, when Mr. Redmond and Mr. O'Brien held rival meetings in that city. Whatever may be urged in favor of Mr. O'Brien's views it is hard to palliate his conduct in deliberately holding a demonstration on the day already fixed by his opponents for theirs. Having regard to the manner in which party feeling had been worked up it is really wonderful that things passed off so quietly on the whole. A similar series of demonstrations between two rival parties in a big English city would scarcely have terminated without much greater damage to life and property. The English Press, however, did their best, as usual, to magnify the disturbance.

The extent to which the London and Manchester daily papers circulate in Dublin, while a convincing proof of the up-to-date methods of the proprietors of these journals, is hardly gratifying to those who would fain stop the Anglicization of Ireland. The Daily Mail and the Daily Sketch are sold in Dublin on the morning of issue, together with the Dublin dailies. They are extensively bought, not alone by the vast number of Englishmen resident in Dublin, but by many Irishmen also.

It must, unfortunately, be admitted that English influences in Irish life are hard to combat. A striking instance of this was furnished quite recently. At one of the Dublin theatres a new Irish opera was sung to slim audiences and resulted in considerable financial loss to the author. During the same week, the famous English actor, Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, appeared at another theatre in Justin Huntly McCarthy's new play, "The O'Flynn." Sir Herbert does his best in the name part and worse attempts at an English "Irishman" have been seen, but from no point of view could the play have been deemed worthy of the actor or the audience. Such was the demand for seats, however, that plays fixed for other nights had to be withdrawn and "The O'Flynn" put on instead.

The Abbey Theatre is the home of the National Theatre Company, and is controlled by Mr. W. B. Yeats and Lady Gregory. It is, however, subsidized at present by Miss Horniman, a wealthy Englishwoman, resident in Manchester. On the night of the day when King Edward's death became known neither Mr. Yeats nor Miss Horniman was in town and the management of the theatre not knowing what course to adopt decided, as the performance for the evening had been announced, to keep the theatre open. This was done, although all the other places of amusement in the city closed. When Miss Horniman became aware of this she wrote threatening to withdraw her subsidy at once unless a public apology were made. The apology promptly appeared and the Abbey is safe for a little time yet.

Two new plays were produced at the Abbey lately, "Thomas Muskerry" and "Harvest," and are the work of Mr. Padric Colm and Mr. S. L. Robinson, respectively. Opinion is largely divided as to their merits, their admirers claiming that they are powerful and their opponents that they are sordid. It must be admitted that the greater number of the Abbey plays are open to the latter objection. Mr. Colm and Mr. Robinson have done previous work for the Abbey, "The Land" by the former and "The Cross Roads" by the latter, having both achieved a considerable measure of success. It is a pity, however, that none of the dramatists of the Abbey School, except the late Mr. Synge, in the notorious "Playboy of the West," have succeeded in writing a play of any length. Short sketches are the rule and sometimes three or four of these are performed in the space of little more than two hours.

The first degrees of the National University were conferred last week. In Dublin there was no public ceremony, but in Cork Dr. Windle made a speech emphasizing the right of Munster to special treatment in University education. The National University and University College, Dublin, were officially represented at the votive Mass held at the Cathedral in connection with the late King, the President, Secretary of the latter, and several professors attending in their gowns.

WILLIAM DAWSON.

M. Soulange-Bodin, A New Paris Curé

PARIS, MAY 24th, 1910.

M. l'Abbé Marbeau, Curé of St. Honoré d'Eylau, having been appointed Bishop of Meaux, M. l'Abbé Soulange-Bodin, Curé of Plaisance, has been installed in his place. He is a characteristic figure in the clergy of Paris and the work he has done at Plaisance shows what may be accomplished in a Paris faubourg if right methods be used. The parish of St. Honoré d'Eylau, near the Bois de Boulogne, is in the most fashionable part of Paris, but those who know him believe that its new pastor will keep a warm place in his heart for the busy, crowded suburb which, under his influence, has been transformed during the last fifteen years. When in 1884 M. Soulange-Bodin, twenty-four years of age and just ordained, came as Vicaire to Plaisance, there was much to discourage one whose experience of life had been gathered in intellectual and refined circles. Twelve years later, in 1896, he was appointed Curé of the parish, a proof that he had won the sympathy and confidence of his rough and anti-clerical flock.

Before the breaking of the Concordat, when priests were still paid by the State, M. Soulange-Bodin realized the impending change and that new necessities demanded new methods. He boldly faced the fact that France is Catholic hardly more than in name and that its people must be evangelized almost as though they were pagans. "Hitherto," he says, in a small booklet full of sound sense and practical hints: "we have looked upon the people of the faubourgs as fundamentally Christian. . . . We waited in Church, expecting them to bring their children to baptism and to come themselves to the Sacraments or to sermons. This was a serious mistake. We see now that the suburbs, deprived of churches and served by an insufficient number of priests, have become almost pagan; we must therefore act on the same lines as we should follow in a missionary country."

Having once grasped this fact, the Curé set to work with a will. Instead of waiting in dignified retirement for his parishioners to seek him, he went out to them and threw himself energetically into their life. Under his supervision social works were founded to care for their material and spiritual interests: professional schools for boys and girls, patronages, clubs, a savings bank, two free dispensaries, a people's office for gratuitous legal advice, confraternities and associations for working men, for mothers and young people; a local bulletin to record the events of the parish, and other institutions too numerous to mention, have grown up round the new Church of Our Lady of Labor.

When first l'Abbé Soulange-Bodin came to Plaisance, he was insulted in the streets. He quietly took his insult by the shoulders and sat him down on the pavement. This feat, he smilingly asserts, gained him the respect of certain parishioners, who esteemed physical strength and cool presence of mind above spiritual aspirations. At the end of a few years, he was the most popular man in the enormous, struggling, overgrown suburb; the friend and counsellor of his people; the fellow citizen, whom even those outside the Church's influence respected for his straightforward energy. He does not profess to have made Plaisance a city of saints; still it is a field sown with seeds of vigorous Christianity and bringing forth solid fruit. The Catholics not only hold their own: they slowly and steadily gain ground, in spite of Government opposition and of the influence of godless schools. M. l'Abbé Chaptal, a diplomat before becoming a priest, who was for many years M. Soulange-Bodin's right hand, takes his place as Curé of Plaisance.

The spiritual welfare of the Paris suburbs is very near the heart of the Archbishop, who considers the creation of new parishes in the suburbs, daily becoming more thickly populated, of the utmost importance. On May 1, a new parish was erected at Ivry Port and the Abbé Gonterot, trained under M. Soulange-Bodin, was appointed its pastor. Paris is now surrounded with a circle of these new parishes, generally begun in the utmost poverty, sometimes in the midst of opposition and ill will. But their priests have a missionary spirit and their lives, full of hard work, are brightened by many picturesque and pathetic incidents not found in the dignified and somewhat formal career of the Paris Curé of the olden time.

Mention was made in a previous letter of the mid-day missions established in many Paris churches for the working girls. A similar work for boys and young men has just been begun in the Church of St. Leu, in the heart of one of the busiest quarters of the city. A series of nine Conferences was given by a popular preacher on the prejudices and errors of the day with regard to Catholicism. The subject was essentially practical. The Paris workmen and apprentices comprehend it thoroughly, for they read and discuss the leading questions of the day with an enthusiasm which when rightly directed must become a powerful agent in the service of the Church.

The preacher at St. Leu succeeded in captivating them; his sermons were short, striking and to the point. This bold attempt was, on the whole, a success; but it required some courage. Moreover much tact and talent is needed to make the pleasure-loving Parisian youth sacrifice his mid-day recreation to listen to a sermon. Such conferences must be unusually attractive to be popular. The Paris workman, more perhaps than others, is open to intellectual influences, and he is, by nature, perilously impressionable. Hence, when led away by atheistical teachers, he develops a genius for evil which makes him far more powerful than the more stolid provincial. On the other hand, his natural intelligence, adaptability and love of the beautiful may be turned to good account once the abyss is bridged that separates him from the Church.

An idea has been started which, if carried out, may help towards this. It is proposed to concentrate the Catholic forces by the foundation in every town and village of parish houses which would be under the direction of laymen united by the common bond of their religious convictions irrespective of politics. All their social works would thus be centred under one roof and the parish house would become a stronghold of Catholicism and order, where advice and encouragement would be freely bestowed, where rich and poor would unite their efforts for the welfare of the community. Whether the idea thus started ever becomes a reality or not is uncertain, but it proves that the French Catholics have at last realized that during long years their divisions have served their enemies: they seem now to have grasped the fact that in union lies strength.

In a recent pastoral letter the Bishop of Bayeux informs his flock that the cause of a young Carmelite nun, lately dead, has been introduced with a view to her future beatification. Soeur Thérèse de l'Enfant Jesus, a native of Alençon, was born in 1873 and died in 1897 at the Carmelite Convent of Lisieux. Her life has been translated into several languages and has been received with enthusiasm outside her own country.

A Notable Anniversary

On last Saturday the clergy and laity of New York attended solemn services in St. Patrick's Cathedral, commemorative of the fortieth anniversary in the priesthood of Archbishop Farley. The heart of the venerable Metropolitan was touched by the general expression of attachment and high regard. The secular press of the city voiced the felicitations of his fellow citizens in recognition of the Archbishop's commanding influence in favor of the city's best progress. A princely gift of $300,000 was pledged by his people to relieve him of the remaining burden of debt incurred in beautifying the cathedral. Few dignitaries of the Church can look back over a career so uniformly useful and crowned with such success and blessing as that of Archbishop Farley. He has perfected a great system of parochial schools, and, by his tact and his conciliatory temper, which win souls sweetly without compromising truth, he has preserved a strong and vital unity in the vast and growing diocese committed to his care. Ad multos annos!

T. A. Daly

On last Wednesday Fordham University conferred the degree of Doctor of Literature upon one of her most distinguished sons. It is not often that a Catholic institution of learning has the opportunity of honoring a man who so adequately approximates to the ideal of a Catholic college graduate as in the case of Thomas A. Daly, the editor and manager of the Catholic Standard and Times. He has been a successful author and, what is rarer still, a successful Catholic journalist; but he has been more than these. With a recognized talent for popular writing of a high grade, which could command success in the most enviable quarters of the literary market-place, he planted his colors openly and proudly on the side of the Church that needs such defenders as he. Through the best years of his life, through the trying struggles which a man has to make to build up his home and to fend against the mischances of the future for himself and his family, Mr. Daly has clung loyally, in the face of tempting promises of greater success elsewhere, to the cause with which he had cast his literary fortunes in the days of his early manhood. It is hard to preserve an active allegiance to the Church in spite of failure and the absence of appreciation. It is harder still, we suspect, to do so in spite of dazzling success and general applause. And this is Mr. Daly's principal title to the respect and admiration of all who consider the Faith a Catholic's most precious inheritance, and active attachment to it the sign of a high ideal, of a strong mind and a pure heart.

Mr. Daly helps to carry on the tradition of Catholic literary excellence represented by the work of such laymen as John Boyle O'Reilly and James Jeffrey Roche. His ability as a poet and humorist has received the acknowledgment, which in the long run merit never lacks, from readers and critics of every class and belief. His humor is genial, refined, and, with all its wide popular appeal, disciplined. It never vulgarizes itself by buffoonery or by a forgetfulness of the sanctities of life. Mr. Daly belongs to that small class of Catholic writers who do not think that literary triumphs are too exquisite and rare to be wasted in Catholic causes. He does not write with one eye upon the tender susceptibilities of fastidious unbelievers.

As a practical man of affairs, Mr. Daly has earned rewards not less striking than those which have come to him as a poet. He has built up a great Catholic newspaper and achieved remarkable success in a field where many have failed. His experience would seem to disprove the contention which we so often hear that the Catholic press is neglected, and to indicate that when a layman of the right sort of capacity and energy, and with high qualities of mind and character, undertakes the editorship of a Catholic periodical, he will not inevitably fail to meet with appreciation and encouragement.

A Wasted Life

De mortuis nil nisi bonum, as all can see, is a principle which admits many exceptions. It often happens that the higher obligation of charity for the living compels one to put aside the inclination to say only pleasant things about the departed and to tell the plain truth. With regard to the late Goldwin Smith the newspapers have been governed exclusively by the principle we have quoted. Every notice of his life has been a pure eulogy. The enemy of our Faith has, as usual, received extravagant praise, to which we are bound to add a word of correction lest it should become a stumbling block to the weak.

Goldwin Smith received great intellectual gifts from God and a long life in which to use them. His first years at Oxford saw the great Tractarians driven forth from it. Happier in this than they, he was never driven out. A brilliant career opened before him which a fretful, impatient pride led him to sacrifice. He came to America and spent three years at Cornell University. Thence he retreated into Canada where he spent nearly forty years, the best part of what might have been a useful life, in virtual obscurity. He wrote a little it is true. From time to time also one saw his name at the end of letters to the newspapers, or came across his articles in the magazines. Still his influence was very slight, for God had destined him to greater things. But he would not have God in his life. Day by day he drifted farther from Him, and took up the clamor of the street against Him and His Church. At last the end came and he who might have gone forth from this world with full hands appeared before the judgment-seat of Christ with nothing gained by the many talents which had been entrusted to him. We cannot praise such a life. We may hope that at the last grace opened his eyes to his misery and that he departed with the publican's prayer on his lips: "God be merciful to me a sinner."

Religion in School Training

An argument that carries weight with many of the ardent advocates of religious training in our school system is the claim that the world is looking to the younger Democracy of the western hemisphere to solve the great social problems which confront mankind to-day. And these ardent advocates are by no means confined to the Catholic Church—though that body has borne the brunt of the struggle for religion in the schools when it seemed a forlorn hope. Times have changed, however, with the passing of the years and a vigorous defense of religious training has become the purpose of a splendidly organized Religious Educational Association whose membership is made up almost entirely of non-Catholics. Convinced that conditions which constitute a standing and alarming menace to our country not only in the future, but at the present can be warded off only through religious training, they are honestly and sincerely working to attain their purpose. Will they succeed in their efforts? Will America fulfil the expectation of the world if the future American is to grow up a de-Christianized soul? Serious questions these, when one recognizes the colossal strength of certain factors at play in the evolution of our school system in these latter days. The experience of other nations ought to be clear evidence of the folly of excluding church and religious influence from schools. Why then allow to grow up in our midst unchecked and almost unheeded a powerful influence whose basic law demands an absolute independence of schools from church control and direction? The conditions which obtain among us may make difficult for a time the solution of the problem of the imparting to children of the religious instruction which the parents desire. But the problem has its solution and it behooves the friends of religious training to come together and to find strength in united effort against those who would be guilty of robbing the growing child of what is the most vital and valuable of his possessions, his Christianity, and consequently, his whole basis of morality.

Gambling in Louisiana

When, after strenuous agitation the famous or infamous Louisiana Lottery was abolished, race-track gambling continued to flourish in New Orleans with full authority of law. Some two years ago the sentiment that had been growing against it among the best people of the city and State culminated in a movement which, largely owing to the influence of Archbishop Blenk, succeeded in wiping the laws that legalized gambling off the statute-books of Louisiana. There has sprung up lately a counter movement, directed by the gambling interest, to repeal the prohibition of two years ago or introduce such amendments as will nullify its purpose, on the ground that the abolition of gambling has been detrimental to the prosperity of New Orleans. Again the Archbishop enters protest and in a fashion that leaves slight prospect for the legalization of gambling in his archdiocese.

The first duty of legislators is to frame such laws as will guarantee freedom from vicious surroundings and associations and build up a healthy and moral citizenship. Race-track gambling thronged the streets and hotels of New Orleans with the most undesirable and demoralizing elements, and through city and State held up the god of chance before the eyes of the young. It was a greater curse than would be a yearly visitation of yellow fever. It made clean racing an impossibility. Its absence has proved not only a spiritual and moral but a real financial benefit. It is again promoted by a few that thrive on the shame and blood-money of the people. All loyal Catholics should rise up in united strength against the perpetration of this contemplated crime against their homes and children, the honor of their community and the decencies of life.

This scathing indictment of a practice, which is largely corrupt at its best and always corrupting in its consequences, has made the projected legislation impossible. The weighty words and prompt and vigorous action of his Grace of New Orleans will exercise a salutary, and often a much-needed influence, even beyond Louisiana.

The Police Memorial Service

A week or more ago an excellent opportunity was offered to the press of the country to prove its boasted readiness to deal equal justice to good and to bad. On Sunday, June 5, with the old "Draft-riot flag" borne proudly beside their own and the national colors at the head of the line, and the band of the department playing an inspiring march, two thousand stalwart New York policemen moved down Fifth avenue and into St. Patrick's Cathedral to assist at the annual memorial service for the departed heroes of the police force. The metropolitan papers duly chronicled the event, some of them rather sympathetically, but as one runs through the humble notices of the splendid object lesson the event portrayed, he is forced to mentally compare them with the elaborate display heads and full-page descriptive "write-ups" which these same papers would have given to the story of some big scandal in the police department chancing to come into the newspaper offices on a dull Sunday evening. The cosmopolitan wickedness of New York surely has its saving foil in Manhattan's peerless police force and Monsignor Lavelle struck the right note in his welcome to the men: "We recognize in you the guardians of the peace, order and prosperity of our great city. If you are conscientious, you are doing work along the same line as the Church. . . . You reach those who turn a deaf ear to our appeal—who transgress so seriously that they are a menace to the community and to the State. Your duty is fraught with pain yet rife with practical Christianity." Naturally His Grace, Archbishop Farley, presided at the impressive religious function, and as the voices of the three thousand men rang out in the solemn hymn of thanksgiving "Holy God, We Praise Thy Name," after the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, that venerable prelate's heart must have rejoiced to know that a large majority of the body of which New York is justly proud, are devout members of the Church.

The Unjust School Tax

Writing to the Editor of the Catholic Standard and Times of Philadelphia regarding the question of the University of Pennsylvania scholarships discussed in our educational column last week, the well-known publicist, Martin I. J. Griffin, calls attention to a detail of public school financing ordinarily not heeded by Catholics, and yet involving a policy to be remembered when we discuss the injustice Catholics endure in the present school tax methods. "Do you know," said Mr. Griffin, "that all the children of school age—6 to 16—are counted, Catholics included. The number is reported to the State. The State then pays the school district a pro rata for school purposes. That is then used for the public schools. So that Catholics are not only supporting their own schools and paying taxes to support the public schools, but the public schools are getting the pro rata paid by the State for the Catholic children counted, but taught in our parochial schools." We recall a clash with an enumerator who insisted upon having a list of names and addresses of the students of a Catholic High School in order that he might hand in a big list of children of school age and help increase the pro rata allowance in his district. An allowance in such a case surely based on false pretenses!

A Catholic Central Association

The Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin of June 6 makes editorial reference to a project, recently launched by Archbishop Messmer of that city, which involves a manner of activity in Catholic circles that promises excellent results. His Grace proposes to organize among Catholics associations responding in their aims to the Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Woman's Christian Association. The utility of these two bodies in extending the influence of the churches and promoting Christian living has long been recognized. Great good unquestionably has been effected by them through the facilities they provide of recreation, study and social intercourse for young men and women, while surrounding their beneficiaries with good moral influences. Unhappily because of their Protestant origin and character Catholics may not allow themselves to be drawn into intimate relations with either of these two associations, although Catholic laymen, appreciating the good features of the work they are doing, have in many instances lent them support in money and personal encouragement. For years there has been growing in Catholic circles a feeling that Catholic organizations having similar purposes and methods would benefit thousands who are not and may not be beneficiaries of these two bodies under their present auspices. In accord with the sentiment a meeting was recently held in Milwaukee, to which Archbishop Messmer lent not only his sanction but his presence and assistance, and a plan was broached and preliminary steps were taken to organize a Catholic Central Association whose activities will parallel those of the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. The enthusiasm manifested during the meeting augurs well for the success of the project, and the energy shown in other enterprises undertaken by Archbishop Messmer for the interests of the Church gives one confidence that the proposed organization will speedily accomplish results which will reflect credit upon all those who help it into existence and contribute to its maintenance and progress.

The Living Church tells us that a certain Italian minister hitherto working with the Presbyterians, has applied to the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Marquette for ordination, and that he will probably take up work among his own people who are said to want the Catholic Church without the Pope. In the same issue of the same periodical one may read the address of Bishop Atwill to his diocesan convention of Kansas City. It is rather melancholy in its tone and the Bishop does not seem to allude to the so-called Italian congregation of St. John the Baptist which passed some time ago from the "Roman obedience" to his own. It would be only Christian charity to let the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Marquette know the history of the Kansas City congregation since that passage which was announced with much flourishing of trumpets. Will the Living Church publish it?

MUSIC IN IRELAND

Ireland's annual musical festival, the Feis Ceoil, went off this May with a success which was decided and cheering. In the number of solo entries and the attendance at the competition a record was established. Against this may be set off a slight falling away in the quantity and quality of choral work presented. As to the comparative successes of town and country, this year marks a slight but decided gain of the provinces upon the Dublin monopoly. Choirs from Newry, Sligo, Bangor and Thomastown gave a good account of themselves, while the gold medal for tenor solo singing was carried off by a young amateur from Valencia Island, Mr. Edmond O'Sullivan.

More remarkable perhaps than the Feis Ceoil week has been the week of Irish opera, which followed it. Mr. Robert O'Dwyer's "Eithne" was first heard last autumn at the Oireachtas, when it was an unquestioned success; the performance, however, being by no means ideal, a more satisfactory rendering was eagerly looked forward to, and this has now been secured.

A complete original opera with its text in the Irish language is a novelty striking enough to merit attention, even were its music of no special value. "Eithne," however, has won the applause of the best judges as a remarkable and pleasing work of art. It manifests considerable power of melodic creation, command of the resources of harmony and instrumentation, aptness of dramatic expression and a genial skill in working up fine ensemble effects. A study of the first act will fully prove Mr. O'Dwyer's possession of these gifts. Everywhere we feel the thoroughly competent musician, though there may be room for more developed and easy power; frequently do we acknowledge the presence of something greater than mere musicianship—of feeling, imagination, intentiveness.

If we proceed to Act II we find the same gifts manifested in new and perhaps more popular ways—at least all goes well until we reach the last scene or two, in which the composer's inspiration somewhat falls off. A danger seems to haunt the musician—a danger not always escaped by the very greatest—of writing himself out during the course of a long work, and rushing on to its conclusion, while inspiration lags behind. Is there not something of this in the "Elijah," in "The Messiah," in "The Creation," not to mention many an opera? Often, alas, it is the sheer necessities of the day and the hour, of bread and taxes, that turn the Mozart or the Schubert, as well as the Schiller or the Shakespeare, into Art's mere sweating journeyman.

However, as regards "Eithne," the end did not fall short of other parts in the power of capturing applause. All sections of the work appeal at least to some tastes. There is something for the severe, something for the frivolous, something for the national enthusiast, something for the connoisseur, who, Bacon-like, takes all music for his province. There is a good deal of Irish coloring in turns of phrase and scale effects—markedly in some sections, hardly at all in others. There are traces of Wagner's influence in a use (not very extensive) of leading themes, and in the harmonic subtleties of orchestral and choral writing always careful and sometimes very elaborate.

Finally there are many suggestions of Verdi, and perhaps of Balfe, in climaxes and bravura effects which might seem a little trivial to a high-and-dry critic of German predilections. This eclecticism of style may (and we hope will) prove a transient phase, leading the composer into a future style of more firmly compact individuality. But meantime its effect on the hearers is quite pleasant.

The composer has not been very happily guided in his choice of a story. It is a romantic fairy legend from Ireland's pagan past, but it rather lacks coherence and unity. It lends itself to mere picturesque scenic effects, but not to moments of dramatic fervor. The Irish and English texts call for no particular commendation. But textual weakness counts, after all, for but little in an opera. The world, we fancy, has long ago resigned itself to libretto shortcomings as more or less inevitable.

During its week at the Gaiety Theatre, the reception of "Eithne" was uniformly enthusiastic. The composer had repeatedly to express his acknowledgments. Unfortunately, the number of those who neglected to attend was unduly large, so that at the end of the week Mr. O'Dwyer had to announce a loss to his own pocket of nearly £200. This is a deplorable consummation to a record of the toils of genius. At this rate of encouragement Ireland can hardly look forward to the appearance on her stage of many more Irish operas. Numerous explanations have been suggested, but they are not very satisfactory. The most valid appears to be the unfortunate incidence of the King's death, and the consequent lack of Viceregal patronage. One might have believed, however, that there was in the country a force or collection of forces sufficient to secure, without the smiles of Dublin Castle, the success of a work which does honor to Irish music and the Irish language. The Irish revival is to be credited with the birth of "Eithne;" must we suppose it incapable of nurturing its children after they are born?

Whatever may be the answer to those questions, it is to foreign lands and to the Gael in exile that Mr. O'Dwyer, supported by Mr. Joseph O'Mara and other admirers, now looks for solace and reimbursement. There are good hopes of a prosperous coming-out in London. It is extremely to be desired that the great cities of the United States, especially wherever things redolent of Ireland find strongest support, may soon have opportunities of judging for themselves of the value and interest of "Eithne." We have little doubt that every adequate performance will multiply by hundreds its admirers—those who will judge this work to be not inferior to anything in the range of musical drama ever achieved by an Irishman.

LITERATURE

The History of French Literature. By ANNIE LEMP KONTA. New York: D. Appleton & Company.

A sturdy volume of 560 pages, covering the fascinating story of French literature from the Oath of Strasburg in 842 to Edmond Rostand's "Chantecler." With commendable directness, without preface or introduction, the author immediately attacks her subject and pursues it steadily and vigorously to the end. The appended Bibliography includes the names of 150 authors and a list of about 200 books bearing on the various aspects of the theme. We are a little astonished to see no direct reference to the monumental "Histoire Littéraire de la France," begun by the learned Benedictines of St. Maur.

Thanks to Mrs. Konta's rapid pen the great figures in this new "Panathenaic" procession file briskly past the reviewing stand, some it is true, mere silhouettes, others with form and features sharply defined. Now and then the ranks are a little packed; here and there a figure might have been dropped out. But generally due proportion and balance have been kept. A few familiar faces are missing. Chancellor d'Aguesseau does not appear; yet his "Mercuriales" are sufficiently original to secure him a place among these worthies. Vauvenargues, the author of "Maximes et Réflexions," is absent. He ought to walk side by side with La Rochefoucauld and Joubert. We look in vain for the scholarly Ozanam. His "Civilisation du Cinquième Siècle" entitled him to a place. We cannot find Count Franz de Champagny, the author of "Rome et la Judée," "Les Césars," etc.

Louis Veuillot, whom Mrs. Konta rightly calls the "great editor" of the Univers, deserved fuller treatment. There is a brief reference to one of his pamphlets, but nothing is said of his novels and correspondence. The great Catholic writer and orator, Montalembert, gets but a line; so too, Lacordaire. Yet the Dominican's pulpit eloquence was as epoch-making as "Le Génie du Christianisme" of Chateaubriand. Berryer is omitted altogether; yet France has few parliamentary orators equal to him. Not a word is said of the eloquence of Fathers de Ravignan and Monsabré; nothing of Paul Féval and Armand de Pontmartin. Cardinal Pie, Bishops Dupanloup and Freppel do not appear. The work of these men measures up fully to that of dozens of authors spoken of by the writer.

In the grouping of her figures and the disposition of her material Mrs. Konta is orderly; the presentation of her facts, with the exceptions noted and perhaps one or two more, as full as the limits of her book would allow. With many of her appreciations we heartily agree. The chapters on the "Epics," "The Fabliaux," "The Theatre of the Middle Ages," "The French Press," will be read with interest. This last chapter will prove a surprise to American readers. Mrs. Konta speaks with sincere admiration of Corneille and Racine. Bossuet is treated with sympathy, but does not stand out large and bold in his really noble proportions.

Our author usually has a word of reproof for the coarse and immoral wherever found, as, for instance, in Zola and Béranger. But in speaking of La Fontaine's "Contes," she makes some slight attempt to excuse them. Excused they cannot be. Brunetière calls them "une œuvre malsaine." They exceed in obscenity their model, Boccaccio's "Decameron." The police of Louis XIV had to suppress them. We agree with all that our critic says of Molière's talent. She should have added that Molière too often laughs at the idea of authority and restraint. We are willing to grant that Voltaire did now and then strike a blow for political and social reform. But the sordid immorality of his life, so dismally mirrored in his pages, his treacherous attacks on all that Christians hold sacred, the dull, hopeless void his sarcasm and his sneer have made in the hearts of thousands, will not allow us to call him, with Mrs. Konta, one of the benefactors of humanity. Benefactors of humanity are made of sounder stuff. Their work is constructive: Voltaire's life-task was to destroy. He has blasted the faith of thousands. What did he give instead? Carlyle may not have been altogether wrong when he said that in Voltaire he had looked in vain for a great thought. The unfortunate Louis XVI had some reason to exclaim, as he pointed to the works of Rousseau and Voltaire: "These two men have ruined France."

In speaking of the Catholic Church, Mrs. Konta has tried to be impartial and fair. Had she gone directly to Catholic sources she would have avoided some mistakes. We instance one. In the second note on p. 115, referring to the Great Schism of the West, she asserts there were "several popes at the same time in Avignon and in Rome." This, we say it in all courtesy, is an error. There were several claimants to the papal throne, and the question was: "Who was the real pope." Neither the claimants themselves nor Christendom at large believed for a moment that there were or could be two or more popes. Every intelligent Catholic knew then as he knows now that the papal prerogatives and power are vested in one single individual.

On page 344 we find an historical error of another kind. "Finally, Malfilâtre and Gilbert were—like Chatterton in England and Calderon in Spain—young poets consumed by misery before their genius had fully ripened." Calderon was eighty-one years old when he died. His powers had reached maturity: 120 comedies and 70 or 80 "autos" sufficiently prove it. His name cannot be coupled in this instance with that of Chatterton.

The appendix contains two lists, one of the Forty Immortals of the French Academy, and one of the Rulers of France from Clovis to Pres. Fallières. There is also a good Index.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

Nathan Burke. By MARY S. WATTS. New York: The MacMillan Co.

After Thackeray, DeMorgan; after DeMorgan, Mrs. Watts. These two successors of Thackeray will not let the old tradition of the three-decker die. Mr. DeMorgan is something garrulous: He goes on refining to an inordinate degree. Instead of moralizing, however, he sometimes (if one may twist a word out of its ordinary meaning) demoralizes. He is an apostle of doubt. We are here, we know not why, and we are going, we know not whither. A style, no matter how cheerful, cannot, when it conveys such news, exhilarate the reader. In fact pessimism and agnosticism are closely related; and in their presence mirth and humor creep on a broken wing. It is regrettable that Mrs. Watts should here and there give utterance to sentiments which are almost frankly agnostic. They add nothing to the book and are, to say the least, depressing in their effect. Surely the gifted author could change all this, and so make her book available to a larger audience.

Nathan Burke is a remarkable novel. It is big, it is spacious. Wit, humor and keen characterization are found in every chapter. History, too, plays its part. The Mexican war is presented to us in splendid and vivid narration. Mrs. Ducey is a portraiture worthy of Dickens. Her graceless son recalls Thackeray. Jim Sharples is an unusually good type of the literary Bohemian. He is lovable, masculine, and yet, save in one passage of questionable taste, gifted with a woman's delicate intuition.

Nathan Burke tells the story. He does it well and modestly. And yet, despite his modesty, he is the hero to the end. When all is said, the book, if not great, comes little short of greatness. Men and women and life are put before us in a manner that is at once large and minute. Would that the author had more faith! Her wit, then, would have an additional lustre: her humor a sunnier charm.

F. J. FINN, S.J.

Hiawatha's Black-Robe. By E. LEAHY. Dublin: Catholic Truth Society of Ireland (Iona Series). St. Louis: Herder. 35 cents.

A recent writer remarks, apropos of another volume of the Iona Series, that owing to the utilitarian spirit now so widely prevalent the general tendency in literature is to cut away from beauty of form and seek success by paying routes. It is remarkable that in Catholic literature the general tendency for a decade or two is rather in the opposite direction. It used to be said that our literary output was inferior to secular productions, excellence of matter often painfully contrasting with slovenliness of dress. The Bellocs and Meynells, Fathers Sheehan, Benson and Barry, John Ayscough and the late Francis Thompson, are among the names that occur to one of recent Catholic writers who have followed the route of literary beauty and, incidentally, found fair reward at the stopping-places. Dr. Sheehan's books, it is reported, are the most sought for in London libraries. This would seem to indicate that beauty of form is, after all, a paying route, and its rarity is due less to commercialism than to a cynical and sceptical atmosphere destructive of that subtle spiritual charm whose touch is the seal of beauty.

"Hiawatha's Black-Robe" (the life, deeds and after-story of Father James Marquette, S.J.) is a little book, handsome inside and out, that combines the literary and spiritual touch.

The native Indian, savage and Christian, of three hundred years ago; the young Marquette, noble of character and blood; the Christ-inspired zeal of the explorer; his sweet humility and generous, unwearied toil for souls whether in acquiring a dozen dialects or teaching Christ to chief and child or bending to the oar for a thousand leagues along the Great Lakes, down the Wisconsin and Mississippi and back to the mouth of the Marquette, where, like Xavier on a deserted shore, this pure, apostolic spirit journeyed to its eternal home,—all are pictured with a charm of style and spiritual grace that make "Hiawatha's Black-Robe" a fascinating story for old or young. The author shows intimate knowledge of the diverse scenes and routes and the literature of his subject. The history of city, state and national tributes to Marquette in speech and frieze and statuary is well told, as is the explanation of Longfellow's debt to the missionary's Journal. The book in every sense is good literature, and we reciprocate the author's farewell to his readers:

"Peace be with you and your people,
Peace of prayer and peace of pardon
Peace of Christ and Joy of Mary."

It is not wise to judge a book by its price. Frequent and Daily Communion, by REV. JOSEPH McDONNELL, S.J. (Dublin: The Irish Messenger Office), is a penny booklet, by post five cents. Its forty-eight well-printed pages contain 20,000 words, and not one of them is wasted. We do not wonder it has quickly reached the fortieth thousand. It explains the Decree on Frequent Communion, illustrating its salient points from Scripture, the Fathers and Church history; also the decrees on Communion of children and the sick, and the attached indulgences. The summary of the effects of Holy Communion on soul and body, and the answers to objections urged against its frequency are sound, simple and satisfying. We heartily commend this booklet to Catholics, especially to priests and teachers, and with it Father McDonnell's other penny publications from the same office: The First Fridays, Our Lady, St. Joseph, The Holy Hour, The Bona Mors, Tales of the Blessed Sacrament (2), Daily Mass, Footprints of Ireland's Saints (12), Young Jesuit Saints (3), Great Irishmen (6), Our Lady's Album, etc. Several have been collected into bound volumes, at from ten to fifty cents, and have gone through many editions. The Irish Messenger and its cheap but valuable publications are doing good service for Catholic truth.

Il Giornalismo Cattolico. Criteri e Norme. 1910. Stabilimento Cromotipico. Torino: P. Celanza e C.

The anonymous Jesuit author of this booklet of 102 pages explains the criteria and principles of Catholic journalism in nine conversations between Don Eusebio, an elderly, prudent and learned Catholic, and his two clever nephews, Alessandro, an engineer, and Mario, a lawyer. The objections of these young men are real difficulties which every truly Catholic journalist has frequently to overcome. Don Eusebio never shirks the objection and always gives a satisfactory and complete answer. He of course condemns ambiguous and equivocal language in matters of faith, comparing those Catholic writers who avoid nothing but downright heresy, while they welcome rash, scandalous and false views, to men who avoid only the poisons that cause sudden death while they steadily undermine their health and shorten their lives by excesses. The delicate question whether able anti-Christian writers should ever be praised for their style is well handled. Praise begets admiration and a consequent tendency to condone errors. To deny evident skill would be unjust, but there may be no necessity of alluding to such writers at all. In this we are justified in taking a leaf from the anti-Catholic school which observes a strict conspiracy of silence with regard to incomparable Catholic authors. If this little book were translated into English it would make many Catholic journalists sit up and take notice.

The Light of His Countenance. By JEROME HARTE. New York: Benziger Bros.

This is a story of the Christian persecutions in the second century of the Christian era. The author has a fairly good story to tell; but he makes a serious mistake. He has deliberately chosen to conduct all the conversation in what might be called Scriptural style. Thou and thy are so plentiful that it is extremely difficult to find a single you in the whole story. It were safer had the author played with fire; for he apparently knows little of the grammatical rules which hedge in this form of speech. Hence we read "There hath been murmurings." Again, he makes they and ye do service in the same paragraph when the speaker is addressing two persons. Again we have "Thy and Merope hath now abjured." A number of other such constructions might be quoted; and it is hard to read them with an equal mind. Mr. Harte is much better when he writes in the language of the present century. His idiom and grammar, then, are good enough for the practical purpose of narration. As to the grammatical derangements of the dialogue, one is surprised that any proofreader should let them pass uncorrected. The book, we regret to say, is not up to the high standard of Catholic fiction which the Benziger Brothers have been recently offering the public.

Principles of Political Economy. By JOHN STUART MILL. London, New York, etc.: Longmans, Green & Co. Handbook of Political Economics. By J. SCHRIJVERS, C.S.S.R. Translated from the French by F. M. CAPES. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.35.

With regard to the first of these it is enough to say that it is edited and supplemented with an introduction by W. J. Ashley, Professor of Commerce in the University of Birmingham, who contributes not a few useful notes. Of course, we differ almost toto coelo with Mill, nevertheless our economists cannot get on without his work, an authoritative exposition of a school which practically formed the opinions of the commercial and industrial world of the second half of the nineteenth century and still has many disciples.

The second book is an English translation of a work popular in Belgium. As Political Economy is far from being an exact science, one cannot expect to find a treatise with which he will agree entirely. If a Catholic author follows the lines laid down by Leo XIII in his encyclicals, as of course the author of this book does, he must be allowed freedom in working out details. Hence we abstain from mentioning several matters which we do not view as he does. We may observe, however, that business men will usually judge such a book as this from its treatment of things with which they are familiar. These will find chapter II unsatisfactory, first, because it shows the author to be lacking in practical experience in financial and banking operations; second, things there said, though true of Belgium, are not always true of England and the United States. It would have added much to the book to have had this chapter carefully revised by a capable business man. Nevertheless, it will prove in good hands a very useful elementary text book.

LIBRARY NOTES

Librarians and library workers in various parts of the country are now turning their eyes in the direction of Mackinac Island where, from June 30 to July 6, will be held the annual conference of the American Library Association. The natural charms of the spot may prove so attractive as to divide the attention of even conscientious librarians assembled to derive such profit as they may from listening to papers upon professional topics and some may "cut" a paper occasionally to take a stroll to Arch Rock, Sugar Loaf or Fort Holmes, in the cool air for which the Island is famous. But the program as announced in the current number of the Bulletin of the Association presents for consideration many subjects of importance in the ever-widening scope of library activities.

The first session will be occupied with the President's address, in which is usually given a rapid survey of the progress of the past year; this will be followed by a paper upon Michigan history and legends, and by Michigan songs, presumably folk-songs. Another paper will be upon the deterioration of the paper used in newspapers, a topic which has been up for discussion for many years but has never led to any material improvement of the stock of paper upon which newspapers are printed.

Forty years ago Dr. Justin Winsor, then librarian of the Boston Public Library, called the attention of publishers to the rapid disintegration of newspapers when exposed to sunshine, and to their equal liability to injury from dampness, and suggested that a special edition of every newspaper should be printed daily upon a better quality of paper. Dr. Winsor pointed out the value of newspapers as contemporary records of the nation's doings, and as passing pictures of its daily life; he claimed that, in their way, they are of inestimable value to the historian, and when lost their loss is irreparable. But his appeal fell upon deaf ears; to issue a library edition would entail too much trouble and expense to be considered by the publishers. It is to be hoped that the forthcoming reopening of the question will lead to some practical results.

Popularizing agricultural literature is another topic to be discussed by representatives of the agricultural colleges, which are now for the first time given special recognition on the program of the association. The Department of Agriculture at Washington has for many years been issuing and distributing literature relating to better and more economical methods of cultivation; it is now proposed to reach individual farmers through agricultural societies and clubs, granges, rural schools, and especially through traveling libraries of books upon agriculture. The same means will also be employed, no doubt, to furnish the farmer wholesome reading along general lines,

Mackinac Island is now noted chiefly as a summer resort, but it has a history replete with associations for the Catholic. On this island in 1670 Father Dablon established the Jesuit Mission of St. Ignace. Finding the extent of the island too small to furnish sufficient cornfields for all his converts, and incommoded by separation from the mainland, where lay the field of much of his spiritual labors, Father Dablon in 1671 moved the Mission to Point St. Ignace, on the north shore of the straits, where for forty years the Jesuits maintained a chapel which was the centre of mission work among the aborigines scattered through the immense wilderness of the Northwest. From this spot in the spring of 1673 Father Marquette and Louis Joliet departed upon their memorable voyage of discovery to the Mississippi River; and here at the Franciscan Mission of today rests part of the bones of the great missionary.

We have spoken above regarding recent modes of reaching special classes of readers, such as farmers. Another class of readers to be served are school children. The ordinary catalogue, or finding list, of a public library is unsuitable as a guide for children's reading. The alphabetical or topical arrangement of the titles permits of no grading of the books according to their relative interest to children of differing ages. To meet this need many public libraries have issued special graded lists of books intended for children's reading or for use in the schools. Thirty-five out of forty-five libraries answering AMERICA's query upon this point, replied that they have prepared special lists of books suitable for school children.

The Class-room List, issued by the Buffalo Public Library in April, 1909, is an especially instructive example of such a list. It is a book of 166 pages; the titles are grouped in nine sections corresponding to the school grades for which the books are especially suitable. Author and subject indexes furnish convenient guides to all the titles in the list, and there are three supplementary sections, entitled "Reference Books," "Stories About Children for Teachers and Parents," "Poetry About Children for Teachers and Parents." A finding list of this kind is a source of relief and pleasure to the teacher who must select books for the class-room or is called upon to aid pupils in selecting books for home reading. The Catholic teacher should, of course, be careful to see that none of the books drawn from such a list are harmful to the children in any way. If a list of the Catholic authors to be found at the local library has been compiled, this list may usefully be supplemented by a graded school list; the one being a guide to the desired authors and the other a guide to the desired grade.

Mr. W. E. Foster, of the Providence Public Library, whose carefully prepared replies to our queries have been quoted before, writes in regard to supplying special lists of books for schools: "If requested to do so, we are glad to do so. Usually, however, the selection is made by some one outside of the library force, and this seems to be a more satisfactory way. In other words, we recognize the fact that the teachers, parents and pastors of these children have definite preferences as to the reading of the children, and we wish to have these preferences respected and even safeguarded. Not only do we not wish the library to be in any sense an agency for winning these children to other beliefs, but we do not wish even to seem to make it so." The libraries will in most cases supply lists of books specially adapted for children's reading; but the Catholic teacher has responsibilities in the matter which the library cannot be expected to assume.

EDUCATION

The third annual Commencement of the Fordham University School of Law was held at the Theatre of the University, Fordham, on June 11th, at 3 p.m. The degree of Bachelor of Law was conferred upon thirty-two candidates.

The honors of the graduating class were won by William Hayes, whose standing for the three years of his course was 96 per cent. The scholarship in the Master of Laws course hereafter to be established was awarded ex aequo to Arthur D. Fisher and William Hayes. Ignatius L. M. Wilkinson was awarded the scholarship in the second year class for the highest standing in the work of the first year. Paul Fuller, LL.D., Dean of the Law School, presided at the exercises, and addresses were made by Rev. Daniel J. Quinn, S.J., President of the University, by Robert N. King, A.B., of the graduating class, on "Overcapitalization of Corporations," and by John N. Scelsa, A.B., another of the graduates on "National Incorporation."

The address to the graduates was delivered by Hon. William McAdoo, formerly Police Commissioner, Member of Congress from New Jersey and Assistant Secretary of the Navy, who gave the graduates his views on the duties of lawyers and courts to the public, and illustrated many of his remarks with anecdotes from his own experiences in his life both private and public. Many members of the judiciary and men prominent in other walks of life attended the exercises.

This Commencement of the Law School once more brings to our minds the remarkable growth of this Law School, as shown by the increased graduation each year. Thirty-two graduates this year as compared with sixteen last year and six the first year show how great the growth of the school has been. This growth is due in great measure to the excellent course given by the school, the high ideals of both Faculty and student body and to the convenient hours and the location of the school. The school is located in the Evening Post Building, 20 Vesey Street, within a block of the Subway, Hudson Tunnels, the Elevated Railroad, and three minutes' walk of all ferries. It is also within five minutes' walk of the Supreme, Surrogates' and Federal Courts. The hours of the school, 4.15 to 6.15 p.m., are an inducement to young men who desire to work in law offices at the same time as they attend law school. At the Fordham Law School a student can combine theory with practice by working in a law office during the day, and in the afternoon attending the classes of the Law School.

A special report issued by the Carnegie Foundation on the medical schools of the country is exceedingly severe in its strictures. For twenty-five years, it claims, there has been an enormous overproduction of ill-trained doctors because of the existence of independent or proprietary schools, commercially managed and dependent on fees for support. The report affirms that of the 155 medical schools now existing in the country only one-fifth are needed, and, in the spirit of opposition which the Foundation shows to "small colleges" generally, it insinuates that only the bona fide university department schools can expect to survive.

Existing schools are criticized, some for lack of high entrance requirements and consequent low grade general scholarship on the part of the students admitted; many are not equipped with the necessary laboratories; and a not inconsiderable percentage are deficient in the hospital and clinical facilities suitable medical training requires. The report has aroused a storm of protest among the heads of medical schools in Chicago, its reference to these being particularly sharp and caustic. Indeed the report puts the ban of its displeasure not alone on ten undergraduate medical schools of that city, but upon the Illinois State Board of Health as well. James A. Egan, secretary of this latter body, roundly denounces the statements contained in the report.

He says: "The report of the Carnegie Foundation calls for but little attention from the people of Illinois. It evidences a lack of knowledge on the part of those by whom it was prepared, of the legal requirements in Illinois and the rules and regulations of the State Board of Health. It betrays a deplorable ignorance as to what constitutes a medical college. This is shown by the reference to an osteopathic institution which is not a medical college and has never been recognized by the State Board of Health. The charges as to the connivance of the State Board of Health with certain medical colleges are not only groundless but are also maliciously false. The inspections of the Illinois medical colleges were made for the Carnegie Foundation by a gentleman who is not a physician, and who, so far as I have been able to learn, does not possess the qualifications enabling him to intelligently determine whether a medical college is adequately equipped to teach medicine."

Loyola University, the institution incorporated in succession to St. Ignatius College by the Jesuits of Chicago a year ago, received $195,000 in gifts last week. Of this $135,000 was given by Mrs. Henri F. DeJonghe, a member of the new Jesuit parish of that city, and $60,000 was pledged by the members of the Bennett Medical College, one of the professional schools of the University. The gift of Mrs. DeJonghe, bestowed because of the interest she takes in the progress of the Jesuit institution, is to be devoted to new buildings and other improvements for the University. An administration building will be erected at Sheridan Road and Devon Avenue, a school building will be added to the parish equipment and some scholarships will be created. The medical school will use the fund donated by the members of the school faculty for enlarging its buildings.

Mayor Seidel, of Milwaukee, who has disappointed the expectations of the many who predicted an administration of "fads" following the Socialist victory which placed him in power, is not always entirely practical in his suggestions. Recently he urged those concerned to compete with the nickel theatres by introducing moving pictures into the schools. With the picture lanterns, he declared, lessons in history and geography might be vivified with moving pictures cast upon a screen. The great complaint, he went on to say, with our schools to-day is that they fail to hold the interest of the children, and that the latter slip away from school attendance just as fast as the law allows. It is to be feared that Milwaukee's Mayor in this little talk forgot the lesson of his own life of hard discipline. Is it a real kindness to school children to try to attract them by removing all that is difficult from the school routine in order to make school hours a round of easy, pleasant experiences? It is singular that in a time of feverish effort for high educational development, the activity of school authorities should be directed so commonly to a line of least resistance for pupils, one involving no strain on the mental powers. There are old-fashioned people who still believe that the self-denying drill in the little hardships of the school-room is the feature of school training productive of best results in the education of children.

Rev. M. O'Flanagan, of the Diocese of Elphin, having completed his visit to the United States in the interest of the Irish lace and cottage industries, has returned to Ireland. He visited and organized exhibitions of lace and other Irish school and cottage industries in over fifty cities, with the result that they are now on sale and appreciated in every city of importance. More than a million people visited the exhibitions, and the annual sales of this class of Irish goods in the United States now exceed $500,000. The actual profits made by the two Irish girls whom Father O'Flanagan brought over to exhibit their work have enabled him to pay off the debt on the Convent Industrial School, Loughglyn, County Roscommon, where they were trained, and erect additions for the development of the work. The exhibitors have also returned to Ireland.

SOCIOLOGY

The Smithsonian Institution has published a brief monograph by Captain Ferdinand Schmitter of the Medical Corps, U. S. Army, on the native customs of the Indians of the Upper Yukon. He tells us that formerly these people lived in tents of skins, but have now taken to log cabins, always ill-ventilated and dirty. The Bellevue Hospital has issued the annual report of its Tuberculosis Clinic. The reading is interesting, but for a layman the pictures are still more so. Several of these illustrate the roof-cure and show consumptive patients living night and day, summer and winter, in the heat and in the snow, on the roof, with only a small shelter tent between them and the sky. The comparison is instructive. The Indians who have abandoned their tents for huts that reproduce the unsanitary conditions of the worst tenements have become most susceptible to pulmonary complaints. Our tenement people, under the pure-air treatment the Indians once enjoyed, are gaining strength to resist its infection.

In one of the sessions of the fiftieth convention of the United States Brewers' Association, held in Washington last week, a Cincinnati delegate, in an address on the effects of prohibition, made a startling statement. He said that while 38,000,000 people have been put under prohibitory legislation of some or other kind during the past fifteen years, the consumption of whiskey in that period had increased 50 per cent. and the per capita consumption of beer more than 46 per cent.

ECONOMICS

The production of the principal wheat-growing countries in 1909 was as follows: Russia, 786 million bushels; United States, 715 million; France, 361 million; British India, 253 million; Canada, 166 million; Italy, 155 million; Spain, 144 million; Germany, 138 million; Argentina, 133 million. Thus, of the nations virtually self-supporting, France produced 9.26 bushels per head of population; the United States, 8.12; Spain, 7.66; Russia, 5.17; Italy, 5.09. The domestic consumption in Russia, however, is comparatively small and it is a large exporter. Germany produced only 2.16 bushels per head; and India, about 1 bushel. It must be remarked that in India only the people of the Northern Provinces use wheat, those of the South living chiefly on rice. Of the countries raising wheat for export, Canada produced 30.91 bushels per head of population; and Argentina, 21.45. Great Britain, the chief importing country, produced 67 million bushels or 1.51 per head of population. From these figures it is not difficult to judge how near the United States is approaching the limit of an exporting country.

During the winter months in Alaska gold mining is kept up. The pay dirt, however, is not washed until the return of spring gives a supply of water. This washing, by which the gold is separated from the clay containing it, is called the spring clean-up. At Nome it is expected to produce this year $1,175,000, and at the new fields of Innoko and Iditarod, $1,250,000. There is quite a rush of miners to these districts. The steamer Victoria, well known forty years ago in New York as the Parthia of the Cunard Line, has left Seattle for Nome with over five hundred passengers bound for them. Other steamers are sailing with large passenger lists.

The total trade of Great Britain with foreign countries during 1909 was £811,106,552. That of the British colonies with foreign countries was £283,123,571, and with Great Britain, £272,490,013. The total trade of the Empire, therefore, excluding intercolonial trade, was £1,366,720,136, of which over 40 per cent. was connected with the colonies.

The Bureau of Commerce notes the general increase in the value of international commerce. While admitting some increase in the quantity of merchandise exchanged, it points out, as AMERICA has already done, that the increase in value is chiefly due to enhanced prices.

SCIENCE

Astronomers are still at work investigating the possible absorption of light in space, which would, if it really exists, effectually prevent our seeing stars beyond a certain distance, and thus arriving at any knowledge concerning the size and shape of the universe.

In continuation of what was said in AMERICA (Vol. I, No. 4, and Vol. II, Nos. 19 and 24), we read in the Astronomische Nachrichten No. 4411 (May 12, 1910), a very technical article on "Beiträge zum Nordmann-Tikhoffschen Phänomen," by Adolf Hnatek, of Vienna, which the author concludes in these words:

"At all events the problem does not seem to have entered upon that phase in which a material increase of accuracy may soon be expected. . . . Thus much, however, seems very probable even at present, that an eventual dispersion of light can hardly be sought for in space itself, because as long as the observed facts are based upon the presence of gaseous masses which must, if homogeneous, be under the measurable pressure of at least several millimeters, so long the theoretical and even the actual behavior of these gases will give rise to serious doubts."

In the April number of the Astrophysical Journal, G. C. Comstock dissents from Kapteyn's conclusions in the issue of the preceding November (See AMERICA, Vol. I, No. 4, p. 107). After quoting the two sentences: "There is thus no reason for the supposition that the selective loss of light is different for galactic and extragalactic regions. In particular we cannot explain the greater richness in stars of the Milky Way by a smaller space absorption for, if anything, this absorption is greater there than elsewhere." He says: "This result is obtained from a discussion of the discordances between the Harvard star magnitudes photographically and visually derived, and rests upon the assumption that if there be a sensible space absorption its effect must be apparent in a difference between the photographic and visual magnitudes, which difference will systematically increase with increasing distance of the stars observed."

He says that stars of equal magnitudes, whether in the Milky Way or out of it, are probably at the same distance from us, and that therefore no conclusion can be drawn from their position in the galaxy. He ends: "Whatever probative force the data may possess tends away from rather than toward Kapteyn's conclusions above quoted, and appears to render that conclusion entirely untenable, so far, at least, as the present data are concerned."

Whether the coloring of the stars is really objective in the stars themselves or merely a subjective illusion on the part of the observer, is the question discussed at great length by Louis Bell in the April number of the Astrophysical Journal.

After stating that among the brighter single stars there are no extraordinary colors, he proves that the strangely large number of blue companions attending brighter stars cannot have an objective cause, but must be due entirely to optical propinquity. He says: "It is not putting the case too strongly to state that all the colors observed in double stars, and not pertaining to stars in general, are purely of subjective origin, and due to causes readily assignable from the data of physiological optics."

"In point of fact the subjective colorations observed are chargeable to four separate causes." These are simultaneous contrast, fatigue color, shifting of the retinal color sensitiveness away from the red in faint illumination, and 'dazzle tints,' that is, the subjective colorations corresponding to positive after-images."

The writer tested the efficiency of these physiological causes by means of artificial stars and says that "the whole curious list of colors given at the beginning of this paper may be picked up in these observations on artificial stars before the difference in magnitude has become great enough and the eye sufficiently settled into its fatigued state to produce the final color contrast."

He then extended his observations to artificial triplets and clusters with rather striking and even absolutely startling results, which he had checked by three other observers. His final conclusion is that "subjective colors play the chief, if not the only, rôle, in determining the apparent tints observed. . . . Some initial color differences there certainly are, as the spectra show, but the actual colors do not vary enough to account in any material degree for the strange hues which have been reported. The subjective colors arising from the causes here set forth are, however, fully adequate to account not only for the extremely great differences in color reported, but for the curious and evanescent tints which have so put to the test the descriptive powers of those who have noted them. The rôle of the dazzle tints is particularly noteworthy as bearing on the roseate, lilac and purplish hues never observed in isolated stars and very far from affording complementary tints to their primaries."

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the Most Rev. John M. Farley's ordination to the priesthood opened with pontifical Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, on Saturday, June 11. The ceremonies lasted from 11 a. m. until nearly 2 p. m. All of the dignitaries of the Church in the diocese and others from outside took part. The bishops present were the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Cusack, the Rt. Rev. Charles E. McDonnell, and the Rt. Rev. George W. Mundelein; among the monsignori was the Rt. Rev. Mgr. Thomas J. Shahan, Rector of the Catholic University. The clergy, secular and regular, attended in large numbers. Seated to the right of the altar were 125 representatives of the religious sisterhoods of the diocese, while other religious orders were represented by 175 men. There was also within the sacred edifice a great gathering of the laity who had come to show their respect and veneration for the beloved Archbishop. The Rev. John J. Kean, rector of the Church of the Holy Name, delivered the official address of the clergy, in which he reviewed the active career of the Archbishop from the time he was ordained, and spoke of their appreciation of his services and their affection for him personally. He also announced that the clergy of the archdiocese had raised $300,000 which, with $200,000 raised from other sources, will be used in payment of the debt that has been attached to the Cathedral for thirty-one years.

The Archbishop made a feeling response. He was unwilling to have any special commemoration of the anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood, in view of the fact that the archdiocese is already preparing for an extraordinary festivity on the occasion of the formal consecration of St. Patrick's Cathedral, and the commemoration of the centenary of Cardinal McCloskey's birth. His priests, however, finally prevailed upon him to permit a slight recognition of the day and he yielded to their wishes.

The first Bishop of New York, the Right Rev. Richard Concanen, was a distinguished member of the Order of St. Dominic. His brethren of St. Vincent Ferrer's Church, this city, will commemorate the centenary of his death on June 19, by a solemn Mass, at which His Grace Archbishop Farley will preside, and the Right Rev. Mgr. Hayes, D.D., will preach.

All Mamaroneck, without distinction of creed or class, was fully represented at a reception held in the town hall on the evening of June 13, to commemorate the fortieth anniversary of the ordination of the Rev. Dr. Isidore Meister, rector of Holy Trinity parish. The addresses of congratulation and testimonials offered to him on the happy occasion were ample evidence that he is regarded by all not only as a zealous and successful pastor, but a citizen of the community whose leadership and influence have always been used for its very best interests.

The Spanish hierarchy, under the leadership of Cardinal Gregorio María Aguirre y Garcia, Primate of Spain, have addressed a memorial to Premier Canalejas, Minister of Government, in relation to his proposed hostile action against religious Orders and Congregations. They show that his measures as announced infringe upon the Concordat and have no foundation but a revolutionary law of 1837, long since obsolete. They speak out nobly in behalf of the Orders and mention some of the benefits that come from them to Church and country. In courteously acknowledging the receipt of the memorial, the premier stated that the negotiations with the Holy See begun by his predecessor, Moret, and now being conducted by himself, could not be made public without want of respect for the Pope, but he assured the prelates of the esteem and respect in which they were held by the ministry.

On May 15, the Catholic young men of Buenos Aires went on a numerous attended pilgrimage to the Sanctuary of Lujan, as a part of the religious observances of the centenary of the Argentine independence. The same venerable shrine was visited in 1810 by Belgrano, Soler and many other prominent leaders in the revolutionary movement, to implore the blessing of Heaven and the protection of Our Lady on their attempt to free themselves from the shackles with which Napoleon had bound Spain and Spanish America.

OBITUARY

General Sir William Francis Butler died, June 7, at his residence, Bansha Castle, County Tipperary, Ireland. Born at Suirvale, Tipperary, he was educated at the Jesuit College of Tullabeg. Entering the English army in 1858 he served with distinction in India, Canada, Natal, Zululand, Egypt and the Soudan, where he was knighted for his services as Brigadier-General of the Frontier Force, 1886. Major-General in 1890, he commanded at Aldershot and at the Cape, where his opposition to Mr. Chamberlain's design on the Transvaal and his frank warnings to the War Office made his office memorable. Recalled 1898, the verification of his forecast increased his reputation, which was further enhanced by his bold condemnation of high-placed personages, as chairman of the committee on South African war contracts. Lieutenant-General in 1900, he retired 1905, and has since devoted himself chiefly to speaking and writing in behalf of Irish National and Catholic interests. He was a member of the Irish Privy Council and a Senator of the new Irish National University. His lives of Gordon, Napier and Colley, his books of Canadian and African adventure, The Great Lone Land, The Wild Northland, Red Cloud, Far Out Rovings, Campaign of the Cataracts, Naboth's Vineyard, and the last (1909), which best expresses his mind as a Catholic and an Irishman, The Light of the West, are of a high order in style, interest and thought. He will receive fuller treatment in our next issue.

PERSONAL

Whilst in Ireland, during his recent trip abroad, the Hon. Gifford Pinchot did some visiting in company with Sir Horace Plunket. At Kilskeary, County Donegal, Father Maguire showed what had been done in the parish to improve the material conditions and brighten the homes of the people, through the agency and industrial teachings of the Gaelic League. Mr. Pinchot said that having witnessed the Gaelic songs, dances and other home-brightening influences, he understood the meaning of nation-building. It was Sir Horace Plunket's account of the Home-Brightening movement in Ireland that impelled President Roosevelt to appoint the Country Life Commission in the United States.

The Holy Father received in recent private audience the Rt. Rev. Mgr. D. J. McMahon, D.D., General Supervisor of the Catholic Charities of New York. His Holiness was deeply interested in the working of the thirty-six different branches of Catholic beneficence which are grouped under Mgr. McMahon's presidency. The Holy Father showed a special solicitude in the work undertaken on behalf of emigrants, particularly Italian emigrants, and gave a blessing in his own handwriting to Mgr. McMahon, his people, his fellow workers, men and women, priests and religious. He also praised his labors as head of the Catholic Summer School, which Mgr. McMahon has persuaded Cardinal Vannutelli, the Pope's legate to the Montreal Eucharistic Congress, to promise that he will visit.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Commenting editorially on the Accession Oath and the lame attempts hitherto made to amend its wording, The Springfield Republican of May 13 says very sensibly:

"In view of the death of King Edward VII and the accession of George V, it is now to be regretted that the government did not push the bill through as a ministerial measure when the Liberal majority was overwhelming in number.

"The offensive portions of the accession oath were forgotten by the public during the long reign of Queen Victoria, but at her death in 1901 the Roman Catholics made their protest heard. Edward VII repeated the declaration with reluctance, it is understood, but he had no alternative. Even the kingship itself in Great Britain is statutory and could be abolished by a simple act of Parliament. The hereditary feature is also statutory. Parliament prescribes all the conditions under which the king assumes office. Edward swallowed his aversion to the form of the declaration and took the oath.

"The existing form was settled at the revolution of 1688, and the declaration against transubstantiation was deemed necessary, in the interest of 'the Protestant reformed religion established by law,' to prove that the sovereign was not a Roman Catholic.

"While some declaration by the monarch may be necessary so long as Great Britain maintains a state religion through the agency of the Anglican church, it seems perfectly clear that the characterization of the Mass, the belief in the doctrine of transubstantiation and the worship of saints as 'superstitious and idolatrous' is wholly unjustified in our time. As well might the king be compelled to denounce the Mohammedan and Buddhist religions, which are professed by hundreds of millions of his subjects in India, Egypt and other parts of the empire.

"But it is astonishing how zealous certain groups of English Protestants are in demanding that the accession oath be left as it is. Their bigotry could not be surpassed. This feeling is not confined to the nonconformist descendants of the old Puritans. One of the most aggressive organizations is the Church Association, representing the evangelical branch of the established church, whose chairman denounces any amendment of the oath as 'a flagrant act of treacherous disloyalty.' In the opinion of these zealots, no doubt, the main reason for maintaining the monarchy is to preserve and safeguard the established religion, and such a point of view may easily lead one to insist upon the conservation of every antique piece of ecclesiastical trumpery in the ceremonial and pageantry of royalty. These people, it is safe to assume, by no means represent the bulk of the English people; but they are dynamic enough to create an uproar and the modern politician has no taste for religious controversies.

"The proper way to settle the difficulty is first of all, to disestablish the Anglican church. That done, the king, no more than the president of the United States, would need to make a declaration in support of a particular religion or religion in general. But, as the English are inclined to be proud of their contempt of logic in their governmental arrangements, the probability is that, so long as the Catholics do not become so violent as the Protestant extremists in their attitude, nothing whatever will be done even to change the language of the accession oath."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

QUERIES OF A LAYMAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Did King George miss connections with the psychological moment of his life?

We have been led to believe that the morganatic marriage of George V was one of those exalted love affairs which supremely unites the life-long affections of man and woman. We have been further informed that three children blessed the union which grew out of this love-match.

We picture George during his days of "natural choice" as a devoted husband and a happy father. We can see around his hearth-stone the sanctity of home life, and we behold under the shadow of his protecting love a woman's glory as wife and mother radiating through the little world wherein her brood was sheltered.

A man dies. His head was destined to wear the crown. He had been engaged to wed one looked upon as worthy of sharing the crown with him. The dead one, lamented with the grief of a royal family and the tears of a beloved fiancée was royally buried and George, with shaking knees, was told to pull up the stakes around his fireside and abandon his innocent wife and happy children to marry the fiancée of his deceased brother.

State influence compelled (?) him to tear his soul on the most cruel rack yet designed by noble (?) self-sacrifice, but what would we think of a family cat that chooses between its nursing kittens and a purple ribbon to follow the lure of the ribbon?

George was a man, and the presumption is that he loved his wife and children. If this were so, there was nothing to prevent the discharge of his first duties toward them by taking passage to North America, a voluntary exile, with wife and children at his side, and going to work to support them.

He now has another wife and other children, but are there moments when out of the dusk there comes to him a picture of those to whom he had given man's holiest pledge of husbandhood and fatherhood, and do the echoes of once-loved voices sometimes cry out in his dreams: "Why did you abandon us if such words as husband and father and love and home meant as much to you as the formalities of a court?"

Does the thought ever occur to George that, had he proven himself worthy of fatherhood over the children of his own flesh, he would have perhaps more fittingly proved himself worthy of fatherhood over a nation?

The probability is that had George sought escape from the distress of his position by leaving home and country with the woman of his choice and the mother of his children, he would have made such an appeal to the love of the English people by his noble act as no man has succeeded in doing since the English dynasty began.

If the common people are to believe that home ties are sacred, what are they to think when kings and princes show by their example that they are not, and what are they to think of a national religion which sanctions the disruption and destruction of a family rather than embarrass the wishes of a crown?

If the scraps of information which the layman gathers from the daily press on this subject are authentic, George V did indeed miss connections with the psychological moment of his life.

CHRONICLE

Mr. Roosevelt's Welcome Home.—Mr. Roosevelt stepped on American soil shortly before noon on June 18, after an absence of fifteen months. Within the few hours of his stay in New York, he received every mark of honor that time and his own comfort permitted. His welcome began when the Kaiserin Auguste Victoria loomed through the mists of the lower Bay. At 8 o'clock, off Quarantine, he was received by representatives of President Taft and Governor Hughes and by Senators and Governors and Legislators and citizens of distinction. New York Bay was dotted with ships of war and merchant vessels assembled to escort him up the North River and back to the Battery. Mr. Roosevelt was taken on board the Androscoggin, a revenue cutter, which headed the long double line of various classes in the water parade, while the guns of the battleship South Carolina fired the salute that is reserved to honor the first citizen of the Republic. Off Twenty-third street the Androscoggin turned back and passed in review the vessels in the parade. When Mr. Roosevelt set foot on Manhattan Island, at 11 a.m., there were 100,000 persons in Battery Park to give him welcome. Mayor Gaynor greeted him in a short, crisp speech and Col. Roosevelt, with almost equal brevity, assured the Mayor and his fellow citizens that he was glad to be home and that no man could get such a reception without being made to feel very proud and very humble. Presently the land parade was started. With the Rough Riders ahead of him and prominent citizens in carriages behind him, the idol of the hour advanced with Mayor Gaynor and Cornelius Vanderbilt. There was no doubting his popularity. It was shown in two hours of uninterrupted cheering from five miles of people.

It was not quite two o'clock when the parade disbanded at Fifty-ninth street. The reception given to Mr. Roosevelt was marked by perfect weather, which suddenly changed as soon as the program was carried out. Death came to fifteen persons and many were seriously injured in a violent storm which broke over the city and its environs and did great damage on land and river and sea.

Further Conquests of the Air.—Another triumph in the navigation of the air was accomplished during the week under review, by Charles K. Hamilton, who made the flight from New York to Philadelphia and return, a distance of 172 miles in 200 minutes. He made two stops, one of them prearranged, the other a mishap which brought him down in a New Jersey swamp. Undeterred by the latter accident, which happened on the return trip and threatened to be serious, he lifted his machine with marvellous precision out of its perilous position, soared a thousand feet in the air and winged his way over the hills of Staten Island and the waters of the upper Bay, setting new marks in the conquest of the air. Hamilton's best record, up to the present, was made at San Diego, Cal., last January, when he flew twenty-six and a half miles across country and sea to the Mexican border and flew back without making a stop. Thirty miles of the distance was over the Pacific, out of sight of land.—At Indianapolis, the world's aeroplane record for altitude was broken by Walter Brookins, in a Wright bi-plane.

He was in the air thirty-five minutes and rose to a height of 4,384 feet; the former record of 4,185 was held by Louis Paulhan.

Gen. Edwards to the Philippines.—General Clarence R. Edwards, chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, will leave Washington for the Philippines the last of June and will make an extensive inspection of the governmental machinery of the islands. This trip is taken owing to the desire of the President to maintain the closest relations between the Insular Bureau and the Philippine Government. General Edwards will also look into some financial problems of importance to the Philippines. He is known to be extremely close to the President, and his inspection of Philippine affairs will be in point of satisfaction to the Executive second only to an inspection by Mr. Taft himself.

Cold Comfort for Madriz.—The representations of the de facto President of Nicaragua to President Taft on the unfriendly action of United States officials and, notably, Commander Gilmer, of the gunboat Paducah, now in Nicaragua waters, promise to effect no change in the government policy. The Estrada faction maintains that Madriz, as Zelaya's henchman, was foisted upon the country in defiance of constitutional right and is ruling by force instead of by law. Madriz has had recourse to a merciless draft to recruit his army, old men and mere boys having been seized, and driven, with arms pinioned, to the scenes of guerrilla warfare, to be shot at and to shoot, without understanding what the fighting is about.—Great Britain and Germany have sent notes to the United States Government on the intolerable state of affairs in Nicaragua which has paralyzed commerce, ruined agriculture and demoralized the people. Effective measures towards preventing further bloodshed are expected daily.

Canada's Governor in England.—Earl Grey, who has recently arrived in England on a visit before definitely resigning his governorship into the hands of the Duke of Connaught, is already stirring British business men to the commercial possibilities of Canada. The Westminster Gazette, in an editorial of June 17, says: "Earl Grey, whom we are glad to see back in England for a brief holiday, is of the school of business viceroys. Hardly had he landed yesterday when he was preaching the possibilities of Canada." The paper then quotes a part of Earl Grey's communication urging British commercial houses to send their best agents to Canada, contending that they are not taking advantage of the opportunities as do firms in France, Germany and the United States. The editorial then continues: "This is the text of nearly all our consuls and proconsuls—that the British commercial man has not the push of his rivals. Earl Grey sees a great opportunity in the exhibition which is to be held in Toronto. The British manufacturer is a little distrustful of these international shows, but we agree that he must be prepared to exhibit at them in a large spirit if the world is to be disillusionized of strange ideas of our decay that it is the purpose of a large party to promulgate."

British News.—Lord Wolverhampton has left the Cabinet on account, it is said by some, of his dissatisfaction with its financial policy. On the other hand he is eighty years of age, and it seems unreasonable that one who remained in the Cabinet while that policy was in doubt and his resignation would have helped to check it, should now resign in protest against it when it has become law.—Lord Kitchener has asked to be allowed to refuse the appointment to the commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean. Public opinion seems to be in his favor, the appointment being looked upon as a device to get him out of the way.—The British Labor party, according to its own report to the International Congress at Copenhagen, numbers 1,481,368, made up of 1,445,708 members of 161 unions, 30,982 members of Socialistic societies, 4,000 members of Women's Labor League and 678 cooperators. It numbered in 1900 375,931, and in 1908 1,152,786. In 1909 the Miners' Federation was affiliated, numbering 550,000. This would seem to indicate a loss of 221,000 members in 1910. Probably a large number of miners were already affiliated to the party as individuals when the Federation came in.—The King paid a long afternoon visit to Mr. Chamberlain in London.—The proprietors of the Academy brought libel suit against the Daily News and Rev. R. F. Horton. The former published a letter from the latter to the effect that the Academy had passed into Roman Catholic hands and viewed literature from a Roman standpoint only. The editors of Academy stated that they were High Churchmen, that their views had a recognized place in the Church of England and that it was a serious matter to call them Roman. The jury found for the defendants, holding the words objected to, to be fair comment in the public interest. It recommended Mr. Horton to be more careful in ascertaining facts. It seems that in asserting Lord Douglas to have become a Catholic, he confounded him with his uncle, Rev. Lord Archibald Douglas.—Sir Edward Clarke, at one time Solicitor-General under Lord Salisbury, has written a long letter to the Times in favor of maintaining the Royal Declaration against Transubstantiation on the ground that the doctrines it condemns explicitly are taught by many clergymen of the Church of England, with whom it is important that the sovereign should not be associated.—An interesting case is in progress concerning the religion of minors. Casimir Minelya, a Russian subject, married a Jewess, and had his children baptized. When he came with them to England, their mother's relatives took possession of them and began to bring them up as Hebrews. He applied to the courts and obtained custody of them with the view of taking them back to Russia. Before he could do so the mother's family kidnapped one of them, and her father, Joseph Cohen, has been arrested for assault in connection with the affair. The police are looking for the kidnappers and the child.

Imperial Items.—An unsuccessful attempt has been made to wreck the mail train from Calcutta to Darjeeling. This is the fifth of the kind. In South Africa the premier, General Botha, has determined that Pretoria East shall be contested in the general election against Sir Percy Fitzpatrick, a leading Unionist. The Unionists claim this to be a confirmation of Botha's inability to carry out his wish to avoid strict party lines in the new Dominion Parliament. He, however, may find in the assumption by Dr. Jameson's party of the name "Unionists" an insinuation hard to bear; and may look upon the nomination of one who was intimately connected with the raid, for a seat in Pretoria as intended to provoke a manifestation of party spirit by himself and his followers.

Ireland.—General Sir William Butler's funeral at Bansha, Tipperary, was of a national character. Archbishop Fennelly, of Cashel, presided at the Solemn Requiem and all classes, national, official and military, were represented. Queen Alexandra telegraphed to Lady Butler: "It is from the depth of my own broken heart that I mourn with you in your overwhelming sorrow for the loss of your distinguished and excellent husband. May God help us each to bear our heavy cross." Lord Wolseley had written to General Butler on the eve of his death: "I always looked upon you as a host in yourself, ready to undertake any difficult job, and the more dangerous it was the more you enjoyed it. May God in His mercy restore you to your friends, of whom none have ever valued your friendship more than your very attached friend and old comrade—Wolseley."—The proposed conference between the Unionist and Liberal leaders on the Veto Question is not regarded with favor by the Irish party, which sees no room for compromise as the demand already made by Mr. Asquith is deemed the irreducible minimum. Mr. O'Brien favors the conference and would also wish to have one on Home Rule. The Orange lodges are still agitating against any change of the Coronation Oath, but the majority of leading Protestants favor erasing the objectionable clauses. At the recent County Council elections several Catholics were elected in a few northern Protestant districts, a thing hitherto unprecedented. The proposal of the Board of Studies, Belfast University, to extend the Lectureship in Scholastic Philosophy so as to cover Scholastic Metaphysics, Logic and Ethics, was negatived by the Senate, 14 to 13.

The Borromeo Encyclical.—The official Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, announced a satisfactory understanding between Germany and the Vatican in the matter of the recent disturbances occasioned by the St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical. The Vatican authorities have agreed that the Encyclical will not be proclaimed by the bishops of the empire in the usual formal and public manner, but there has been no withdrawal of any statement in the document. Cardinal Merry del Val communicated to Dr. von Mühlberg, Germany's representative at the Vatican, a note in which he protests his conviction that the commotion in evangelical circles was due to a misunderstanding of the purpose of the Encyclical. The Pontifical Secretary of State declares that certain clauses of the Encyclical have been interpreted in a sense entirely foreign to the Holy Father's mind. The Holy Father, the Cardinal adds, has heard of the unfortunate commotion aroused by the document with sincere regret, since any thought of giving offense to the non-Catholics and the Princes of Germany, was absolutely absent from his intention in promulgating his letter to the Christian world.

What the Encyclical Contains.—The pontifical document which has occasioned undue excitement in Germany was issued by the Holy Father in commemoration of the third centenary of the canonization of Saint Charles Borromeo, Cardinal and Archbishop of Milan. The scope of the Encyclical is to show that the Modernistic tendencies of our times are similar to those against which Saint Charles fought with such notable success, and that the aim of the innovators of his day, as it is of Modernists today, was a general defection from the Faith and the discipline of the Church. The document recommends great zeal in the catechetical instruction of the young, condemns the so-called lay or neutral schools, urges the establishing of denominational schools and calls attention to certain countries where, in the name of liberty, the worst form of tyranny is practised. The present danger, it goes on to say, is even greater than that of the times of Saint Charles Borromeo, as the enemy threatens within the very pale of the Church, feigning obedience to her authorities, thus secretly to propagate ideas which are more radically pernicious than those of the so-called reformers. Even those engage in this warfare who, by their position, are pledged to defend the Church. They are under the illusion that the Church can compromise with the spirit of the age. Finally the Holy Father gives expression to his sorrow that not enough stress is laid upon the reception by the faithful of the Sacraments of Penance and the Holy Eucharist.

Change of Minister in Germany.—Herr Dernburg, recently Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs, has offered his resignation and his request was at once accepted. Dernburg will be remembered as one of the chief pillars of the bloc of Chancellor Bülow, which went to pieces a year ago when it proved unable to give the empire the necessary finance reform legislation. His last "triumph" was the defeat of the bill providing for the equitable division of the tax burden of the colonies among the corporations and private concerns chiefly benefited by colonial development. It was a Pyrrhic victory, since the principle of the proposed change will no doubt sooner or later be put into execution.

Destructive Floods in Europe.—Despatches from all parts of Europe last week indicate a general uprising of rivers which are inundating large sections of the continent. In Switzerland many deaths from drowning are reported; several railways have been compelled to cease operating; vast areas have been deluged, the houses in many places have been flooded as high as the second story; the agricultural loss is immense. In Servia torrential rains followed by floods have caused havoc in the Morava River valley. In Turkey the province of Erzerum, Turkish Armenia, has been the worst sufferer. The rise of the waters resulting from heavy rains having caused terrible floods to sweep over the entire district. Great loss of life and considerable property damage are reported from the province.

Cloudbursts in Germany.—In Germany the heaviest loss is reported from the Ahr valley in the Eifel region. A violent rain continuing for several days caused the river Ahr to break its banks. The storm culminated in a cloudburst and the waters choked the valley, drowning every living creature in their path and causing immense monetary damage. Late estimates place the total number of the dead at 200.—Berlin suffered a like visitation, a heavy cloudburst causing hundreds of thousands of dollars' damage. For a time the water was three feet deep in most of the principal thoroughfares; cellars everywhere were flooded, and streetcars, omnibuses and other forms of traffic were at a standstill.—Oberamergau, the scene of the Passion Play, was for two days cut off from railway communication with outside points by the flood which invaded the district. Three hundred Americans were marooned in the Bavarian village.—Meteorological observations in the higher Alps announce that the snow is melting rapidly and that greater floods are expected.

Concessions to Catholics.—The treatment heretofore meted out to Catholics in the Duchy of Brunswick may be recognized from certain "concessions" recently proclaimed in favor of Catholic children attending the State schools in Brunswick. Hereafter Catholic children will not be obliged to participate in specifically Protestant celebrations such as the "Luther feasts," but they will not be exempted from the Protestant school prayers, nor the "devotions" on the emperor's or regent's birthday, on the commemoration of the battle of Sedan and similar solemnities. They will no longer be obliged to sing or to learn by heart Protestant hymns or to be present at Protestant catechism instruction or to buy Protestant catechisms and other hand-books of religion. When will Brunswick, asks Germania, at last enter the number of civilized States?

Catholic Activity in Italy.—Thirty thousand Venetian agriculturists were assembled recently at Cittadella and addressed by Mgr. Pelizzo, Bishop of Padua, and other speakers. The aim of the demonstration was to inaugurate an interprovincial agricultural syndicate. The project was realized, and the comment of the Socialist journal, the Avanti, is significant: "The Clericals, these days, are working harder than the Liberals, Radicals, Democrats, Republicans and Socialists combined!" This organ predicts that there will be serious losses for the Anticlericals at the coming elections.

Opening of Bosnia's Landtag.—Despatches from Sarajewo, Bosnia's capital, describe an unfortunate incident of the opening of the first Landtag convened in that city. Following the annexation of the provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria, a constitution was proclaimed, elections were held and on June 15 the new Landtag met for its opening session. The Governor of the newly annexed provinces, General Varesin von Vares, as representative of the emperor, read the speech from the throne and the usual preliminaries attending such an occasion were formally acted upon. The session was brief. As the Governor was returning to his palace, five shots rang out; happily, the would-be assassin, a Servian Socialist, missed his aim and the bullets flew harmlessly by the Governor. Realizing that his purpose had failed the assassin, before anyone could arrest him, shot himself. The Governor was enthusiastically congratulated on his escape.

Indian Uprising in Yucatan.—Forty slain, between troops and Indians, and seventy Indian prisoners resulted from an uprising at Valladolid. After mortally wounding the jefe político, Regil, the infuriated Indians hacked his still living body to pieces with their machetes. Regil's despotism and cruelty are said to have caused the outbreak. The prisoners are to be tried by martial law.

Martial Law in Argentina.—Owing to murmurs of discontent and threats of popular disturbance, the congress of Argentina has suspended the constitutional guarantees and declared the whole republic in a "state of siege." Law-abiding citizens rejoice at the measure, which falls heavily only on anarchistic agitators and disturbers of the public peace, who had openly threatened a revolutionary outbreak as their contribution to the festivities in honor of that country's centennial of independence.

Crete.—The powers have notified the Executive Committee that Mohammedans are not to be deprived of their rights in the Chambers because they refuse the oath of allegiance to the King of the Hellenes, who, being only administrator of the Island, has no claim to their fealty. It is possible that the powers will have to occupy the island with a military force.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

A Great Catholic Irishman

I.

"Ireland, to which the Empire seems bound to turn for her greatest soldiers," says a London paper, "gave us one of the best of them in Sir William Butler, and it was a harsh stroke of fate's irony that deprived us of his gifts and experience when honor compelled him to resign his South African command." The Dublin Leader writes: "The regret which his country feels at his death may well be intensified by the thought that his great abilities, as is the case with so many other eminent Irishmen, were spent mostly in the service of another country." Butler was an exception. We shall see that while serving another country with great ability he found time to devote his best abilities to his own and, we think, when the effect of his distinguished official services shall have passed, his services to his country and religion will continue to be remembered and to fructify.

Born 1838 in Suirvale, Tipperary, William Francis Butler came of good Catholic stock. He was of the direct line of the Ormond Butlers, who furnished strong men to Church and State for 700 years. In AMERICA (No. 3), we had occasion to say of General M. C. Butler, a scion of the same house, that his Butler ancestry gave generals to every war of the Union. Army or altar seemed the natural vocation of the Butlers, but Sir William's most notable ancestor, Sir Theobald Butler, was a lawyer. After the Catholic cause was lost at the Boyne, he stood as the fearless champion of his fellow-Catholics in the bigoted Irish parliament, and though overruled by brutal force, his bold defence was pronounced irrefragable. He forfeited large estates in consequence, and little of Ormond's broad acres remained to his Catholic descendants, but General Butler, his son, Rev. Richard Butler, O.S.B., and his cousin, Rev. Theobald Butler, S.J., of Macon, Ga., late Superior of the Southern Province, are proof that the inheritance of his faith and character has not been forfeited.

When young Butler left the Jesuit College of Tullabeg to enter the English army he carried his religious and national principles along with him, and never suffered professional aspirations or alien associations to taint or dilute them. Hence it is the strongest testimony to his military genius that wherever he served, in India, Canada, Natal, Ashanti, Zululand, England, Egypt, the Soudan, the Cape, he was always in the line of promotion. His every experience was the occasion of a book, essay or lecture, and in speech and writing he was outspoken as a Catholic and an Irishman. Belonging to no clique, military or political, he was the frank and forcible defender of oppressed nationalities everywhere, and at a time when the government he served was enacting and enforcing coercion laws in Ireland, he championed the cause of the Irish tenants and Ireland's autonomy, and sat beside Parnell in open court at the Times Commission Trial of 1889. His life of General Gordon, written the same year, had this to say on Gordon's visit to Ireland:

"He beheld this strange state of slavery and slave-driving (of the Soudan) almost at the door of his own house. He who had been fighting man's savage injustice to man afar off in Darfourian deserts found all at once that within twelve hours' travel another species of vile traffic was going on. Officials found his opinions on this question so obnoxious that they declared Gordon 'had not had time to fully comprehend the Irish question.' Doubtless there were many pachas in Egypt who said the same of his Soudan views, and drivers and traders who spoke in similar strain of his effort against slavery." His promotion, notwithstanding, to a Major-Generalship a few years later and his assignment to the critical command of the Cape, were clear recognition of his pre-eminence among British generals.

His character as a man was soon to prove equally eminent. In "Far Out Rovings," published 1879, he had pictured the Boers as a strong and sturdy race, attached to their independence and worthy of it, and predicted that in a contest with British forces of anything like equal numbers they would triumph and deserve to triumph. He let his masters know that he had no relish for the task of crushing such a people, and that not an army of 50,000 or 100,000 could accomplish it. The disgrace of his recall was soon blotted out in the complete vindication of his forecast and his attitude. His last official act before his retirement as Lieut.-General in 1905 was to sit in judgment on men of high position who had corruptly profited by the war they had promoted.

His position on the Boer question was the natural outcome of his life-long principles. As a soldier he did what he was set to do, with indeed a consideration and humanity uncommon among his compeers, but he never assumed or assimilated the conscience of his taskmasters. He never sympathized with unjust aggression, and least of all with aggression that was propped by hypocrisy. He believed that "the white man's burden" was usually the white man on the black or brown man's neck. As far back as 1865 he had written in "Belgian Battlefields":

"The fact is we like to make show of a sort of principle whenever we fight for interest. . . . If we go to war with the Chinese because they don't want to get drunk upon our opium; if we annex half Asia, clear the Maori from New Zealand or knock Prince Satsuma's city into ruins, 'Duty' will be sure to figure somewhere in the performance. Glory won't do, for the French fly that flag; so we run up our big bunting labeled 'Duty'—and like charity it covereth a multitude of sins."

Had General Butler never worn sword his pen would have made him famous. "Great Lone Land," "Wild North Land" and "Red Cloud" are living pictures of real persons, places and adventures, more striking and fascinating than fiction. His life of Napier, another Irish soldier of strong individuality and equally dexterous with sword or pen, sets the reader face to face with the man rather than the official, and leaves a bold outline stamped upon the memory. But in biography "General Gordon" is his masterpiece. Here was a man after his own heart who could keep an independent soul under a British uniform, and to keep his soul would risk the uniform. His Life of Gordon and especially his lecture of 1907, throw as much light on General Butler's own career and character as on Gordon's.

Gordon also had a Celtic "light-heartedness which, while largely explaining his failure with the bureaucratic elements of English government life, was the active element in his nature that made him the most successful ruler of Eastern and African races that England has produced." Utterly unselfish, he was the only soldier Butler ever knew who complied with the third clause of the Baptist's rule for soldiers: "Do violence to no man, neither calumniate any man, and be content with your pay." Gordon said of his library, the Bible: "The very heart of nature speaks in the Book," and Butler: "If the object in reading be the training of the human mind to the measurement of man in the world and to the best apportionment of his life therein, then the Bible outweighs in its school value all other books combined. It is the anatomy of the whole human body tied up on the cross of life."

Both acted toward the native races on the principle formulated by Gordon: Advise what is universally right throughout the world and what is best for the people themselves; and both learned "the great lesson that in all nations and in all climes there are those who are perfect gentlemen, and who, though they may not be called Christians, are so in spirit and truth." Gordon "threw in his lot with Egypt, 'which had long been the prey of all the vultures in Europe,' against the amalgamated spoilers of London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna;" and Butler adds from his own African experience: "Governments, parliaments, armies, etc., are on the stage, but there are strings underneath that are held by the vultures and the great people above are dancing to them. This is the story of Egypt for forty years."

When Gordon was recalled, for much the same reasons as Butler was later, he told Lord Lyons, the British Plenipotentiary, "some wholesome truths that 'stamped him in official eyes as a madman.' To tell this diplomatic Polonius the simplest form of truth is to put him, the greatest Englishman of his time, out of court forever." We shall see that Butler's estimate of Gordon was even truer of himself: "No matter what the task before him he knew but one rule: that right could never be wrong. This was the keynote of his life-work. He was no man's copy: he was himself."

Church Control of Schools

The editorial writer reviewing recently, in a western paper, the expanding influence of Mr. Carnegie's Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, said: "Our very education is at the mercy of great aggregations of wealth, and our religious and benevolent work is sharing the same fate." Criticism, of which this is a fair sample, is evidence that the status of the Foundation has not yet been finally fixed, and that there are conservative leaders among us who will insist that the autocratic tendencies manifested by the directors of the Foundation be effectually controlled. It is true surprise is expressed in many quarters because of the opposition to the Fund which appears to be growing. And the surprise seems to arise largely from the fact that the critics of the Foundation affirm its provisions to be inimical to Christian teaching. Many claim to see no grounds for this statement. According to them the Foundation does not forbid or mean to forbid Christian influence in the schools privileged to enjoy its bounties. All that it requires is that the colleges it aids shall not be put under denominational control, that control, namely, "which limits academic freedom by imposing a denominational test on teachers or pupils, or by warping administrative policy."

AMERICA has already commented on the true significance of this apparently innocent requirement of the Foundation. As interpreted by the Trustees of the Fund themselves a mere legal dependence upon religious bodies is sufficient to exclude an institution from the benefits of the Foundation, a dependence, as was declared by skilled advocates, which "involves mere technical provisions in historic charters that are found in actual practice not a bar to the complete liberty and autonomy of the colleges concerned."

It is just as well for us to come out into the open in discussing the question. They who are directing the fortunes of Mr. Carnegie's philanthropic trust for the advancement of teaching have proclaimed to the world in no uncertain tones, albeit not in the offensive speech of European deists, that liberty of thought and freedom of educational methods are incompatible with religious control of schools. They hold such control to involve essential antagonism with the ideals of a liberal education. Perhaps they may diplomatically resent the brutal plainness of expression their European confreres make use of, but they surely cannot refuse to align themselves with the defenders of the "free," that is, non-religious schools, whose virulent attacks on Church schools in Europe have held notable place in the chronicle of recent school history on the Continent.

These, too, profess that their purpose is not to favor irreligious or anti-religious education. Such characterization of their aims by churchmen they affirm to be false. They desire, so they say, only that the school be freed from the intolerable Church influence which has thus far cramped its freedom in scholastic effort; and hence.

their demand that the religious instruction heretofore imparted under clerical direction be superseded by an undenominational Christian instruction, whatever this may be, given by a lay teacher whose aim shall be to arouse and enkindle into flame the natural religiosity of the youthful heart.

Thus far who shall say that the purposes of these men differ in any appreciable degree from the aims clearly described in the conditions set down for participation in the privileges of the Carnegie Foundation? And if the aims be the same, does not logic require that a use of similar means to attain these aims will effect similar results? What results are hoped for is evident. The purpose of the "free" school leaders abroad is, in their own words, the introduction of a system of secular ethical training through lay teachers, which shall assure to those frequenting these schools an unsectarian religious formation independent of all Church dominance, thus to build up an effective counterpoise to the clerical influence won through the religious instruction imparted in private schools controlled by the Church. Young people trained in such a system, if not at once, surely with maturing years, will easily come to take things at their right value; will readily learn, using the instincts of their own reason, to make their own selection among the so-called religious essentials proposed to them. Thus the religious horizon will be gradually cleared, and men and women of the land will be freed from the intolerable bigotry of clerical religiosity now prevailing.

This outcome, spelling scepticism and indifference in religious judgment, were surely an evil sufficiently marked. But the more advanced proponents of education freed from Church control in Europe to-day clamor for much more. If educational methods, say these latter, are to be systematized as they should be, then religion has no place whatever in the program of instruction, and religious sentiment is to be used in no way in the development of the student. The school, as an institution, rests upon the achievements of natural culture, and if its scope include the forming of moral character, this ought to be compassed through the influence of an ethical system whose basic principle is the recognition by the student that obligation to moral conduct proceeds from his own intimate persuasion of what is right.

He must come to accept the mandate laid upon him to do this and to avoid that, not because of belief in the existence of a God, who rewards the good and punishes the wicked; not because of a belief in an enduring life after death; not because his soul is immortal—but simply because his own as well as the common good requires that he obey. Religious motives, as they are understood among Christians, are of no value whatever in the manner of training the "free" school advocates, simply because the principles underlying these motives are not recognized in the philosophy of the leaders of these schools.

No doubt the mere suggestion that so sweeping a devotion from accepted standards is likely to result from the Carnegie methods will shock the college trustees who blithely abandoned even the tenuous tie of legal dependence on Church bodies in order that their institutions may profit by the material benefits the trust fund scatters among its recognized friends. But after all, the question is not one of mere theory, rather is it one of logical sequence from the practical principles involved. One may claim that a certain system is not anti-Christian, but unless his claim rest upon unassailable evidence in actual fact, what does it amount to? If Church influence is excluded in its entirety from schools accredited by the Foundation, in order that undenominational Christianity alone, whatever that may be, shall constitute the religious atmosphere of a school, how long will it be before the materialistic and sceptical tendencies of the age bring the young generation to the repudiation of Christianity with its unselfish and self-denying standards? How much higher will the stream get than its source?

Like methods work into like results and the Carnegie fund requirements, though smoother in application and less shocking in their announcement, are identical with the principles that underlie the dechristianizing of the schools in France. Happily they have not here the backing of the government to force them upon the country. Nevertheless, as the Springfield Republican declared a short time since: "a foundation invested with power to inflict what amounts to a heavy pecuniary fine, may exert autocratic powers in fields which neither State legislatures nor Congress would venture to invade."

The Church and the Irish Primary School

A kindly letter from a visitor to Ireland, published in AMERICA, under date of May 7 last, records of the Irish Primary School system that "the Government supports the Catholic Schools, and the priests absolutely control them." The sweeping character of this statement prompts an attempt to state briefly the actual relations of religion and primary education in Ireland. For the sake of clearness, what follows will deal only with the great mass of the Irish primary schools, those, namely, which are definitely under State control, or supported in the main by the public funds. The splendid organization of the Irish Christian Brothers, which stands outside the State system, and the excellent convent schools which occupy a special place within that system, are not included in the following summary.

The Board of National Education in Ireland has existed for eighty years as a separate and largely independent branch of executive government. Formed of ten Catholic members and of ten Protestant colleagues of varied denominations, it finds the one serious check on its autonomy in its dependence, as to financial administration, on the Treasury in London. On other matters of educational policy, it is limited only by the "fundamental principles" under which it was created, and which it has itself formulated. According to these principles, the Central Board works on the basis of affording "combined literary and moral, and separate religious instruction, to children of all persuasions, as far as possible, in the same school;" and hence it naturally "wishes" that "the clergy and laity of different religious denominations should cooperate in conducting National Schools."

These "fundamental principles," unchangeable without the assent of the Crown, have worked out in very special directions since the Board came into existence. The first point to be noted is that the Board has been, in the main, unable to combine "children of all persuasions" in the same school. There are some 700,000 children now in the schools maintained by the Board; 500,000 of these are in 5,900 schools, where scholars and teachers are either exclusively Catholic or exclusively Protestant; 2,500 other schools, wherein all the teachers and more than nine-tenths of the children are of one denomination, provide for 190,000 other children. In only the small remnant of less than 100 schools, with less than 6,000 scholars, are children and their teachers really "mixed" as to religion. This marked tendency to eliminate "united secular education" is even more noticeable among Protestants than among Catholics. Especially in Ulster, deep-seated jealousies between various Protestant bodies have led to an extreme multiplication of very small schools, each in practice reserved for one denomination alone, though legally no child can be excluded from any school.

The second "fundamental principle," that of the cooperation of clergy and laity, of all denominations, in conducting schools under the Board, has also worked out in one particular way. Speaking generally, the various religious bodies do not cooperate with each other. Each cooperates, for its own objects, with the Board sitting in Dublin. So it has come that this Central Board administers the schools through an army of denominational managers. Of these, some 7,500 are clergymen, of whom 5,700 are Catholic priests. The lay managers number 760, and of these about 170 are Catholics. Out of 8,500 schools, only 22 are under managerial "boards" of mixed religious types. These mixed bodies are due to the recent policy of the Central Board, which seeks to amalgamate the small separate "Protestant" schools referred to above. Sometimes three and even four of these small schools were to be found in a country parish, each with its fifteen or twenty scholars, each supported and styled "undenominational" by the Central Board.

From all this it is clear that primary education in Ireland has tried to be as denominational as the existing law will permit. The characteristic factor in this result is not the Central Board, but the universal demand that the Board shall appoint local managers distinctively denominational by profession, to safeguard the religious interests of a school population ranged under clear denominational categories. To Catholics and Protestants alike, the managerial system is the sheet anchor of Irish primary education. Even the Ulster Presbyterians, ever clamorous for "non-sectarian" university education, are vigilant in securing that their children frequent schools dominantly Presbyterian, under teachers of their own belief.

On the part of three-quarters of the population, the Catholics of Ireland, it may be said that the limited recognition of the primary school system by the Church, is conditional on the existence of managerial control. "Unsectarian" or "secularist" primary education does not exist in Ireland. The movement towards it by some Ulster Protestants is largely due to the rivalries of Protestant bodies there, and to the grievances felt in consequence by some teachers. Lay managers, of whatever religion, are now largely an accidental survival. They are often managers because as landlords they, or their predecessors in title, built schools and placed them under the control of the Central Board. The clerical managers are the normal local administrators of the primary system. What will be said of the Catholic priest as manager, will be true, in all essentials, of the Protestant minister in regard of the "Protestant" school.

Two-thirds of the cost of a school building is usually provided by the Central Board from public money; the site and the remainder of the cost falls on the priest and the parishioners as voluntary contributors. Incidental expenses at present fall on the priest-manager as a general rule. He is appointed formally by the Central Board. Catholic training colleges are well organized, and receive from the Board $250 a year for each student in residence. The teachers so provided are examined, graded, paid and pensioned by the Board, from State funds alone; no local rates are levied in Ireland for primary education. The teacher is appointed by the manager at the latter's free choice, subject to his character and educative power continuing to have the approval of the Board. He can be dismissed by the Board, acting through its Inspectors.

The manager also can dismiss a teacher, without cause assigned, on giving three months' notice, or paying three months' salary—as a personal liability—instead of notice. He can also dismiss him peremptorily, "for sufficient cause." Such action by the manager is not subject to review by the Central Board or other civil authority. But by ecclesiastical law, no dismissal by any priest-manager can take effect until the teacher has had an opportunity of having it reviewed by the bishop. The bishop's approval is also made necessary for a new appointment of a teacher. For the whole country there is a very effective association of Catholic clerical managers, with diocesan and provincial committees.

Under this control by Catholic priests as local managers, with Catholic teachers, and with school rolls containing names all or almost all Catholic, more than 6,000 State schools work in Ireland. But though described in the Education Code as "under Catholic management," they cannot be called "Catholic schools." The "fundamental principles" of the system, cited above, are always and everywhere in operation. Thousands of schools exist which have never been entered by any non-Catholics. Yet even in these schools the books used, the lessons taught, the school exercises, the pictures and statues, must be such as could at any moment be used in educating non-Catholic children. The fact that there is not a Protestant child living within the school district has no effect whatever on this situation.

During the time of "secular instruction," which is at least four hours a day, no Catholic practice can be inculcated, no Catholic prayers can be said; indeed, "any spiritual exercises whatever" are prohibited. No priest, not even the manager of the school, can give any "secular instruction." The fact that this instruction is in progress is shown by a large placard on the wall. At the close of the day there is a quick change performance. A placard with the words: "Religious Instruction," replaces its secular predecessor; it is even carefully provided that the two cannot be exposed at the same time. A rigorous "conscience-clause" comes into operation forthwith.

Time must be given for any non-Catholic scholars to leave the room; none such can remain except by express and spontaneous written direction of parent or guardian. Secular books are put into a press; the catechism, the Douay Version, the hymn book are produced from another press, and "religious exercises" are in order. Corresponding limitations exist on the work of a school "under Protestant management." The only difference is, that children of various Protestant organizations can receive religious instruction from the same Protestant teacher, except where a parent or guardian expressly dissents. Parental assent or dissent under the conscience-clause can be expressed or revoked at any time. Subject to these drastic provisions, a Catholic manager can choose the books to be used, and to some extent, the program of work to be followed. But all books and all programs are subject to the control of the Central Board and its hierarchy of officials—Resident Commissioner, Chief Inspectors, Senior and Junior and Assistant Inspectors.

From all this it will be evident that the education given to the great body of Catholic children in Ireland is, as regards actual instruction in secular knowledge, rather safeguarded against positive error than animated by Catholic principles and guided by Catholic ideals. This safeguarding is done by the Church through its priest-managers, acting under the control of the bishops, and supported by the Catholic spirit of the faithful children of the Church in Ireland. What a Reporter Remembered of Forty Sermons*

It is told of a priest of the Boston diocese, who is now no more, that he was complimented by one of his parishioners on a sermon. The priest was curious to know what truth it was that made so deep an impression, but all his questioning elicited no reply. Finally the parishioner admitted that he remembered nothing of what was said. "But you see, Father," he urged in defence, "it's just like this. My wife puts my shirt in water, soap and bluing, and though none of those articles remain when the washing is finished, the shirt is far better off for it all. And so am I for your sermon, though I don't recall anything of it."

In many cases it must be sadly confessed that the Sunday morning sermon is like the Monday morning washing. The effects remain for some time in both cases, but the causes have evaporated. Yet the preacher is a teacher as well as a stimulant and is eager to have his lessons abide while they should also impart life and vigor in their delivery. Can one find out what it is in a sermon which will outlive the day of its preaching? Not fully, of course, because there are many strange survivals in memory as well as outside of it which seem to have no particular fitness entitling them to old age.

Still a voyage of discovery into the regions of the memory will disclose here and there some bit of land whether a tiny island of precarious volcanic origin or a more solid and greater continent not yet submerged by the waters of forgetfulness. For several years, with a view to discovering the constituents of the surviving lands, a teacher of rhetoric has had his pupils write out three of their earliest recollections of sermon truths. The experiment showed much variety and yet some marked uniformity in the traits of remembered truths. Those interested may perform the experiment for themselves and see whether it corresponds with the results obtained by the study of a reporter's memory. Mr. James Douglas made the rounds of the London churches and published his impressions of their preachers in the London Morning Leader. He afterwards gathered his remarks into a book called "The Man in the Pulpit." Here we may study the survival of the memory's fittest.

The material for the experiment is not wholly suitable. Mr. Douglas went as a critic. Now a critic is not a normal listener. He stands on the side-lines, we may say. He has not thrown himself into the excitement of the game. He enters the church as the school-inspector does the class-room, not to learn with the docility and eager curiosity of a child but to examine and test and approve with the cold aloofness of a judge. Mr. Douglas is a journalistic critic, and that renders him less suitable still as a listener. The journalist looks for the striking and arresting points, the spice for his readers. Mr. Douglas finally is a stylist of a pronounced type.

Macaulay offered up sacrifices to truth on the altar of balance. Mr. Douglas looks as though he would be equally unmerciful for the sake of a metaphor. It is certainly interesting and extremely diverting to watch him working and weaving a city, a church, a voice, a face, a person into the devious pattern of a metaphor. The result is fascinating; it is Swinburne in prose (Mr.

*The Man in the Pulpit. By James Douglas. London: Methuen & Co.

Douglas intensely admires Swinburne); it holds the reader entranced as the man does who keeps some half a dozen, sharp, gleaming knives whirling through the air, but when the breathless performance is over, the reader is tempted to say, "juggling."

The following passage gives us one out of many instances of the way Mr. Douglas likes to reduce a man or a scene to a common denominator: "Canon Barker's smile is a sermon, and his sermon is a smile. You realize that his face is carved out of joyous quietude. Its smooth surfaces are genial, untormented. The small eyes twinkle contentment. The nose juts out with jovial hilarity. Every gesture is an incitement to a cheerful acceptance of life. The strained mouth drawn tight as a bow string to battle with an inner tide of laughter that surges for relief. The man is an incarnation of optimism." Such writing is indeed stimulating and diverting, but it is fanciful and often strained. We admire the ingenious dexterity of Mr. Douglas; we are not convinced of the embodied risibility of Canon Barker or that his photograph would serve as a substitute for a joke column.

To give an example of the London reporter as a stylist, like Swinburne in his alliteration, like the Pickwickian Jingle in his sentences, we may quote his description of Father Vaughan. The criticism is better than the style. "The sermon is simple, sensuous, passionate. Glowing eloquence poured hot from the heart. No notes, no manuscript. Well-built withal. A noble edifice of emotion harmoniously balanced and richly decorated with spontaneous phrase. No taint or trace of a metaphysical microbe, no pulpit pedantry. Lyrically free from the disease of thought. Throughout it throbs with the poignant pathos of Christ and Christians crucified. It is a bacchanal of rapturous agony and ecstatic anguish, a pæan of passion, joyous saturnalia of sorrow."

But to come to the question of what was remembered by Mr. Douglas. Despite his drawbacks as a listener, it might be said because of them, the experiment is worth making. Underneath the critic, the journalist and the stylist is human nature and the man in the pulpit found in this man in the pew, a heavily armored, yet not impregnable listener. Even a reporter may on occasion be human and forget his profession.

Professors of the art of teaching tell us, and experience confirms their statements, that the teacher will make his pupils remember by repetition and novelty, or interesting presentation. Mr. Douglas confirms this truth. Rev. Silas Hocking had "reiterative amplifications of a simple phrase." "With the hammer of a phrase, he drives the nail of instruction into the board," says Mr. Douglas. Much of Father Vaughan's sermon too was hammered in by a refrain.

The first of the type of interesting presentation is the story. The example of this London reporter is hardly needed to prove that the story is a memory survival. Akin to the story are the facts and examples of history.

Rev. R. J. Campbell, Father Vaughan, Monsignor Croke Robinson and others get parts of their sermons in the Morning Leader by their historical facts. Comparisons save others from forgetfulness and in that point the reporter's memory is like the more fallible memories of ordinary mortals. Comparisons are the next help for the memory. The simile is indispensable in the art of remembering sermons. "We have powder in our breasts," said Pastor Thomas Spurgeon, and we should probably never have known that way of describing our inflammable passions, had not the fluttering wings of the truth been fixed in a distracted memory by the shining point of an epigram, here crowned with the jewel of a comparison. Rev. Archibald Brown combines epigram, example and comparison and has succeeded in being very much remembered. On the peg of his text "he hangs a whole wardrobe of racy aphorisms, quaint quips and homely parables." Canon Newbolt is an "epigrammist" and proves his fitness to survive by many "flashing phrases" like, "castles in the air for the imagination to dwell in are better than pig styes on the earth for sensuality to wallow in." Rev. J. H. Jowett unites many of the qualities already mentioned. His "delightful characteristic is his rich fertility of allusion and illustration, symbol and simile. He tells an anecdote with pungent humor, but his anecdotes are always apt and apposite."

So far, it might be said, it is external qualities which make the truth survive in the journalist memory. More important as preservers of truth are the internal qualities. Personality and sincerity, directness, absence of mere phrase making, avoidance of rhetorical flowers, these are qualities which this reporter harps on again and again, as qualities too which sent the truth living and quivering into his memory with vital vigor enough to survive the crush at the door after the services. Here is one statement out of a hundred very like it: "Just as his eyes save his face from insignificance, so his enthusiasm saves his oratory from conventionality. Personality can remove mountains and there is a flame in Hensley Henson's voice which sets his words on fire. He believes in his religion, his Church, and in himself. That is the one thing that completes the circuit between the pulpit and the pew. Without it sermons are corpses."

Personality, however, has its dangers for remembering and Mr. Douglas has repeatedly fallen victim to them. He remembers the man better than what he said. Is not that true of most of us? Emotion is better than personality as a fixer of thoughts. Dr. Lorimer, the "famous New York preacher," is conspicuous for true feeling. "He does not read his sermons, and here I may say," writes Mr. Douglas, "that read sermons ought to be abolished. No, he preaches with fresh, not stale, emotions, and his words fall molten from his lips." Mr. Douglas is generous to the several American preachers he heard in London.

The last point to be mentioned as a crystalizer of lasting remembrances is actuality. This quality is responsible for the largest number of longest survivals of the many sermons this reporter heard. His ideal preacher has his "eye on the hour." The science of the day with its difficulties against revelation, the social questions pressing for solution, the thorny points of theology now torturing Protestants, the position of the Bible, the nature of Christ, the personality of God, all these questions make the reporter forget the Morning Leader and merge himself into the larger humanity for whom the soul is more than a newspaper. Other means made phrases or passages survive in the memory; actually have preserved pages from oblivion.

What then will get your sermon beyond the Church door, into the paper and perhaps into a book? If Mr. Douglas may be taken as the type of a normal man, here is what you will have to do. Know the prejudices of the audience, if possible. They will remember what they like. Mr. Douglas is surely a Swinburnian and, it can be said with almost equal assurance, is a Scotchman. Enlist the prejudices in your favor. Embody your truth in a story; illustrate it with a comparison; condense it into an epigram; reiterate it with persistency. Gather historical facts with which to prove it. Show that what you defend is a living actual issue in the scientific, moral or religious world of to-day. Then if you have a clear order, and enforce what you say with sincerity, displayed in the flash of the eye, the swing of the arm and the ring of the voice, your truth will abide. It will set the hearts of your audience beating faster and so stimulate them as they hear, but more than that, it will enrich their thoughts with new life-blood and will continue to do good after the echoes of your voice have died away.

A Great Social Movement—Retreats for Laymen

"The soul of all progress is the progress of the soul."

Everywhere the lack of strenuous Catholic laymen is felt, of men of character and unswerving principles, of men that are fit to wield a wholesome influence over their fellow-men, solid, sound and conscientious leaders in social circles and for the betterment of society. Now, to form such men of character, such leaders of society for the larger or smaller social circles in which they have to move, there can be no better means than the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius.

We can make this statement the more confidently, because it has been brought out by the experience of different European countries at the present time. These retreats for laymen have been flourishing in Germany, Belgium, France, Spain and Austria for many years. In Germany about ten thousand men a year make the retreat; in little Belgium over 89,000 of the laboring classes and more than 17,000 professional men, tradesmen and employers have made the retreat since 1890.

At the house of Notre Dame du Haut-Mont in France, 30,345 men have made the retreat in the last twenty-five years. In the House of Retreats at Compstall Hall, England, opened about a year ago, 670 men actually made the retreat, while four times this number of applicants had to be turned away for lack of room.

What Spiritual Exercises for laymen are, is best explained by the very words of Retreat and Spiritual Exercises. A Retreat is a going away, a withdrawal of the layman from the hum-drum and cares of workshop, store or office, in order to devote himself, at least for three days, exclusively in silence and exercises of the spirit, amid new and soul-inspiring surroundings, under the guidance of a safe and trustworthy leader, to the quiet consideration of the one great question of life:

What, after all, am I here for on earth?

To serve God and save my soul. And all the rest is there only to help me towards this end. This point gained, all is gained; this point lost, all is lost. This is the fundamental principle of any life, and it must be the central and dominating idea of all my dealings with my fellowmen.

It stands to reason that such a training solidly worked upon in the Spiritual Exercises must have a far-reaching influence not only over our private lives, but also over all our social relations; that it must be one of the best means of forming Catholic characters and great Catholic social leaders; in one word, that it must be an immense factor in the work of social reform.

The Central-Verein, recognizing this power of the Spiritual Exercises as a means for the formation of a strong body of loyal Catholic lay-leaders, embodied in their program, at their last annual convention in Indianapolis, Ind., the following paragraph:

"We recommend participation in Retreats for Laymen held either in religious houses or in parishes at the request or with the consent of the pastor. It has been shown that great blessings have resulted from such Retreats. In Chicago a special society has been formed for the furtherance of these Retreats."

Very aptly it has been said that "the soul of all progress is the progress of the soul." The Catholic layman's soul must be filled with that inner strength and inspiration that spontaneously flows from an earnest Retreat and which makes him go forth and labor successfully as a leader in the cause of God and Holy Church. Besides, a Retreat is a time of rest for the soul, a time of spiritual recreation and invigoration spent at a great healthy summer resort of the soul. Why should the body alone have its rest? Why not give to the soul also some rest so sorely needed to keep it from being completely engrossed in things material to the utter and disastrous neglect of one's higher being?

This rest of the soul, this spiritual health cure of a Retreat will make the soul strong; it will give to the layman the same advantage, spiritual uplift, strength and peace that come to the priest and the religious out of their annual retreat. It will send him forth better equipped for the hardships of this life, a successful leader for the betterment of his fellowmen, a new powerful factor in the great work of renewing all things in Christ!

To ensure more lasting results of these Retreats, Committees on Retreats should be formed, whose duty it is to spread the movement, and to agitate for the work among friends and acquaintances.

Rev. Joseph A. Horning, S.J., the Rector of Sacred Heart College, Prairie du Chien, Wis., who informed some of the right reverend bishops of these Retreats, received the highest recommendations and eulogies for the work from the Most Reverend John J. Keane, Archbishop of Dubuque; Most Rev. S. G. Messmer, Archbishop of Milwaukee; the Right Rev. Bishops James Schwebach of La Crosse, P. J. Garrigan of Sioux City, P. J. Muldoon of Rockford, E. M. Dunne of Peoria, and A. F. Schinner of Superior.

We may be sure that the Bishop of Peoria, in his letter to Father Horning, on April 29, 1910, voiced the sentiments of all the prelates of the country as he correctly voices the sentiments of the Supreme Shepherd of Souls Pope Pius X: "I feel confident that your contemplated project to hold retreats for laymen in your college this summer will receive the cordial approval and support of every prelate and priest having at heart the salvation of souls. It will be a pleasure for me to do what I can to further the worthy movement among friends and acquaintances."

IN MISSION FIELDS

THE VINCENTIANS IN ABYSSINIA.

Missionary effort in Abyssinia has had a checkered career. From the twelfth century to the year 1839, seven different attempts were made to carry the light of the True Faith to that politically isolated country, and each attempt, after an hour of fair promise, and a long season of apostolic endeavor and hardship, ended in bloodshed and ruin. Bishop de Jacobis came in 1839 to make a fresh start and to raise the edifice of religion on the ruins of the work of his heroic predecessors. He toiled in a tempest of persecution, now general, now local, but never stilled. From the day of his arrival to that of his death in the depths of a ravine in 1860, he was never in peace, yet his was a spirit that thrived in adversity and waxed strong in trial. Several mission centres, full of hope for better things to come, were the reward of his zeal. The dawn of brighter days did not come at once, nor has it yet appeared; for, from his death to the present time, there have been no fewer than twenty-five more or less general and bloody uprisings against the mission.

By a decree of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda in 1895, all the establishments of the French Vincentians in Eritrea, Italy's African colony and protectorate, were turned over to the Capuchins of the Roman province; but, three years later, the former missionaries, not wishing to retire completely from the scenes of their earlier hardships, opened a station in Agamia, in the midst of the small tribe of Frobs, where, in the wildest and most broken country on the face of the earth, they have had to endure persecution as well. They now have four stations the chief one being Alitiéna, a village of 110 souls buried in a frightful gulch. The mission counts twelve native priests and nine native nuns. The country is too wild and the state of affairs is too precarious to warrant the introduction of European sisters. The girls' school has twenty-six pupils, and the boys' school sixty. Among these are ten young seminarists, upon whom the mission builds great hopes. In the tribe of Frobs there are, all told, 1450 Catholics. There are eight catechists, who are school teachers as well, and who may safely enter the remote villages where the presence of even a native priest would not be tolerated.

In all mission fields difficulties attend the missionary, but in Abyssinia they swarm around him. It seems to be the one remaining place in the world where he has simply no freedom of action. Among the Mussulmans conversions are extremely rare, yet the missionary among them is free to come and go. Not so among the schismatics of Abyssinia. Even the Negus Menelik, whose good qualities the press has unduly exalted, is obliged to be hostile to the extension of Catholicism unless he wishes to see his whole empire rise against him. A few years ago, he sent an order to the chief of the province to expel the Vincentians, who, thanks to the intercession of powerful friends, were not driven out forthwith. Still, the Negus, though not enforcing his decree of expulsion, was far from encouraging the presence; for in a second letter he wrote: "Don't expel them, but herd them in the gulches; if they appear on the tablelands, out with them."

Another hardship, which is not to be despised as it cannot be ignored, is found in the fact that the petty chieftains of the many neighboring tribes, knowing the insecurity of the missionaries' position, are ever ready to cause trouble if presents and peace-offerings are not forthcoming at short intervals. "They are leeches that suck our very life-blood," laments a missionary, who knows by personal experience to what lengths their cupidity goes.

A slight imprudence, a show of impatience or an expression of dissatisfaction on the part of a missionary would be enough to bring down upon him a furious band of half-savage rogues, who would burn down his church and pillage his house.

A second serious difficulty is found in the attitude of the native bishops, monks and priests, whose ignorance surpasses their wickedness. If a schismatic should be converted his property would be seized, and he and his family would be so harassed as to make life a burden. Again, it must be admitted that the national character of the Abyssinian is not of the most lovable, for he is fickle, irresolute, proud and lazy.

Good is accomplished, however, for in the midst of so much spiritual rubbish there are found true and generous souls who dare face what so many fear. Thus, during the year 1909 there were seventy-five conversions of adults, and one hundred and two first communions of adults who had lived like their cattle with nothing but baptism to distinguish them from the barbarians about them.

Five priests and two lay brothers are Europeans. For them there is a special hardship, for the Abyssinian cuisine is indescribably different from the cleanliness to which the European is accustomed; and the huts of the natives abound with vermin, such as fleas, lizards, scorpions and snakes. The climate is also so trying that foreigners suffer from frequent attacks of fever.

"Why do they stay in such a frightful place?" This is surely a strange question to put to a missionary. He who was willing to become anathema for his brethren answered it long ago. "The zeal of Thy house hath consumed me" has to the missionaries a meaning that is lost upon the pleasure-loving soul. They live in hopes of better days, even in this world; they remain on the outworks, bearing the brunt of the battle, they keep the banner of faith waving in the expectation that those who come after them may have less to do and suffer.

CORRESPONDENCE

Recent Elections in Belgium

LOUVAIN, MAY 28, 1910.

For the fourteenth consecutive time since May, 1884, the Catholics have come out victorious from the biennial legislative elections in Belgium. It was a real victory, for, while in late years the Catholic vote has steadily dwindled, this time the returns show that it has held its own everywhere, and in many conscriptions has made actual gains. In one town, however—Nivelles—the Catholics lose one seat, and hence their majority in the House falls from eight to six. But they are consoled by what actually happened in this latter place. Here a frantic anti-Clerical campaign was conducted by the Liberals, their candidate, a wealthy Jew, spending a small fortune. But the people, mostly workmen, took his money and ate his dinners, and—elected a Socialist.

As is well-known, three political parties are striving for mastery in Belgium. Against the Catholic party are arrayed the Liberals and the Socialists, neither of them strong enough to rule alone, as the Catholics have done for twenty-six years. And so, though on nearly every economic and political issue they radically differ—the Liberals are to a man proprietors, the Socialists denounce property as theft—yet they have joined hands. There is only one bond uniting them, their common hatred for religion. It is now universally recognized that the power behind it all is the same as elsewhere—Freemasonry. It is to prove this thesis, and to cripple Masonic power, that the brilliant young advocate, lately quoted in the columns of AMERICA, M. Valentin Brifaut, has devoted his life's work.

The advantages of the unholy alliance are plain, and it was this gave a color to the campaign just ended—indeed, to every campaign since 1846, when Catholics and Liberals definitively split on the very same question. Many were the arguments, political and economical, advanced by the Liberals, whose only dogma is the supremacy of the State and the Church's subjection to it; but all felt, and more than one anti-Clerical, impatient of the trammels of hypocrisy, openly said, that the sole question before the people was this, whether the country is to remain Catholic, that is, religious, or not.

The country decided that the moment for imitating France has not yet come. How long shall it decide thus? To the Catholics of Belgium is due the verdict of having early recognized two great truths, that a Catholic can and must ally his religion with politics when the interests of that religion demand it, and that the only really durable way of building up a strong Catholic vote is to go straight to the religious convictions of the people, and fortify them by association and social activity. Hence we have, on the one hand, men who in entering politics have consecrated their whole lives to the defence and spread of the Church, men of whom M. Charles Woeste is the type, and on the other, an invincible chain of societies, political, social, beneficial, educational—that covers the whole country, and by making each man's vote a real religious duty and adding thereto many incentives of a material order, assures the future of the party and by that very fact, of the Faith.

But it is undeniable that of late years, and more especially in the southern part of the country and in the large cities, the Faith has suffered serious losses. New methods are being used against it; the motive of personal interest is being strongly invoked. The Socialists, by playing on the miseries of the working class and promising them very concrete and radical improvements, have organized them and drawn them away from the Church, and, what is even worse, their children away from the Catholic school. It is plain that the old methods are not going to be always efficient, if Belgium is to be saved to the Church.

Probably the most fruitful effort being made to meet the new order of things is that undertaken at Ghent by a Dominican, Father Rutten, in the formation of Catholic labor unions. Father Rutten began well. With the permission of his superiors, he put off his religious habit for a few weeks, and went down, in miner's costume, and worked in the mines, leading the life of a miner in all its details. The result of his studies was the conviction that the best way to oppose Socialism is to organize the Catholic workmen as Socialism organizes its own. Father Rutten is a speaker of great power, as all who heard him at Mechlin last September can testify; he has become a national figure and a force to be reckoned with. His success has been great, and much is expected of Ghent in the elections of two years hence, for a Catholic gained to the Church is one gained to the party. Besides, in accord with the increase of population, twenty new seats in Parliament will have been declared before then, which means a gain of three, maybe four, seats for the Catholics, not to speak of the gains that are hoped for in the ordinary way. Hence everything points to a continuance in power of the Catholics for four or even six years, and by that time it may even be hoped they will have lifted themselves out of the partial discord and sluggishness which at present hamper them.

Catholic Vestiges in Sweden

KULLA, BY ODENSVIOLM, SWEDEN.

Wisby, the capital of Gotland, a large island in the Baltic Sea, belonging to Sweden, was once a great and famous city, though its population, dwelling in the midst of ruins, is now only a little over nine thousand. The temperature of the island is higher than anywhere else in Sweden or any other part of the world in the same latitude, 56 degrees, 55 minutes to 58 degrees North, about the latitude of the north of Scotland and the north of Labrador. Herds of small native ponies wander all the year round in densely-wooded forests, where the rarest orchids tempt the collector and ferns grow as high as a man's head. In gardens the grape-vine bears its fruit in the open air, while all over the island the mulberry and walnut trees flourish, and wild roses are so common that Wisby, or Visby, as the Swedes write it, is called the City of Roses.

At one time Wisby could have been deemed the rival of Venice. Situated in the midst of the Baltic in an island whose white chalk cliffs rise out of the granite basin that holds the northern part of that inland sea, it naturally became the headquarters of the trade of Northern Europe between Germans, Russians, Livonians, Dutch and other nationalities, and was considered one of the most important cities of the Hansa or Hanseatic League. This powerful association, founded about 1240 and dissolved about 1630, monopolized the commerce of the North, and its influence was such that it could boycott any town that dared to resist its orders. Wisby, raised to the rank of capital of the Tertial—one-third of the territories subject to the Hansa—to which belonged Riga, Dorpat and Parnau, in Livonia, Rewal in Esthonia, and several other towns on the eastern shore of the Baltic, acquired so much importance that, toward the middle of the thirteenth century, half of the population of Riga was composed of Gotlanders and Wisby's laws were in force there. Wisby's merchants carried into western Europe not only the produce of eastern Europe but the wealth of India and Persia, brought overland by caravans to Novgorod.

Thanks to this vast traffic immense riches flowed into the Gotland capital. Splendid churches, fine monasteries, luxurious mansions witnessed to the wealth and piety of its inhabitants. There were in Wisby: a hospice of the Holy Ghost, including two churches, one of which served a leper-asylum outside the walls; three convents, each with its church; and eleven parish churches, four of which belonged to foreign nations. The city was most carefully fortified with a high wall flanked by towers and bastions. It was repeatedly besieged and pillaged by Danes, Swedes and Germans. In 1361 the Danish King, Waldemar Atterdag, sacked and ruthlessly ransomed Wisby, whose wealth had hitherto been so celebrated that an old ballad says its citizens played with the choicest jewels and the women used to spin with golden distaffs. The fair city never recovered from this blow, and when, in 1645, Gotland was finally united to Sweden by the treaty of Brömsebro, Wisby had altogether lost its importance.

For Catholics, however, who gladly cherish memories of the Ages of Faith, the capital of the Scandinavian Hansa is full of attractions. To the traveler the first sight of Wisby from the incoming steamer is bewitching. Amid the silvery sea, made whiter by the reflection of the white rocks, spring loftily heavenward fantastic arches, ruins of once beautiful churches. Then the scene gradually defines itself; the city wall, seven centuries old and unrivalled in northern Europe, stands boldly forth with its high embattled towers; the houses, with their step-like gables, are embowered in verdure. One is carried back to the Middle Ages and expects every moment to see some burgher with his fur cap and gold chain round his neck, and his footmen at a respectful distance behind him, emerge from one of those narrow lanes where bridges unite opposite houses, or, mayhap, some procession of monks entering that thirteenth-century portal. But no; the rich burghers have deserted the half-empty town; the Franciscans and Dominicans and all priests were expelled long ago.

So, we turn to the magnificent vestiges of Catholicism. Beautiful, indeed, are the ruins of the Franciscan church, dedicated to St. Catherine. The nave, made threefold by two rows of twelve octagonal columns, is roofless. Nothing remains but the fine, slender Gothic arches in cut stone. Begun in the Romanesque style, the church was afterward modified to suit the taste for pure Gothic. Most imposing, however, are the ruins of St. Nicholas, which likewise shows the transition between the Romanesque and the Gothic. Two staircases inside the walls lead up to the vaulted roof, whence the view of the whole island and the sea is wonderful. The left wing of the church is adorned, on the outside, with two large rose-windows. The story goes that two carbuncles of fabulous size and value, which, set in the centre of each rose-window, served as lighthouses to the navigators, were carried off in 1361 by King Waldemar Atterdag and shipped for Denmark; but the vessels, bearing these and other treasures, foundered in a terrific storm off Stora Karlsö, three and one-half miles south of Wisby. People say that where the ships went down there can still be seen, when the sea is calm, a strange light floating on the surface.

The Church of the Holy Ghost is unique in northern Europe in that it comprises two separate stories with a large opening in the floor between the two, probably intended, as there is but one common chancel, for the blending of sound from the singers in both naves. In the Church of St. Lawrence the side walls are pierced by galleries rising one above the other. St. Mary's, the present cathedral, is the only one of Wisby's sixteen churches that has been restored for Protestant worship.

When I visited Wisby in December, 1909, I could not examine the Church of St. Clement, patron of sailors, because the secretary of the Association for the Conservation of the Gotland monuments, who kept the key in his pocket, was then on the other side of the sea at Stockholm; but through the closed grating I could discern, beneath the chancel, the foundations of a lower church, and, within those foundations, evident signs of a third and still lower edifice, probably a pagan temple. I was told by the caretaker that the Conservator wished to reserve the disclosure of his discoveries for the German emperor, who takes great interest in the ancient ruins of the island and intends to visit them this summer.

BARONESS J. ARMFELT.

Politics in Australia

MELBOURNE, APRIL 20, 1910.

My first letter to AMERICA, in which I chronicled the overthrow of the Labor Government, predicted that the Fusion party, which then came into power, would, on the next appeal to the people, meet its Waterloo and be driven from office. That prediction has now been verified. The general elections took place on April 13 with the result that the Fusion Government has resigned. In the past there were in the House of Representatives 46 Fusionists and 29 Anti-Fusionists. The people have returned now 45 Labor and Liberal Anti-Fusionists, and Mr. Deakin's party has been reduced to 30. The same story has to be told of the Senate. The 21 Fusionists and the 15 who opposed them have been replaced in the new Senate by 14 Fusionists and 22 of the Labor Party. Mr. Fisher will be Prime Minister, and a Labor Cabinet will meet the new Parliament, and take control of the government of the country.

The final numbers of the Referendum regarding the (1) Financial agreement to pay the States 25s. per capita, and (2) the taking over of the States' Debts by the Federal Government, have not yet been completed; but it is certain that the insertion of the first in the constitution will be rejected, and the reply to the second will be in the affirmative. One of the Melbourne morning dailies says:

"The State Debts Referendum, as was universally expected, has resulted in a very large majority in favor of the national policy of economic management and borrowing control. It is tantamount to a mandate to the Federal Parliament to take over the full volume of State debts with all proper expedition, and to proceed to enforce those economies which financial experts have shown us are capable of ultimately reducing the national indebtedness to a vanishing point. It is of interest in this regard to note that whereas Victoria recorded a majority exceeding 120,000 in support of the national ideal, New South Wales, by more than 110,000 votes, spoke in favor of the old parochial policy of independent debt management. Evidently New South Wales has still a long way to travel before that State can be truly said to have grasped the meaning and realized the duties of nationhood."

A Word Regarding Spain

A timely article in the Historisch-Politische Blätter (April, 1910) contains a keen analysis of the present condition of Spain from a Catholic viewpoint. Its presentation of present-day relations in that land will explain much to the thoughtful Catholic. Spain's development, political as well as economic, is looked at by all Europe through the eyes of Masonic and republican France. France is in the closest connection with Spain, whose foreign debt is mainly floated in Paris. Parts of Southern France belong to the hinterland of Spanish Barcelona, while the whole middle of Northern Spain, as far as Madrid, exports its merchandise by the Biscayan ports of France. The railroads now building across the Pyrenees will further facilitate French investments in Spain. The outcropping relation goes a long way to strengthen the hold of atheistic and radical ideas on the Spanish peninsula. French interests demand an industrial development of the invaded country, while they tend to denationalize and dechristianize it.

Of late, English influence, too, has become very active. The erection of an ever-increasing number of Anglican churches is petitioned for, sometimes in places where there are hardly more than half a dozen professing that creed, the clear purpose being to make the refusal of the petition a pretext of agitation against the Church. The monopoly of the supply of Spanish news to the outside world is practically in the hands of the Stefani Agency, which suppresses or garbles whatever is favorable to Spanish nationality and the Catholic religion. The numberless massmeetings of the people last year that protested against attacks on their Catholic schools were either ignored by this news agency or boldly represented as demonstrations against the present regime. An independent news agency is now the aim of leading Spanish Catholics, who declare that its expense will not be felt since it will reduce the cost of maintaining fair and honest newspapers. The Bishop of Jaca, Aragonia, is the advocate of this idea, which we hope will speedily be realized. An intensely Catholic Spain would inspire new strength among the distressed Catholics of France and would undoubtedly exert a great influence for good in the other Latin countries.

The Last Word on the Comet

The following letter, addressed to the Advocate of India, by a native thirsting for knowledge, is reproduced from the Bombay Examiner:

Sir.—It is with faltering penmanship that I write to your honour to allow liberty to me through the medium of your renown paper, to ask my learned or clever fellow withinside the City of Bombay to convey to my pregnant mind the meaning of comet. I ask to all people what is comet on various mornings after partaking of nocturnal slumbers I am arising at 3 p.m. and observing a wonder in the firmament of heaven. There is a star of vast magnitude with a appendage of gigantic dimension observed in the firmament. Trusting for any knowledge through your priceless newspaper both I and my numerous family will ever fall upon your bended knees and pray long and sincerely for your honour and your honour's most gracious paper.—Yours, etc.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The Leading Catholic Layman

He is not necessarily a rich man. He is not necessarily noted or notorious in legal, political or financial circles. He is not the kind of Catholic who on ornamental occasions is ostentatiously conspicuous and loud in complimentary platitudes, but silent and inert when a strong word has to be said in defence of his Church or strong action to be instituted in her interest. He is not the "leading Catholic" who is wont to be cited in the secular press in defence of any political magnate whose life or action has proved offensive to the authorities of his Church or even to its Head.

We have before us a Memoir of one who was truly a leading Catholic layman. Last year a gentleman died in Boston who had been for half a century a leader to his fellows. Charles Francis Donnelly risked his career at the outset by declining to draft for his employer in a Boston law-office a protest against the acquisition by the Jesuits of the site on which Boston College now stands. Deprived of collegiate advantages and depending on his own efforts for professional advancement, he made opportunity to master the history and principles of his Church and thus laid the foundation of Catholic leadership. Hence he was eager and able to vindicate in court and Legislature the rights of Catholic children in the public schools against Protestant aggression, the rights of Catholics to have independent schools of their own despite the frenzied efforts of bigoted agitators and legislators, and the right of Catholic priests to visit untrammelled and administer the Sacraments in the public institutions of Massachusetts.

His large legal practice did not prevent him from serving as member or chairman of the State Board of Charities for thirty years, and as active director of the Home for Catholic Destitute Children, which he helped to found in 1864, and which, during his term of office, sheltered 30,000 little ones. For his services to charity or Catholic defence he accepted no reward from individuals or community. He gave freely to every good cause, but never made his benefactions or public services a stepping-stone to office or personal aggrandizement. Hampered by no selfish ambitions, political or social, he was free to speak his own mind and walk his own course. A Catholic by the grace of heritage and the conviction of knowledge he had a healthy contempt for those who trimmed their Faith to the measure of society or curried favor with a class alien to their race and creed.

Of Irish parentage, he studied the history of his people, and having a true appreciation of values preferred their society. A lover of books, he was wont to purchase and distribute widely whatever literature he deemed serviceable to his Church and the country of his fathers, and in prose and verse wrote loyally and lovingly of both. He was not demonstrative on platforms, but he always stood with and for his race, and his private declarations never belied his public professions. And the society which weaklings seek and find not, came unsolicited to this strong man who had the courage to live and defend convictions that were true.

His religious practice and private conduct were in accord with his public action. Knowing his Faith and loving it, he led the organized defence of its principles and support of its enterprises; and he scorned to use the influence he had thus acquired for personal profit. He was a leading Catholic layman.

Prevention Worse than Cure

The collapse of a huge water-tank on the roof of the Montreal Herald building on Monday, June 13, suggests the question whether certain forms of prevention of fire, when not properly inspected and controlled in their construction, are not worse than reliance upon ordinary fire-fighting methods. Here was a twelve-thousand gallon tank intended to protect a large building against the first flames of a conflagration by sprinkling water all over the inside and outside, and yet proving in its fall more disastrous than any mere fire. The catastrophe occurred with such suddenness that none of the forty dead had a chance to escape. At half past ten in the morning, when all the 314 employees were at work on the five floors, without the slightest warning, such as would be given by smoke in an ordinary fire, but with a roar and a crash like a thunderbolt near at hand, the big tank broke down its supports, smashed the roof in like an egg-shell, carried several employees with it from the top to the bottom floor, upset the linotype machines, broke the wires carrying electric currents into the building and started a fire which, fanned by a strong breeze, was soon blazing fiercely and burning up the shattered bodies of the dead.

Two other similar collapses of tanks had occurred in Montreal during the past five years, but it needed so appalling a disaster as this to convince the civic authorities that there are grave dangers in the installation of these tanks, and that there has been inexcusable oversight in the municipal regulations concerning their erection. For instance, no provision had hitherto been made for examination of roof tanks by the Building Inspector or any of his subordinates. This omission was remedied immediately after the catastrophe. The Board of Control then appointed a committee of three engineers, not in the city's employ, to inspect every water-tank in Montreal, with power to order that any which appeared to be unsafe be emptied at once. This emergency measure will prevent any immediate repetition of the disaster; but the coroner's inquest shows, incidentally, how difficult it is to find a competent inspector of such water-tanks. The architect of the building attributed the accident, not to the collapse of the overhead water-tank, but to the giving way of one of the walls, and yet he admits that he himself examined the tank and its supports, the chief of which was the central wall, which was strong enough, he says, to bear the weight, in September, 1909, and he then found everything safe and secure.

One point which seems to have been overlooked is the great pressure of the wind on a top-heavy structure such as a roof water-tank, standing on vertical supports with its centre of gravity far above its base. A high wind may displace that centre and thus throw the whole weight on supports not made for so heavy a burden.

So serious are these difficulties that the abandonment of water-tanks is freely suggested on the plea that they are dangerous out of all proportion to their value. But Fire Underwriters point out that a water supply, independent of the city mains, is highly desirable for the protection of a large building and is obtainable by no other means. Evidently, a thorough examination by honest experts is absolutely necessary; else the fancied protection of an unstable water supply, carrying possible havoc in its very weight, would be worse than no such protection at all.

German Protestants and the Pope's Encyclical

On the occasion of the solemnities attending the celebration of the third centenary of the canonization of Saint Charles Borromeo, Cardinal and Archbishop of Milan, the Holy Father issued an Encyclical in which he compares the Modernistic tendencies of our times with the errors which Saint Charles was called upon to attack. The great Cardinal's activity coincided with the pregnant years immediately following the Council of Trent. His own archdiocese and all Northern Italy were threatened by the grievous innovations of the German "reformers" and still suffered under the general laxity of morals which had so greatly aided the religious rebellion. Charles Borromeo was a true reformer, giving above all the example of a holy life. "We ourselves must walk in the forefront," was the word he spoke to the bishops of his province in the first provincial Council held by him after his appointment to Milan's see. He proved himself a true "vessel of election" whom God's providence used to restore the integrity of the old faith throughout Lombardy and the German-speaking part of Catholic Switzerland.

To sound the praises of this great Cardinal is, of course, equivalent to a condemnation of those whose influence he for a quarter of a century strove so gallantly to break, the heretics of his day. The Holy Father does, in fact, denounce them in language at once unequivocal and dignified, but he does not mention any single person, ruler or country by name. Reputable historians of those dark days say just what Pius says, but much more bluntly and pointedly. The German Protestants seem to have expected that the Holy Father in his historical review of the period should go out of his way to bestow positive praise upon their Luther and his supporters. They flew quite into a rage at the encyclical, but in an unfortunate attempt to justify their heat they falsified the text of the pontiff's letter by mistranslations.

The Berlin Germania, the great Catholic daily of the empire, gives a few instances. After deploring the evils which preceded the "reformation" the pontiff, quoting the words of Saint Paul, continues, "then arose proud and refractory men, enemies of the cross of Christ who mind earthly things, whose god is their belly." The words italicized are evidently much modified by the fact that they are taken from Holy Scripture. The Protestant critics withheld this fact from their readers to create the impression that they were the Pope's own bitter reflection. More than this. Instead of translating "who mind earthly things," they, without warrant in the Latin original or the Italian translation, put "who mind beastly things," declaring this to be the Holy Father's characterization of the sixteenth century heretics. The encyclical speaks of the "fidei clades," the ruin of faith brought about by the so-called Reformers. The Italian text has "perversione di fede," which the Protestant translators promptly rendered "Perversion des Glaubens," which looks quite correct, if one fails to know that the word "Perversion" has so ugly a significance in present-day German that it is rarely used in decent circles.

Having thus constructed a suitable text the "furor Protestanticus" proceeded to tell the Vatican just what Lutheran Germany thought of the Encyclical. The official Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, in its government section reproduced these mistranslations, and in its comments telegraphed over the country, sounded a challenge and a war-cry. Happily calmer counsel prevailed and a threatening crisis was averted by the dignified action of the Vatican, secure in its confidence that its position would eventually be understood. That its confidence is not without foundation a recent word of a prominent Protestant journal shows: "The government is neither Catholic nor Protestant. It must not enter into the strife between creeds. To defend the Protestant belief is the province of the Supreme Church Council. We sincerely hope that the Chancellor will not commit a blunder similar to the one committed some time ago by the governor of Alsace-Lorraine."

Tardy Justice

Some of the exchanges which come to AMERICA published last week an Associated Press despatch from St. Paul, Minn., containing a retraction of a statement sent broadcast by that news agency in May last. Our readers will recall the sensational reports accompanying the story of the murder of Rev. Edward J. Walsh, of St. Paul, by a drink-crazed man on May 29. The despatch to which reference is here made contains a presentation of the true facts of the lamentable tragedy, and admits that the sensational account published at the time was unwarranted and unjust. On the testimony of those who had full opportunity to know him well Father Walsh is declared to have been a man of splendid public spirit, and a priest of the purest public and private life. This we believe is the first occasion of notable record in which the Associated Press people have attempted a tardy justice, after having telegraphed false and scandalous stories of the kind in every direction. They who have succeeded in this case in bringing the Press officials to retract their unwarranted charges deserve the grateful thanks of the entire Catholic body. And their successful struggle is an evidence of what may be done in the not infrequent calumnies originating from the Press offices, if practical and persistent effort be made to nail the falsehoods. One matter of regret there is in the justice now done to Father Walsh's memory. The retraction sent out by the Associated Press is a lame one, and its publication takes place three long weeks after the date of the propagation of the cruelly unjust slander upon a good priest's name.

Baptists Too in the Field

Accurate or detailed information regarding the alleged attack on American Baptist missionaries in the province of Avellino, Italy, has not yet reached this country. The coloring given to the reports sent over to the New York Times and its associate journal, the Public Ledger of Philadelphia, justifies the suspicion that the usual anti-Catholic agency is at work. Mr. James P. Stuart, it appears, was sent to Italy by the American Board of Baptist Missions to investigate the Baptist missions in that country. "A superstitious mob at Avellino," so run the despatches, "threatened to lynch him." A wonderful escape was that of Mr. Stuart, for was he not "in the hands of a mob of superstitious" men, women and children, "ignorant of the most elementary liberty," and steeped "in medieval intolerance?"

The affair occurred at the time of the earthquake and the superstitious inhabitants somehow "got the impression that the earthquake was due to the presence of these American missionaries." The case was laid before Premier Luzzatti only on June 16. This much is entrusted to the Times and Ledger; as to the details, Mr. Stuart and the press correspondent are as silent as the Sphinx. Vatican, American Methodists, Fairbanks, Roosevelt, Leishman are mentioned in the jumbled report. This leads us to suspect that the energetic Baptists of America, or, at least the American Baptist missionaries in Italy, are jealous of the notoriety acquired by Mr. Tipple and the Methodists. Speaking in all frankness, we admit we had utterly forgotten the existence of Baptists in the land which above every other the Catholic Church may claim as her patrimony.

It is said that generous contributions have been pouring into the missionary field of the Methodists, by grace of the notoriety achieved by them during the past few months. The Baptists are in need of that higher potential which money alone can give. Their activity dates back to 1870, and the work has spread until there are now, says the report in question, "Twenty-five Baptist churches and thirty-seven stations in the Peninsula and Sicily, Sardinia and Austria. The cities containing churches include Rome, Milan, Venice, Modena, Carpi, Bari and Naples." But alas! "the total membership is less than 1,000." The information is added that "the mission headquarters is in Rome," that all may know that the Methodists are not the only evangelists who have the courage to carry on their proselytizing in the very shadow of the Vatican. What action at law or in the field Mr. Stuart contemplated when he appealed to Luzzatti is not revealed; but the Premier, "knowing the character of his countrymen, has urged upon Mr. Stuart that no retaliating measures be taken, and Mr. Stuart has agreed not to go back to Avellino at present." Very sound advice and a very sensible resolve.

New York's Loyalty to the Holy See

Commenting, in a brief editorial paragraph, on the recent celebration of the fortieth anniversary of Archbishop Farley's ordination, the Independent goes on to say: "He took pains to let it be known that the Church is patriotic. The chimes played the 'Star Spangled Banner' and the national flag was unfurled . . . and nowhere was the Papal flag of orange and white to be seen within or without the Cathedral." The malice of the innuendo is truly characteristic of the Independent, and might be annoying if one could forget the unbroken record of the unfaltering loyalty of the see of New York and its bishops to the person and the authority of the Pope-King. It is only a few days ago too since, in a public address, His Grace Archbishop Farley, referred to the fact that New York's first church, founded by the Jesuit Father Farmer, was placed under the patronage of St. Peter, a happy augury of the fidelity that has always been manifested by the Catholics of New York to the teachings and jurisdiction of the Holy See.

LITERATURE

Diary of a Visit to the United States in 1883. By LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN. New York: The United States Catholic Historical Society.

The author, then Charles Russell, Q. C., made his visit as one of a distinguished party. He became Henry Villard's guest on the tremendous picnic in honor of the completion of the Northern Pacific Railway, now one of the traditions of the West, splendidly eclipsing what had before been held the acme of magnificence, Ben. Holladay's Alaskan excursion, which carried Secretary Seward to view his purchase in the North. Leaving the Villard party on Puget Sound, Mr. Russell visited in San Francisco his sister, Mother Russell, the leader of the pioneers of the Sisters of Mercy in California, and returned to New York via Denver and St. Louis. The book consists of his daily notes of travel, written for the entertainment of his family, and it is a charming account of his impressions.

Little escaped his keen observation. Dishes, clubs, oratory, manners are commented on with a generosity of praise and a kindly reticence of censure. He saw in the Brooklyn and the St. Louis bridges the grace which conceals their bulk, and was anxious about the strength of the trestles spanning the mountain gulches of the West. The ordinary traveler is impressed with the huge timber of the Pacific Slope: he noted also the smallness of the trees of the Eastern States. He had an eye for cattle and for strange methods of farming; and, as one would expect, had much to say about American racing, condemning very decidedly—no, not the bookmaking—but the Jerome Park track as an outrage upon any self-respecting horse.

Getting only a passing glance of things so many and so various, he could not be always exact. He confounds fall wheat with spring, though he explains its cultivation perfectly. In Chicago he put up at the Palmer House, not at the Palace. He sailed from Tacoma to San Francisco in the Queen of the Pacific. He got a notion that perhaps she was the Queen of the South; and so, with an impartiality becoming the future judge, he calls her in the space of a few lines twice by one of these names and twice by the other. Whence came that idea? Did the ship's name recall to his mind Solomon's guest, or did it revive a long buried phantasm connected with the General Screw Steamship Company and the Crimean War? An interesting psychological problem for an idle philosopher. The reader may search the map of Vancouver Island in vain for Navarino, but he would see Nanaimo at a glance; and the Gulf of Georgia, between that island and the mainland, is hard to recognize under the name George's Bay. San Tego is a strange variant for San Diego in California, though Taranita and Inniato, for the Pennsylvanian Juniata, are more melodious. The author wrote hastily: his wife transcribed his notes in Ireland. This is sufficient to explain the more obvious misprints which his editors surely might have corrected without violating their duty to his text. But Charles Russell alone is responsible for the "Sue" Indians. In introducing them to his family he confesses to misgivings as to the spelling of their name. These he afterwards acknowledges to have been well-founded, and tells all concerned that the proper spelling is Sioux.

From Tacoma he runs across to Victoria and visits Esquimalt, which he says is pronounced "Squimalt." This to a Victorian is about as heartrending as is to a San Franciscan to be told that the people of his city call it "Frisco," a solecism into which the author will unhappily fall. His genial cicerone, Alexander Munro, of the Hudson's Bay Company, never said "Squimalt," though he certainly made the E very obscure. We are fond of Victoria, and are sorry the author felt unkindly towards it as a place where he had been charged two shillings for a shave. We suspect we know who made the charge, which must have included something besides. Anyhow, we are sure that had Charles Russell been able to look twenty years into the future and see that gentleman's sister entertaining the Duke and Duchess of York, now King George and Queen Mary, at afternoon tea on her lawn, he would have been proud to pay a pound for the privilege of such a shave. Colonists understand that the potentialities, not the present actualities, are what count; and England's imperial problem will be in a fair way to solution when the English mind grasps this first principle.

The author naturally is not strong in West American geography. On crossing the Snake River he did not pass from Washington to Oregon, neither after leaving Puget Sound was he off the Oregon coast. If taken by "the beauty of the night" he remained on deck till the ship had passed Cape Flattery, Destruction Island, Gray's Harbor and the mouth of the Columbia, and only then "retired to his luxurious quarters," he did not turn in until six or seven o'clock next morning. We are not finding fault. On the contrary, for one who knows, these inevitable slips only increase the delight of this record of impressions which therefore does not pretend to accuracy of detail. They show the man, and make his work as piquant as would the cleverest sketches of his friend, Sir Frank Lockwood. We could ill spare any of them: we would not be deprived of the delicious "Sues" for a "wilderness of monkeys," otherwise statistical facts. We must not forget, too, that the author has from time to time the Dickens touch. The story of "the voice at my elbow," asking in view of Mount Rainier: "Well, sir, what do you think of our little hill?" is worthy of "Martin Chuzzlewit," and truer to nature than its amusing exaggerations.

The author has a kind word for San Francisco. Perhaps it really impressed him. Perhaps there more than elsewhere he felt at home, as the brother of Mother Russell had every right to do. Brother and sister had the same large heart. Nothing affected us more in his notes of travel than his zeal in looking up people from his own county, friends and connections of those at home, and his care to have conveyed to the latter the news he could gather of their dear exiles. None was so humble as to be forgotten by this man already great, and on the point of rising to the loftiest height.

We do not see why the editors abandoned the author's modest naming of his work for the pompous title page, much of which we have omitted at the head of this review. The titles beneath the portraits are not, to our mind, in good taste, nor are they, we think, altogether exact usage. "Of Killowen" should, in our opinion, have been added to the author's name on the cover. Another Lord Russell once visited America, going as far as the Pacific coast. He did not go thither to visit his sister, a nun, but was drawn by a personal interest in certain divorce proceedings at Reno, after which he was able, by Nevada law, to contract a marriage, which we believe caused him some trouble in England. It would be well to distinguish one from the other on every possible occasion. Father Matthew Russell gives an affectionate and agreeable introduction to the book, and Thomas F. Meehan, of the Catholic Historical Society, adds a brief closing word on the West of to-day.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Daniel Boone and the Wilderness Road, by H. ADDINGTON BRUCE, New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.50.

As one now journeys at ease through Kentucky and Tennessee and sees on every side all the signs of civilization and refinement, it is hard to realize that a little over a century ago, the sturdy pioneer took his life in his hands when he ventured across the Alleghanies into those trackless openings and forests which were the lurking-places of bloodthirsty savages. The story of the coming of the white settlers, of the hardships that were their lot, of midnight alarms, of deeds of fiendish cruelty, of the final overthrow of the Indian power and the winning of the States to peace and industry, is the story of Daniel Boone and the Wilderness Road. The romancer creates his characters for the occasion; the historian must present them as his researches find them.

We could have depicted a more glorious old age for the hero, we could have anticipated the tardy justice of Kentucky to his memory; but that would not have been history. Yet the volume has the attractiveness of fiction, for it deals with the deeds of daring of those men, women and children who opened the way for the less valiant, less heroic, to follow. Daniel Boone's exploits can never again be repeated in our country, for the red-skin is no longer a marauder; but a better knowledge of him and his brave companions, such as we learn from the book before us, ought to make us prize more highly the share that they had in laying the foundation of our national greatness.

Oberammergau. By JOSEPHINE HELENA SHORT. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. $1.00 net.

This is a description of the Bavarian village, to which so many travelers are wending their way in this year of the Passion Play, and of its people. The writer is an American, who witnessed the play many times during its presentation in 1900, and who felt the charm of the village and its people to such a degree that she returned for a visit of a month among them at the close of that year's performances. The intimate friendliness thus established with the Oberammergau villagers has taught her to write of them and of their one lofty ideal, the Passion Play, with singularly sympathetic appreciation. An excellent résumé of the Play is included in the little volume, which contains moreover a treasury of valuable notes and bits of information of exceeding value to those contemplating a visit to the village on the banks of the Ammer during the coming summer. Miss Short's book will prove an invaluable hand-book as well as a charming sketch of all that is clustered about the most moving religious and dramatic spectacle in the world to-day.

Practical Hints on Education to Parents and Teachers. A Translation from her original German work by ELISE FLURY. New York: Benziger Bros. 75 cents net.

One is tempted to say marvelous! At last we have a compact little manual on educational principles, the writer of which, in the psychological hints which are given, is not afraid to speak of prayer and the reception of the Sacraments when she treats of the education of the will. Evidently the years spent by Miss Flury in the practical work of teaching have been profitable to herself, since her little book gives from ripe experience excellent counsel to those who are to deal with the education of children. The book will be a useful manual in the hands of parents, priests, teachers, nurses, so wide is its scope and so fully do its "hints" cover the details of the forming and training of children. It is, we are happy to say, loyally Catholic throughout—a quality specially notable in the chapters on authority and obedience, delicacy and the choice of a state of life. We especially recommend these "Practical Hints" to all who have to deal with the difficult task of preparing young teachers for their all-important life work.

La Vieille Morale à l'école. By JOSEPH TISSIER. Paris: Pierre Téqui.

Under this title, which might be thus paraphrased: "The Old Gospel Truths in the Modern Class-Room," l'abbé Tissier, now Archpriest of the cathedral of Chartres, has gathered into one volume the lectures and addresses of a long life spent in the cause of Catholic education. His experience and talents, to which half a dozen volumes on kindred subjects give ample testimony, enable him to speak with authority. There are now and then, it is true, in this useful and at times stirring book, passages of purely local and transient interest. It would have been wiser to omit them. But many of the lessons, even if neither original nor new, are of vital importance, not only for the audience which the speaker addressed, but for us also. Those whose duty it is to address college graduates might dip into these pages and be the richer and the wiser for having done so. A strict organic unity does not prevail throughout the work. The lessons, however, are logically grouped under these four different heads: (1) The Principles of Moral and Christian Education; (2) The Great Model, Christ; (3) Object Lessons; (4) Christian Watchwords. Thus ordered they form a fairly complete program of social and Christian activities.

The titles of some of l'abbé Tissier's addresses speak for themselves. "Don't Be Commonplace," "The Price of Life," "The Virgin's Son," "The Flag," "Soldiers, Not Dolls," "Not Clowns, but Men." The facts quoted by the author in his introduction, and his review of the present state of education in French schools, clearly prove how timely and needed is the present book. Sound Christian and Catholic morality has been officially demonetized in France, and a spurious, debased currency put into circulation and foisted upon the people. From many points of view this high-minded priest holds up the old genuine coins, with their noble superscriptions and tells his countrymen they are the only ones to restore the welfare and credit of the nation.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

Service Abroad. By the Right Reverend H. H. MONTGOMERY, D.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co.

These are lectures delivered by one of the many returned colonial bishops in England, and are supposed to be addressed to young men thinking of going out to Anglican missions. They contain a good deal of practical advice as to how one is to avoid hurting the feelings of natives and colonials, which must be useful to all, though some of the recommendations do not give one a high idea of the good manners of the common run of Anglican missionaries. The spiritual advice does not amount to much, which is not to be wondered at, since the author starts from the principle that those he addressed must ignore the commission given by our Lord, and preach a new gospel of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. His attitude toward Moslemism is remarkable, and towards natives who profess conversion but cling to vices, is curious, but not surprising, in a church knowing so little of Sacraments as does the Church of England. We were surprised, however, to find a Cambridge man following a custom born of modern ignorance and writing "bi-product" for by-product.

Longman's Historical Illustrations. England XI-XIV Century. LONGMANS GREEN & Co. New York, etc.:

Here are four quarto portfolios, each containing a dozen plates with explanatory notes showing the dress, arms, habitations of the century under consideration. Ideal streets, too, are represented by the bringing together of surviving buildings and such as have been handed down by means of art. Altogether the series gives one a very good opinion of the ways of people and their culture in the calumniated Middle Ages, and we recommend it to history instructors as a useful aid. The price of each portfolio is moderate, two shillings and sixpence in England. As the illustrations are intended for the young, why were they not colored? It would not have added much to their price, and it would have added immensely to their usefulness.

The Iona Series, issued by the Catholic Truth Society of Dublin, Ireland, under the editorship of Rev. H. Brown, S.J., is a valuable addition to Catholic literature. It takes its name from the island which St. Columcille and his successors made the most famous nursery of Irish missionary zeal. The title volume, "Isle of Columcille," is by Shane Leslie, the distinguished young Ulster convert who, when disinherited by his father, retained, with ardent faith, the riches of literary power. A discriminating critic says of this book: "A refreshing elegance dominates his work. With his wealth of conception and the delicate finish of the superior hand he beautifies the unattractive and transfigures the commonplace; and he tells his tale in language of a conquering charm." Other volumes which also combine true Catholic feeling with finished literary form are: "The Coming of the King," by Arthur Synan; "Hiawatha's Black Robe," by E. Leahy, and "Marcus Aurelius, A Study in Ideals," by John C. Joy, S.J. Soon to appear are: "A Group of Nation Builders" (O'Donovan, O'Curry, Petrie), by Rev. P. McSweeney; "St. Malachy and His Works," by Rev. G. O'Neill, S.J., and "A Defender of the Right" (Archbishop O'Hurley, the Martyr), by E. Concannon. They are handsome duodecimos in cloth binding, embossed with artistic designs from the ruins of Iona, and are splendid value for 37 cents, postage included. Herder is the American agent.

LITERARY NOTES

A writer in the New York Times Saturday Review dismisses cavalierly René Bazin's new novel, "La Barrière," as a frankly religious novel of the propagandist kind. Referring to the author the critic says: "His religious fervor is increasing as the years go by, and he has evidently set out to produce not an impartial social study, but a work of Catholic propaganda pure and simple." Consequently his work cannot be artistic. This sort of criticism is growing tiresomely common. It represents fairly well the incapacity of the shallow and ignorant school of critics, principally American, whom rapidly multiplying editors encourage because—we can conceive no other reason—their services are cheap. They have a superficial inkling of the way the wind blows, and they endeavor to go with the wind. It is easier; mental effort is too much for them.

The writer whom we have quoted has some knowledge of the fact that it is comparatively safe to censure religion, especially Catholicism. But he has no knowledge of the principles of criticism. Why, for instance, is "an impartial social study" more likely to be artistic than "a work of Catholic propaganda?" What gem of literature can be pointed to which is "an impartial social study?" On the other hand, the slightest sense of historical perspective would have saved the critic in the New York Times Saturday Review from implying that a great artistic work could not be a work of Catholic propaganda. Has he ever heard of the "Divine Comedy" by a certain Dante? or, better still, of the "Hind and Panther," a classic poem by a poet of the name of Dryden? Would he regard the late Henry Harland's Italian novels as artistic? They are perilously near being "works of Catholic propaganda." Certainly they are not "impartial social studies."

To enlarge the topic, what about the religious painters of the Renaissance? Were they not Catholic propagandists in the sense of our critic? What are our modern tawdry canvases, with their "impartial social studies," compared with those of the Italian, Spanish and Dutch painters, who felt the Catholic Faith and put it boldly and reverently into every nook and corner and all over their incomparable pictures and frescoes? We do not say that a religious spirit will make an artist; but it is clear that it will not unmake one who is. Art was great until, first, modern Protestantism made religion an ugly bugbear and, afterwards, unbelief, the natural child of Protestantism, made it conscious and timid and hesitant in the soul of the artist. Now we are getting "impartial social studies" instead of "Last Judgments;" the portraits of commonplace men and women, who happen to own stocks and bonds, instead of wonderful "Madonnas;" the ballet and the boulevard and worse, instead of celestial visions with messages and aspirations for all who gaze upon them. What cheap and thin criticism it is that the New York Times Saturday Review writer gives his readers!

* * *

Another shining example of critical dullness occurs in the American Bookman for June. The Saturday Review, of London, declared that the manuals used in the French government schools assailed Christianity. The manuals teach children that what are called the truths of religion cannot be known scientifically; therefore they are free to choose any religion or no religion. The editor of the Bookman cannot see how this assails Christianity. This is one of his brilliant comments: "It is very hard for an American to guess the workings of the British journalistic intellect on this subject of religious teaching in the schools, for in this country we have had no such training in evasion and hypocrisy as the long discussions of the two Education Bills have offered to the British mind." Isn't the smug and conscious superiority of this passage richly funny? We are Americans, born and bred, and we love our country and we defend it against critics, especially English critics. But what can we say or do when our case is given away in this fashion?

If the Bookman paragrapher had a fraction of the "English journalistic intellect" he could not have written the way he did. "Children, Christianity teaches things that cannot be scientifically proved. You do not have to believe it." "My child, the good moral character of your father and mother cannot be scientifically proved. You don't have to believe it." If a teacher who evidently did not believe in the virtuous protestation of the editor that he was "a respectable member of the lower middle class" were to teach the editor's young son that he need not believe in the virtue of his parents, because it cannot be scientifically proved, we are to suppose the editor would not consider himself assailed, but would rather applaud the teacher for encouraging the intellectual freedom of his boy. Now when we consider on the one side that the French government and its teachers are professed unbelievers in Christianity, and on the other, that Christianity rests on firmer proofs than any personal reputation can, we may get a faint idea of the denseness of one American journalistic intellect. There was a time when the Bookman paragraphs had intellectual quality. But it may have been too expensive a quality for the publishers.

A friend in the South has called our attention to a good joke on the New Orleans Picayune, or its readers, or the Scotsman. We do not see clearly whom the laugh is on.

In the Sunday Picayune, June 5, there appeared a two-column article, running down about a fourth of the page, with the caption, "Scotch Writer Praises the Sagacity of the Spider." It was introduced with the familiar parenthesis—"Special Cable to the Picayune," and dated, "London, June 4." The opening paragraph reads as follows: "An interesting article is contributed to the Scotsman by a writer who has been studying the life and habits of the spider and who has been greatly struck by its intelligence." And then comes the article "contributed to the Scotsman," which is nothing more or less than an essay by our old friend, Oliver Goldsmith, which appeared in the Bee the century before the last under the title, "The Sagacity of Some Insects." Goldsmith would have material for another bright paper on sagacity if he had lived to see this.

EDUCATION

Fairminded men will agree that even justice has ruled in the settlement of the controversy regarding the University of Pennsylvania scholarships. It will be remembered that a summary of the controversy was given in this column two weeks ago. The city of Philadelphia proposed to cede to the University for educational purposes certain property lying along the Schuylkill River. In return for this grant the University pledged itself to establish and to maintain perpetually seventy-five free scholarships in any department of that institution, "to be awarded by the Mayor of the city to deserving students of all the schools of Philadelphia." Friends of the public school system wished to so amend the bill legalizing the grant as to reserve these scholarships to students of the public schools exclusively. Opposition to this view was widespread. The property to be donated, it was argued, belonged to the city, hence all taxpayers should in justice enjoy the privilege that came to the city because of the latter's gift to the University, and the scholarships should consequently be declared free to deserving students of all the schools of the city whether public or private

* * *

The question was hotly discussed in Philadelphia during the week before the meeting of Councils, in the jurisdiction of which bodies the dispute lay. Petitions pro and con were sent in by the various societies and organizations of Philadelphia, and the press gave much space to the controversy. Those favoring the amendment to the bill used the old argument that no appropriations shall be made for any charitable, educational or beneficent purpose to any sectarian institution. Those who desired the passage of the original bill claimed that there was here no question of an appropriation for sectarian purpose. A privilege resting upon an act of the Councils, representing the whole city, should, they insisted, revert to all of the taxpayers of the city, and it would be an injustice formally to exclude from the enjoyment of such a privilege any section of the city's people.

* * *

Last week the matter came up for action in the Councils' meeting, and after full and free discussion and the consideration of new petitions presented to those bodies, the Councils overwhelmingly defeated all attempts to limit the privilege of the scholarships as guaranteed perpetually by the University to public school pupils. In Common Council, on final passage of the original unamended bill, the vote was 59 to 6. The vote to concur in this judgment in Select Council was 38 to 3.

Philadelphia is to be congratulated on the fairness its legislative Councils manifested in the face of the attempt to override justice through the worn-out cry of "no sectarianism." There is no sectarianism in the stand a growing number of parents take for religious instruction in schools. And these parents, be they Catholic, Quaker or Jewish, ought not to be called upon to bear the burden of double taxation when they insist that their children receive that form of religious training of which they, the children's parents, approve. The claim that the scholarships in question should go to public school children exclusively, rested on an exaggerated presumption of those who favor the public schools. When shall the wider question of fair-dealing in the matter of the distribution of the school tax in favor of all citizens alike, be taken up and decided in a similarly just way?

The Rev. W. Engelen, S.J., at one time engaged in educational work in the Jesuit colleges of the middle west, but now of Tokyo, Japan, where he is helping to prepare the way for the institution of a Jesuit University in the Japanese capital, writes thus concerning the difficulty of acquiring the Japanese language:

"The written and spoken languages are very different. The Japanese have two systems of writing, each including about seventy syllables instead of our twenty-six letters. Many words are not even written by these syllables, but by Chinese ideographs, of which about two thousand are used in Japanese. Baron Kikucki, an eminent educator, said in his English lectures that the children cannot read the most ordinary prints. This is still the case after they have passed through the higher elementary course, and in a less degree even with those who have received a secondary education. I have no doubt that such a state of things cannot last very long in this busy world."

Old-fashioned teachers are apt to affirm that one very serious defect that appears in present day teaching of English arises from the lack of formal grammar lessons in elementary schools. Our young people do not write well—and teachers find the task of training them to write well a difficult one, simply because the old grammar drill in parsing and sentence analysis has been so largely superseded by the word studies and language lessons now in vogue. Even that unjustly derided burden of the school children of thirty and forty years ago, Lindley Murray, by constant application of rule to example and of example to rule, taught young people to think and to construct a sentence. One is gratified then to note that teachers are beginning to recognize where the policy of these latter years has been deficient. A writer in the June number of the Educational Review well remarks, "there is a tangle of aims in teaching grammar, and of notions as to the scope of grammar and its place in the curriculum. We shall, of course, not have really right teaching of grammar until these aims and notions are clarified and unified." The writer has done a commendable share towards this unification in calling attention to a situation which "constitutes the most serious hindrance, the most effective immediate barrier, that now stands in the way of profitable teaching of grammar in our public schools." This, as he describes it, is a lack of agreement in the terminology of text-books. The writer, in a paper which merits attentive reading, says that there are about fifty different text-books in grammar in the schools of this country. There are about thirty in fairly extensive use; and of these he has not been able to find two that agree absolutely in terminology.

Basing the objections on the considerable expense for dress entailed, and on the use in their preparation of time which should be given to regular school work, the School Boards of several dioceses have this year passed resolutions asking school authorities to eliminate elaborate and formal closing exercises. Simple programs made up of short addresses and exercises which do not require too much preparation are urged in their stead.

SOCIOLOGY

We have received the twentieth annual report of the Christ Child Society of Washington, D. C., and its branches in New York, Chicago, Omaha, Toledo, Ellicott City, Davenport, Worcester and Los Angeles. It is a model of what such a report should be. Each committee tells clearly and in a few words just what it has done, and one sees that the sum total of good work accomplished is considerable. Everything that can be imagined in social work for children is included. The colored children and the Italians, as their need is greatest, are objects of especial care. The balance sheet is a credit to the Treasurer, though we regret that the total amount involved in it is less than $3,000. The charitable of Washington and of the other cities in which it is found, can send their alms with perfect confidence to an organization so well organized and administered. It has the approval of both the Cardinal and the Apostolic Delegate.

The Society of St. Vincent de Paul of New York invites all its friends to visit its Fresh-Air work at Spring Valley Farm. This is easily reached by the Erie train from West 23d Street, or by auto via the Fort Lee Ferry. St. Elizabeth's Home for Convalescents is there, open all the year round. Now the summer work for the mothers, working girls and children of the tenements is beginning. Ten dollars will give one woman or two children a rest for two weeks there under the elevating influences of religion and send them back to the city better in both body and soul. The Society of St. Vincent de Paul cannot bear the burden alone. Its members are on the whole men of very moderate means; and it therefore appeals to the great holiday-making public to help them. Get God's blessing on your own vacation by sharing its benefits with God's poor. Contributions should be sent to Mr. John J. Berry, 375 Lafayette Street, New York.

Professor Walter Willcox, of Cornell, in a letter to Dr. Eugene H. Porter, State Commissioner of Health, effectually puts an end to the controversy over the effect of the tuberculosis crusade in this state aroused by a somewhat general misconception of an article by Professor Willcox in the March issue of the Department's bulletin. By many Professor Willcox's article was taken to mean that the tuberculosis crusade in this state has had little if any effect on the death-rate, but his letter to Commissioner Porter, which follows, conveys a different idea:

"Since my article was published in the March number of the Monthly Bulletin showing that 'No influence of the special campaign against tuberculosis can be traced in the figures of 1900 to 1908 inclusive,' the totals for 1909 have been compiled with more cheering results. In New York State outside of New York City, the deaths from all causes except tuberculosis increased from 55,314 in 1900 to 59,529 in 1909, or eight per cent., which is certainly less than the rate of increase of the population. But during the same period the deaths from tuberculosis actually decreased from 6,171 to 6,149. The deaths from all other causes increased by 4,215; the deaths from tuberculosis decreased by 22. I think we may ascribe this difference to the campaign against tuberculosis which has been fought so energetically in our state since 1907. It would take some time for the campaign to influence the death-rate, and its effect would naturally be cumulative as facilities for the proper care of tuberculous patients multiplied."

High prices of meat in England have led to considerable agitation for the removal of the prohibition to import live cattle from Argentina, the agitators asserting that the Foot and Mouth disease, the cause of the prohibition, had disappeared from that country. The agitation has been stopped by information received from the Argentine Government that the disease has broken out again in five provinces.

ECONOMICS

It is impossible to be indifferent towards Rudyard Kipling. All that know him either admire him or hate him. This is most just; for he too either admires without bounds or hates ferociously. Moreover the same person will admire him today and hate him to-morrow. This too is as it should be, for Rudyard Kipling is equally versatile. It is hard to say what are his real feelings towards Americans and things American. Sometimes his praises are dithyrambic: sometimes his railings are the same. Not that he knew Americans thoroughly. He makes Tarvin, in "The Naulakha" speak of "boot-laces." So they are called in England. Perhaps there may be found some in New York or Boston to call them so. But Tarvin was a Westerner of the West, even of Colorado, and he would never have said anything but "shoe-strings." This, however, is not economics; and, omitting his affectionate abuse, we are going to show Rudyard Kipling as an economist discussing American economics. In "From Sea to Sea" (written in 1888), Letter No. 36, we read:

"Twenty years hence the centre of population will be far west of Chicago. Twenty years later it will be on the Pacific Slope. Twenty years after that America will begin to crowd up, and there will be some trouble." He did not quite understand "the centre of population," but no matter. ". . . The cry that the land is rich enough to afford protection will cease with a great abruptness. At present it is the farmer who pays most dearly for the luxury of high prices. In the old days when the land was fresh and there was plenty of it and it cropped like the Garden of Eden, he did not mind paying. Now there is not so much free land, and the old acres are needing stimulants, and the farmer, who pays for everything, is beginning to ask questions. The American nation seldom attempts to put back anything it has taken from Nature's shelves. It takes what it can and moves on. But the moving on is nearly finished, and then the Federal Government will have to establish a Woods and Forest Department, the like of which was never seen in the world before. And all the people who have been accustomed to hack and burn timber will object. . . . The manufacturer will have to be content with smaller profits. . . . and the railways will no longer rule the countries through which they run. . . .

"Yes, it will be a spectacle, this big clashing colt of a nation that got off with a flying start being pulled back by the jockey, Necessity. There will be excitement when the people discover that what they considered the outcome of their Government is but the rapidly diminishing bounty of Nature; and that if they want to get on comfortably they must tackle every single problem from labor to finance humbly. . . ."

It seems to us that we are beginning to hear something like this from our public men to-day. Kipling wrote it more than twenty years ago. Perhaps there is more in him than the telling of plain tales and the weaving of thunderous songs. Our neighbors across the border who are beginning to-day where we were thirty years ago, might do worse than take notice and be wise in time.

SCIENCE

Analyses show natural mineral waters to be radio-active. Their curative properties, medical experts declare, are, in great measure, due to this property. Dr. Alfred Gradenwitz finds that this radio-activity can be produced artificially. Accordingly the little city of Kreutznach, rich in radium deposits, has become a centre for the manufacture of these artificial waters. The charging is effected by allowing the inactive liquid to remain in contact, for a considerable time, with the insoluble salts. An interesting fact is that radio-activity decreases if the waters are subjected to heavy jarrings. This will interfere greatly with their transportation.

The Meteorological Observatory of India has been investigating earth electric currents for the past few years. Results recently published show that the potential gradient has its chief minimum and maximum in the early hours of the morning and evening respectively. The conductivity is above the average during the night and early morning, and below during the day and evening. Sunshine causes a diminution of the air's conductivity, but the effect lags as much as two hours behind the cause. The intense solar radiation of the Indian dry weather raises into the lower atmosphere a large quantity of dust which, in all likelihood, is the chief cause of the lowering of conductivity. This is important, for it leads to the belief that sunlight has, if any, only a small effect in the natural ionization of the lower strata of the air.

Attempting to explain why wireless stations work better by night than by day, Marconi says: "Sunlight seems to affect the antenna. The upper air, rich in ions produced by ultra-violet solar radiation, absorbs during the day the energy distributed by the station. Besides, the wavelengths of the Hertzian radiations play an important rôle in this regard, an increase in wave length usually causing a decrease in efficiency, though this condition is subject to exception also, for by using radiations of great wave length, the energy received during the day may exceed that received by night. The problem is very complex."

A self-recording medical thermometer has been designed in Germany which is sensitive to the slightest variations in temperature of the human body. The parts are a platinum spiral, encased in a quartz glass capsule, a four volt battery, a milli-voltmeter and a registering drum. The working of the instrument depends on the principle that the change in the temperature of a conductor causes a change in the resistance. Its chief object is to enable the physician to study the effects of drugs on patients.

Gray and Ramsay have recalculated their figures for the half-life period of radium, which they now put at 1744 years. One gramme, then, of radium, would, after the lapse of the above stated number of years, weigh but half a gramme.

ECCLESIASTICAL ITEMS

The examinations of candidates for entrance into St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, New York, will take place at Cathedral College, 462 Madison Avenue, on Monday, June 27th, and Tuesday, June 28th, at 9 A. M. Applicants for admission to the Seminary will present themselves personally at the Archbishop's House, 452 Madison Avenue, on Friday, June 24th, or Saturday, June 25th, between 10 A. M. and 12, with letters of recommendation from their Reverend Pastors, and from their Colleges.

The examinations for students desiring to enter Cathedral College, the Preparatory Seminary of the Archdiocese, will be held on Friday, July 1st, and Saturday, July 2d, at 9 A. M. Applicants for admission to the College will present themselves at Cathedral College, 462 Madison Avenue, on Wednesday, June 29th; or Thursday, June 30th, between 10 A. M. and 1 P. M.

The statistics of the pilgrimages to Lourdes for 1909 are: Number of pilgrimages, 200; pilgrims, 170,000; special trains, 300. Of the pilgrimages sixty-four, including 34,143 persons, came from outside France. Besides the great national pilgrimage, organized at Paris, there were 58 dioceses from which pilgrimages set out. These figures do not include casual pilgrims, who may be estimated from the number of Communions distributed, over 516,000. There were 53,000 Masses, besides those celebrated in the parochial church, and in the chapels of the various religious houses. The "brancardiers" numbered 243, with 217 auxiliaries and 2,562 volunteers, who devoted themselves to the care of 8,593 persons. There were 100,000 immersions in the piscinas, and 533 ex-voto offerings. The medical bureau was visited by 445 physicians, 300 French and 145 from other countries. The cures deemed significant enough to be registered by the medical bureau were one hundred and six.

The Rev. Patrick Paul Crane, for the past five years a member of the Saint Louis Apostolate, was recently appointed Irremovable Rector of the Church of Saint Lawrence O'Toole, by Archbishop Glennon. He will continue the work of Missions to non-Catholics for at least another year. Father Crane succeeds the well-known priest and scientist, Father Brennan.

The Curé of the parish of St. Just, Marseilles, France, celebrated on May 26, the sixtieth anniversary of his ordination. The bishop, the local clergy and a large congregation were present in the Church and the venerable priest went into the pulpit to make an address of thanks for the congratulations showered on him. He had just concluded with the words: "To-day is the greatest day of my life," when he collapsed and expired in a few moments.

It is reported that on June 16 the Holy Father received privately Roque Saenz Peña, President-elect of Argentina, who is still in Rome in the capacity of Argentine Minister to the Quirinal. By the rule of protest established by the Holy See after the loss of the Church's temporal power, he would be debarred from a private audience with the Sovereign Pontiff. This technical difficulty was overcome by the declaration of Señor Peña that he had in fact ceased to be a Minister to the Quirinal, although he had not yet delivered his letters of recall.

OBITUARY

James G. Murray, who was a member of the Irish Papal Brigade which went to the assistance of Pope Pius IX in 1860, died recently in New York, in his seventy-first year. The medal given to him by the Pope was buried with him.

The Rev. Brother Adrian of Jesus of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, died at La Salle Academy, New York. He was born at St. Catherine's, Ont., Canada, June 11, 1839, and had been fifty-four years a Christian Brother. From 1878 to 1881 he was director of the New York Catholic Protectory, Westchester, N. Y., and before that he had held a similar position in Quito, South America, from 1874 to 1877. From 1887 to 1890 he was employed in the Province of St. Louis, and in his later years in the Province of New York.

PERSONAL

His Holiness, Pius X, has appointed the Bishop of Newark, the Right Rev. Dr. J. J. O'Connor, a bishop assistant at the Pontifical throne. Mgr. O'Connor went to Rome recently on his official visitation.

The Rt. Rev. Mgr. William E. Starr, pastor emeritus of Corpus Christi Church, Baltimore, delivered the baccalaureate sermon at St. Ignatius Church in connection with the graduating exercises of Loyola College, in that city. Among the pastors of the city no one better fitted for the task could have been selected than the distinguished prelate. His sermons and addresses give evidence of deep thought, and his style is attractive and impressive. Moreover, Mgr. Starr is ever ready with voice and pen to defend the Church and her institutions whenever these are publicly assailed. About ten years ago there appeared in the Baltimore papers, from his pen, a vigorous defence of the religious orders and their policy in respect to the education of a native clergy in reply to an attack by a man then in high standing, who has since shown himself in his true colors by discarding the Church and her doctrines and denying all revealed religion. It is to be regretted that the whole text of the Baccalaureate, the subject of which was "Modernism," has not been printed. The following extract is taken from the Baltimore Sun:

"Since the war there has been no serious recrudescence of the old bigotry," he said. "I have spoken of these things to show how miserably the good intentions of the fathers were frustrated by the anti-Catholic feeling of the people at large. They were accustomed to say that these United States were a Protestant country and that Catholics were here on sufferance only. There is still enough of the old spirit left to deprive us of equal rights in the matter of the common schools; we have accepted the situation, however, and built our own schools.

"In our country no opportunity is let slip to put the Catholic Church in the wrong. Nearly all newspaperdom is in the conspiracy. Anything that serves to place Catholics, their faith and their practice in a sinister light is eagerly seized upon, magnified and embellished with pen and pencil; while a studied silence is maintained with regard to everything that could commend them to the good opinion of the world. All this is in the air we breathe. Magazines and books, almost the entire domain of literature, scientific treatises, and even children's school manuals are pervaded by this spirit of hostility. Turn whither you will, and a thousand noxious things start up to attack the foundation of our faith."

The Church of the Holy Name of Mary, Algiers, La., had an unusual dual celebration June 17-20. Its Rector, Rev. Thos. J. Larkin, S. M., celebrated the Silver jubilee of his priesthood in the Church in which he received ordination, June 17, 1885, and having cleared away the heavy indebtedness of the Church, has been able to make its consecration synchronize with his jubilee. Father Larkin was educated in Derry, his native county, and at Marist institutions in Ireland, France and the United States. He had been President of All Hallows College, Salt Lake City, and Jefferson College, La., before his appointment to the important parish of Algiers. His Grace, Archbishop Blenk, presided at the jubilee and consecration ceremonies, and among the visiting prelates were the Rt. Rev. Bishops Allen of Mobile, Keiley of Savannah and Morris of Little Rock. Dr. Gunn, S. M., rector of the Marist College, Atlanta, was the preacher.

The Charleston News and Courier, speaking of the late Prof. Goldwin Smith's religious gropings and vagaries, remarks very pointedly:

"In recent years his articles on religious questions have attracted more attention perhaps than any of his other writings. He has been termed 'the last of the great agnostics.' He described himself as 'an earnest yet reverent seeker after truth.' As his life neared the end his anxiety to peer behind the veil into whatever world lies beyond the portal of death became more and more marked, but while he wrote often and entertainingly regarding immortality and kindred matters, he wrote to no purpose. All his reflections ended in doubts. He had nothing to offer except a doctrine of negation. His many contributions to the public prints on matters affecting religion can by no possibility have accomplished any good. We are told that 'his primal religion was perhaps a simple worship of the stars.' We think it would have been far better if in regard to matters concerning which admittedly he had no message he had emulated the stars in their silence."

An unusual event was celebrated at St. Mary's Church, Manhattan, on June 12. This was the golden jubilee, as organist, of Dr. Edward J. Biedermann and the commemoration of his twenty-five years' service at St. Mary's. There was a solemn high Mass with a special musical program under the direction of Dr. Biedermann.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

Addressing the New England Arbitration and Peace Conference at Hartford, Conn., ex-Secretary of State John W. Foster took up the three foreign wars in which our country has been engaged and discussed them in detail. The war of 1812 with Great Britain, he contended, although justified under international law, was entered upon against the better judgment of the country. President Madison and a large minority in Congress strenuously opposed it, and it was only entered upon under the lead of a party known as the "War Hawks," at the head of whom were Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, and other young public men, with the boast that we would dictate a peace at Quebec. Five days after Congress declared war and long before the news reached England, the Orders in Council, which were the main cause of the war, were repealed. Peace was made without settling a single question about which the contest was begun. "Never was a war more fruitless in its conclusion. It was neither inevitable nor necessary."

In the judgment of history the war with Mexico was provoked on our part and largely inspired by the spirit of slavery extension. Although the results of the war were greatly to the advantage of the United States, that does not change the fact that it was one of conquest and injustice on our part and might easily have been avoided. The war with Spain had some of the characteristics of that of 1812, in that the President was strongly opposed to a resort to arms and struggled for peace to the last, and it was Congress and an excited press that unnecessarily forced hostilities. The Spanish Government would in the end have yielded to the demands of our Government, if time had been allowed for the negotiations. The ill-timed catastrophe of the Maine caused our people to lose their reason, and the fear that we were mistaken as to the cause of that disaster has been one of the reasons which has delayed the raising of its wreck. It is historically correct to assert that the war was forced upon Spain by us, and that it might easily have been avoided with honor."

In conclusion, Mr. Foster said: "The review which I have made has shown that all the foreign wars in which we have engaged were brought on by our own precipitate action, that they were not inevitable, and that they might have been avoided by the exercise of prudence and conciliation. It also shows that it has been possible for us to live in peace with our nearest neighbor, with which we have the most extensive and intimate relations, the most perplexing and troublesome questions. Our history also shows that during our whole life as an independent nation no country has shown towards us a spirit of aggression or a disposition to invade our territory. If such is the case, is it not time that every true patriot, every lover of his country and of its fair fame in the world, every friend of humanity, should strive to curb the spirit of aggression and military glory among our people and seek to create an earnest sentiment against all war."

In his address to the graduates at Bryn Mawr, President Taft gave a glowing tribute to the higher education of women. Several times during the development of the theme he dissented sharply from the view that academic and college training unfitted a man or woman for business, and he never scored harder than when he declared that the college girl did make a good wife and mother. One paragraph of his address deserves to be remembered. It offers an admirable reply to an objection not rarely advanced by those who are lukewarm regarding the college training of women.

"There is one danger of a college education and four years' life under college influences that it seems wise to warn against. It is the danger of discontent with the surroundings of the home to which a college girl goes back after graduation, and the yielding to the feeling that her own town or city does not offer to her the opportunity which she is entitled to in the use of the education which she has acquired. It gives her, after she is settled at home again, an unhappy spirit, a longing for something she does not have, a spirit of criticism toward everything which surrounds her, and a consequent inability to contribute to the happiness of those with whom she lives or comes in contact. This is not the right result of the higher education. If she has acquired, as she ought to, a true sense of proportion she will realize that there is no place so restricted, no society so simple, in which she cannot make her greater knowledge, her better mental discipline and her wider mental scope useful and elevating. If she has acquired with her learning and her study and her associations with her classmates the self-restraints and the proper appreciation of the rights and feelings of others, and the desire to be useful, she will be able at once to make her influence felt for the betterment of the family and community, however humble or unimportant; she will adapt herself to her surroundings, making that which she learned at college, not only in books, but in character, the means of increasing and stimulating the happiness of those among whom she is thrown and who have not enjoyed the same advantages.

"A young woman with a higher education has much to learn after graduation in the homely details and the drudgery of ordinary life, and the sooner she learns it the happier and the earlier she can adapt to its highest use the knowledge and the mental training acquired in college."

Goldwin Smith is dead. Few men who have lived in Canada have made a wider or deeper impression by the merits of literary work; and yet, few men in any country, with equal opportunities, have been so consistently and constantly wrong. He came to Canada, full of the idea of Canadian independence. Indeed, he had, years before that, advocated giving all the chief Colonies their independence. Becoming convinced that he was wrong on that, he went wrong once more by propounding the view that Canada's manifest destiny was annexation with the United States. He fell out in turn with George Brown and with Sir John A. MacDonald. He dreamed of an Anglo-Saxon federation, not bound together by political or national bonds, but by the ties of sentiment. In this federation, he included the United States, in which Anglo-Saxon sentiment, apart from after-dinner speeches, does not exist. Upon old-world questions he was equally wrong. He is represented now as having taken a sympathetic, tender and charitable view of Irish affairs. Yet he did not think that the enforcement of law in Ireland was as strict as in England. He opposed Home Rule for Ireland. Almost all the misfortunes of Ireland he attributed to the inherent depravity of the Celt and to the scoundrelism of agitators. He is now called "a Liberal of the old school." If he was a Liberal of any school, it must have been a school which at his birth left him as the sole survivor. He was against "aristocracy" even to the extent of deeming the Governor-General of Canada a sham. Yet, we are told, he took a most hopeless view of "democracy gone rampant." He condemned party government as having failed as a system for carrying on the affairs of a country. Such were his strange and distorted views. He was most independent; but, with all, was bound and enslaved by his prejudices; full of great ideas all distorted, of great thoughts all awry. He was a man not easily to be understood. Probably that is the reason why so many men looked up to him with awe and veneration.—Antagonish Casket.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CATHOLIC AMERICAN HISTORY

To the Editor of AMERICA:

From the published program of the coming meeting in Detroit, next month, of the Catholic Educational Association there is every indication that it will be the most important gathering yet held of that body. No evidence, however, is to be found in the details of the work outlined for the various sections that any effort is to be made to remedy that one serious defect in the schedules of our schools and colleges—the neglect of Catholic American history. The Catholic record of the United States is not included in the courses of our schools or colleges; there is not a single text-book properly prepared for such a course. Our children are ignorant of the Catholic history of the United States, and unfortunately most of their teachers are no wiser in the same direction.

It seems to me that this would be a very proper subject for the Detroit meeting to take up and adopt such measures as would bring about an immediate change. Surely we should be proud of our past, but the continued neglect to teach its incidents in our schools does not look like it. The many recent celebrations of Catholic centenaries have aroused a special interest in such topics that should be availed of at once, and, in my judgment, the Detroit meeting will be sadly lacking in one practical result if it does not start the necessary work for the preparation of the much-needed text-books and the establishment of the study as a part of the ordinary class routine of the schools.

CATHOLIC PARENT.

Brooklyn, June 8.

A TRINITY OF WORTHY CATHOLIC JOURNALISTS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I thank you very warmly for your generous and most complimentary editorial reference to me in the current AMERICA. It's a tribute that I should be very proud to deserve, but that very fact puts a keener edge upon my regret that you have fallen into an error, which several others have made before you, as to my connection with the Catholic Standard and Times.

You speak of me as "editor and manager," from which it would be natural for your readers to conclude that the success of that newspaper, to which you refer so flatteringly, is due entirely to me. Nothing could be further from the truth nor more unjust to two men to whom the greatest credit belongs. It is true I am the manager, but my relation to the editorial department is only that of a contributor, whose department of sketches in prose and verse occupies a very small section of the editorial page. The "voice" of the paper is Mr. John J. O'Shea, the able and scholarly editor-in-chief, and the trained, discriminating mind responsible for the paper's news and literary features is Managing Editor Francis P. Green's.

At the risk of seeming to attach undue importance to a matter of small moment, I trespass thus upon your time merely that full credit may be given to two worthy Catholic journalists who have plentifully earned the good opinion of the Catholic public.

T. A. DALY.

Germantown, June 18.

[We take pleasure in publishing Mr. Daly's disclaimer of whatever excess our editorial indulged in, especially since, by erring in calling him the editor of the Catholic Standard and Times, it did grave injustice to Mr. O'Shea and Mr. Green by its exclusive tone. We had no desire to depreciate the valuable contributions of talent and energy made by these two gentlemen to Catholic journalism. We think that they themselves will be the first to recognize that the occasion of our editorial was responsible for concentrating our attention on one of their staff. If the error alluded to appeared to anyone in the light of an invidious distinction, we can only express our sincere regret, and we take this opportunity of declaring our high regard and admiration for them as well as for Mr. Daly, as Catholic laymen who are strenuously exercising talents of a high order in the cause of Catholic truth.—Ed. AMERICA.]

CATHOLIC WAR CHAPLAINS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the notice in this week's AMERICA of the Catholic chaplains in the Civil war there is no mention of the well-known Rev. Dr. Butler, who served as Chaplain of the 23rd Illinois, better known as the "Chicago Irish Brigade," commanded by the gallant Col. James A. Mulligan; nor of Father Kelly, who was Chaplain of the 90th Illinois, known as the "Irish Legion." This last-named regiment was organized by Very Rev. Dr. Dunn, Vicar General of Chicago, and was commanded by Col. O'Meara.

Dr. Butler, it may be recalled, was named Bishop of Concordia, went to Rome to be consecrated there, and died only a few days before the time appointed for the ceremony. Wisconsin sent at least one distinctively Irish regiment, under the command of Col. Molloy.

I recall also the name of Father Fitzgibbon of Springfield, Illinois, who was appointed "Hospital Chaplain" by President Lincoln; and no doubt there were others in the west not in my mind at this moment.

WILLIAM J. ONAHAN.

Chicago, June 18.

[There was no intention of considering the list of war chaplains complete, and Mr. Onahan's additions to it are welcome. There were others also whose services should not be overlooked by the present generation.—Ed. AMERICA.]

CHRONICLE

First Session Sixty-first Congress.—The Sixty-first Congress closed its first regular session on Saturday, June 25. The claim is made that no other single session since the Civil War has enacted so many important measures. The schedule of completed work is imposing. It includes the railroad bill, the postal savings bank bill, the statehood bill, and the public land withdrawal and reclamation bills. To these should be added other enactments insuring a progressive naval program, the creation of a bureau of mines, a bond issue of twenty million dollars securing the prompt completion of irrigation projects, the protection of the Alaska seal herds, the establishment of the Court of Customs, an appropriation of $250,000 to defray the expense of an inquiry into the cost of production of staple commodities at home and abroad, provision for the publicity of campaign contributions, and the revision of the House rules so as to transfer responsibility for legislative action from the Speaker to a majority of the House. In addition must be recorded the work of the special session of this same Congress, which included the passage of the Payne tariff bill, providing a dual system of rates whereby the United States has secured minimum tariff rates for every civilized nation, and an excise tax on all corporations consisting of one per cent. of their net receipts.

Ohio Democrats Indorse Harmon.—The Ohio Democratic Convention renominated Judson Harmon for Governor, and indorsed him for the Presidency of the United States in 1912, in the following terms: "We invite the attention of the nation to Judson Harmon and the work he is doing for Ohio. Two years hence it will have been completed; then we can spare him for larger duties. He believes that guilt is personal—is acting on that belief at home, and would act upon it in larger fields. A high sense of duty provides his only motive for official actions, and his sense of justice alone compels judgment. Firmness and strength mark him as the man to supplant vacillation and weakness. The nation needs a real man, and the Ohio Democracy presents and indorses for the Presidency in 1912 Judson Harmon."

In his speech of acceptance, Governor Harmon said: "The voters of the country have often been imposed on by tariff taxes levied ostensibly for public revenue, but really for private profit. There can be no relief as long as the interests which profit through tariff laws are allowed to frame them, as thus far they have always done." A significant action of the convention was its rejection by a four to one vote of a proposition to indorse a candidate for the United States Senate, a proposition which was suggested by William J. Bryan.

Statehood Bill Passed.—The House gave its final approval to the bill for separate statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, accepting the Senate statehood bill without sending it to conference. The bill, an Administration measure indorsed by the Republican platform, was signed by the President. New Mexico was organized as a territory, September 9, 1850, the day California gained statehood. It has 122,580 square miles of territory, and, as estimated by the Census Bureau, a population in 1910, of 230,000. Arizona, with an estimated population in 1910 of 157,000 and 113,020 square miles of territory, has a larger area than the Kingdom of Italy. It is almost as large as New York and all New England. It is larger than New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, and has a forest more extensive than the State of Indiana. The enabling act passed by Congress at the session just closed contains the novel condition that the constitutions adopted by the new commonwealths must be approved not only by the President but by both Houses of Congress. It is feared that some delay may result from this innovation.

Philippine Islands.—In consequence of information sent to the House of Representatives by the War Department, disclosing the alleged fact that Frank W. Carpenter, executive secretary of the Philippine Government, and E. L. Worcester, had bought and leased "Friar Lands" in the Philippines, Representative Martin of Colorado introduced a resolution demanding an investigation and charging malfeasance in office.

Champlain Monument Site.—The New York Tercenary Commission and the Vermont Commission have agreed upon Crown Point, N. Y., for the monument to Samuel de Champlain, discoverer of the lake. The site selected is opposite Port Henry and within almost a stone's throw of the Vermont border. The memorial shaft will cost about $75,000 and will be surmounted by a beacon light to replace the lighthouse now maintained by the Government. Crown Point is a peninsula of great beauty and is included in the tract recently accepted by Governor Hughes for a State park. Fort Amherst and Fort Frederick, which cost the British Government a large sum to construct, more than two hundred years ago, and other points of historic interest, are within the park. The fortifications, in a fine state of preservation, are to be restored.

Canadian Navy.—A difficulty has arisen between the Canadian Naval Department and the British Admiralty. The head of the former, Mr. Brodeur, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, asked the latter to send plans and specifications of war-ships to Ottawa; but the Admiralty demurred, lest certain secrets of design might fall into the hands of foreign agents. Thereupon Lord Strathcona, Canada's High Commissioner in London, assured the British authorities that if plans are sent to Ottawa they will be guarded carefully and that only representatives of bona-fide shipbuilding firms will have access to them. These representations will probably lead to a compromise by which general plans of mill construction will be handed over by the Admiralty on these conditions. The Canadian Government's policy of having the cruisers built in Canada necessitates the setting up of branch establishments in the Dominion by one or more of the big shipbuilding firms of Great Britain. Certain British firms having intimated that it would not be worth their while to tender merely on a few of the proposed vessels, propositions for the entire fleet will be asked for at once. Competition will be limited to British and Canadian firms.

Manitoba.—The general elections for the Province of Manitoba will be held, says the Winnipeg Daily Tribune, on July 11. The Conservative party under Premier Roblin has governed this province for the last ten years. Of the nine provinces of the Dominion it is one of the most faithful to the Conservative party. Considering that it has been understood for some time that the elections would be held on or about that date, surprise, not unmixed with resentment, is expressed that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, leader of the governing Liberal party at Ottawa, should have chosen the moment of a provincial election to address public meetings in Manitoba. Especially in view of the extension of Manitoba's boundaries, which is a critical question with the Federal Government, this visit of Sir Wilfrid is viewed as personal interference in Manitoba's affairs. The Manitoba Liberal press professes to be much annoyed over the possible conflict of the elections with Sir Wilfrid's visit, and it has even gone the length of declaring that the date of the election should be postponed to suit the Federal Premier's convenience. Liberals all over the province suggest that if necessary the Lieutenant-Governor, an old-time Liberal, may refuse to grant a dissolution of the Legislature until Sir Wilfrid has concluded his campaign of apology for his government as against the charges of wasteful expenditure made by Mr. R. L. Borden, the leader of the Federal opposition.

Apostolic Delegate for Newfoundland.—The Casket announces that His Holiness Pius X, through the Sacred Consistorial Congregation, has placed the Island of Newfoundland under the jurisdiction of the Apostolic Delegate of Canada, who henceforth will have the double title of Apostolic Delegate for Canada and Newfoundland. There are three dioceses in the Island of Newfoundland, forming an ecclesiastical province, the Archdiocese of St. John's, the Diocese of Harbor Grace and the Diocese of St. George's. The Catholic population is about 80,000. Hitherto there has been no representative of the Holy See with jurisdiction over Newfoundland.

Revolt in Northern Mexico.—The State of Sonora has been the scene of violent outbreak against the Diaz administration. Arms and ammunition have been so abundantly furnished from the American side that Mexico has requested Washington to exercise great vigilance on the frontier. Opposition to the re-election of Vice-President Corral, who was formerly Governor of Sonora, is believed to be the chief motive for the outbreak.

Great Britain.—The first meeting of the Veto Conference was held June 17, in the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister, Lord Crewe, Mr. Lloyd-George and Mr. Birrell represented the Government, and Mr. Balfour, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Cawdor and Mr. Austin Chamberlain, the Opposition. The leaders in the Commons and the House of Lords are confronted by the leaders of the Opposition, the Chancellor of the Exchequer by the ex-Chancellor, and a Cabinet Minister of the Commons by an ex-Cabinet minister of the Lords. The negotiations are untrammelled by conditions and the proceedings are confidential, but there will be opportunity of parliamentary discussion before legislative effect is given to the findings. The organs of both sides do not entertain much hope of a satisfactory agreement.—Viscount Kitchener's resignation of his command has occasioned much comment and angry debate in both Houses of Parliament. He resigned, it is stated, for the same reason that prompted the resignation of the Duke of Connaught, because his action was made subject to the War Office and he was not allowed a free hand. It is also alleged that he desires the Viceroyalty of India. Lord Kitchener retains the position of Field Marshal.—In a debate in the Commons on the Egyptian question, Mr. Roosevelt's Guildhall speech was frequently mentioned. Mr. Balfour and Sir Edward Grey found it unobjectionable, but Mr. Kettle termed it a combination "of attitudes and platitudes," and Mr. Robertson asked: "What would Mr. Roosevelt say, were it suggested that any one of the three assassinations of American Presidents in half a century proved that the Government in power at the time had been misgoverning or doing too much for the people?"—Although King George's birthday falls on June 3, he has announced that the official celebration of the day will always take place on June 24. The reason for the selection of this date, which is Midsummer Day, seems to be its convenience for the holding of celebrations of various kinds which invariably take place in honor of the birthday of the Sovereign.—It has been arranged that the coronation of King George will take place about the middle of May, 1911.

Ireland.—Mr. William Abraham, a Protestant Nationalist who had been ousted from the representation of North Cork by Mr. William O'Brien, has been elected unopposed for the Harbor division of Dublin city, a Catholic constituency, in succession to the late Mr. T. C. Harrington.—The Dublin corporation has authorized the Lord Mayor to present a petition at the Bar of the House of Commons for the removal from the King's Accession Oath of its offensive references.—Some representative members of the Irish party gave a dinner on Wednesday to Mr. W. J. Bryan, who expressed his sympathy with their aspirations for Home Rule. He had already declared himself a Home Ruler when in the company of Orangemen at Belfast. When the Irish members recently entertained Mr. Roosevelt, he recalled the friendship he had always shown them and invited their delegates to visit him in the fall at Oyster Bay.—The Veto conference is suspiciously regarded by the Irish members, but it is rumored that Mr. Birrell has stated that he will not permit anything prejudicial to Irish interests, that acquiescence in Home Rule is to be the price of concessions by the Liberals, and that King George has expressed a wish to secure it in that way.—The failure of the fast Cunard steamers, carrying American mail, to land at Queenstown on the homeward route since January 1, has caused great business inconvenience in Ireland. There has been a decrease of 5,000 in the number of passengers landed at Queenstown, and owing to a mistaken impression that the outgoing vessels do not call at Queenstown, there has been a decrease of 13,000 in outgoing passengers, chiefly Americans returning from the Continent. A delegation is to visit Washington to urge the United States Government to influence the Cunard line in favor of Queenstown.
